In the Pennsylvania suit, attorneys Alan M. Sandals and Joseph M. Gordon of Sandals & Associates in Philadelphia, along with Kenneth G. Gilman of Gilman & Pastor in Boston, contend that the same deceptive conduct that was found by the Kentucky jury also caused injury to Pennsylvania consumers.

By engaging in "fraudulent and deceptive conduct" that allowed UST to "monopolize the market for moist smokeless tobacco products," the suit alleges that UST also deceived consumers in Pennsylvania "into paying artificially high prices for such products."

In paying those inflated prices, the suit says, the consumers were relying on "a presumption that they were paying prices set by an efficient market, when in fact they were paying prices artificially inflated by defendants' anti-competitive and deceptive conduct."

According to the suit, UST and its affiliated companies are the world's largest manufacturers of moist smokeless tobacco, enjoying a monopoly share of up to 87 percent of the $1.5 billion market.

That monopoly, the suit says, was maintained "through illegal and exclusionary conduct that has suppressed competition, raised prices, stifled innovation, and reaped hundreds of millions of dollars in profits every year."

In a motion to dismiss, UST's lawyers -- James R. Kahn of Margolis Edelstein in Philadelphia and Margaret M. Zwisler and Charles H. Samel of Latham & Watkins in Washington, D.C. -- argued that the claim was fatally flawed.

Since the plaintiffs purchased smokeless tobacco products from Pennsylvania retailers and not directly from UST, they cannot state a private cause of action under the UTPCPL, the defense team argued.

Buckwalter disagreed, saying the UTPCPL includes a private cause of action for "any person who purchases or leases goods or services primarily for personal, family or household purposes" and who "suffers any ascertainable loss of money or property, real or personal, as a result of the use or employment by any person of a method, act or practice declared unlawful" elsewhere in the statute.

"Strict privity," Buckwalter said, "is not always an element of the private cause of action" under the UTPCPL.

The claim is a valid one, Buckwalter said, because the plaintiff alleges that he purchased a good for personal use and that he suffered an "ascertainable loss of money" as the result of UST's conduct.

The defense team also argue that since there is no "direct relationship" between the plaintiffs and UST, they cannot establish that they relied on UST's alleged conduct.

But Buckwalter found that the plaintiffs were relying on the UTPCPL's "catch-all" provision.

The state and federal courts in Pennsylvania, Buckwalter found, are "divided as to the governing standard for a claim under the catch-all provision of the UTPCPL."

Some courts, he said, require a plaintiff asserting a claim under the catch-all provision to meet all the elements of common law fraud, while others read the inclusion of the term "deceptive" in the catch-all provision as "creating an alternative, less rigorous level of proof that falls short of actual fraud."

Buckwalter sided with the second camp, finding that "since the UTPCPL should be liberally construed .... and in light of the 1996 amendment to the catch-all provision, this court agrees with prior decisions holding that the catch-all provision does not require a plaintiff to prove all the elements of common law fraud."

As a result, Buckwalter said, the plaintiffs do not need to establish reliance under the catch-all provision.

Finally, Buckwalter rejected the defense argument that alleged antitrust violations do not state claims under the UTPCPL.

Buckwalter found that the defense team was taking too broad a reading of a pair of decisions that rejected the plaintiffs' claims.

"These cases do not state that antitrust violations can never state a cause of action under the UTPCPL," Buckwalter wrote, "but [instead], that antitrust violations can never state a cause of action under the UTPCPL in the absence of fraudulent, deceptive or disparaging conduct committed by a defendant."

Buckwalter concluded that although the complaint "sounds in anticompetitive conduct characteristic of an antitrust violation," the plaintiff "also alleges sufficient fraudulent, deceptive and/or disparaging conduct under the UTPCPL."

As a result, Buckwalter said he "agrees with plaintiff that a plaintiff can allege conduct that is actionable under the UTPCPL regardless of whether the conduct at issue may also give rise to antitrust liability."

Now the defense team has asked Buckwalter to issue a stay and certify an interlocutory appeal.

Since Buckwalter recognized that the courts are divided on the issue of whether the UTPCPL requires proof of reliance, the defense team argues that the case clearly involves "a question of law about which there are substantial grounds for difference of opinion."

An immediate appeal, the defense argues, would promote efficiency since discovery has not yet begun and the plaintiffs have not yet moved for class certification.

"An appellate ruling now," they argue, "would save the parties and the judicial system considerable time and expense."

And a decision from the 3rd Circuit "would provide much needed clarity on the law, removing some uncertainty in assessing the claims in this case, and thereby potentially facilitate a settlement."

ArvinMeritor Sues Eaton (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

TROY, Mich. --Auto supplier ArvinMeritor Inc. on Thursday said its Meritor Transmission Corp. business, along with ZF Meritor LLC, the company's joint venture with Germany's ZF Friedrichshafen AG, filed an antitrust lawsuit against Eaton Corp.

The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Delaware, seeks an injunction to stop the Cleveland-based diversified industrial manufacturer from engaging in anticompetitive conduct in the heavy-duty truck transmissions markets. It also asks the court to award triple damages.

The lawsuit claims Eaton has harmed competition in the markets for heavy-duty truck transmissions by limiting consumer choice, eliminating competitive checks on pricing and suppressing innovation, ArvinMeritor said.

The lawsuit also claims Eaton's conduct forced ZF Meritor to cease operations.

ArvinMeritor shares rose 2 cents to $14.42 in aftermarket trading on the INET, after closing up 10 cents at $14.40 on the New York Stock Exchange. Eaton shares closed up 80 cents at $70.50 on the NYSE.

AT&T Faces Key Test Next Week In Bid To Take Over BellSouth (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, October 6, 2006

CHICAGO - The drive by AT&T Inc. to take over BellSouth Corp. by New Year's will be tested next week when the Federal Communications Commission will either rule on the merger or decide to delay taking action.

Congressional leaders from both houses and both parties have cautioned federal regulators against haste in deciding the fate of AT&T's deal, which could provide a speed bump in what had appeared to be a smooth course.

Last month Kevin Martin, the FCC chairman, circulated a proposed order to his colleagues that would approve AT&T's deal without imposing any conditions, a move interpreted to open negotiations with the FCC's two Democrats.

Following Martin's actions, Republican and Democratic leaders of key committees in the House and the Senate sent letters to the FCC and to the Department of Justice urging delay on AT&T's case until a decision is returned in a federal court case that is reviewing last year's mega-mergers that combined AT&T and SBC Communications Inc. to form the new AT&T and that merged Verizon Communications Inc. with MCI.

That review by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan is required by the federal Tunney Act, under which the courts must examine mergers approved by the Department of Justice to assure they protect the public interest.

In their letters, lawmakers expressed concern that last year's telecom mergers were approved and closed before the Tunney Act review was begun. They suggest regulators should withhold further action at least until the review of the past mergers is completed.

``It's very unusual for lawmakers to intervene in a matter like this at this level," said Shane Greenstein, a professor at Northwestern University's Kellogg School of Management. ``Usually, they discuss things more at a higher policy level."

In their letter, Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, and Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., got very specific, mentioning that when merged, AT&T/BellSouth will hold considerable radio spectrum suitable for wireless broadband.

Because AT&T will be the largest wired phone company in the country and will also own the largest cell phone carrier, Cingular, the senators suggested the company may have little financial incentive to rollout a new broadband wireless service to compete with itself. Requiring the companies to sell their spectrum before approving the merger was mentioned.

``The lawmakers have a legitimate point," said Andrew Klevorn, a partner with the Chicago law firm Eimer Stahl. ``This probably means a delay in approval."

Congress passed the Tunney Act because of concerns dating back to the Nixon administration that the Department of Justice's antitrust lawyers didn't sufficiently protect the public interest when reviewing giant mergers, Klevorn said.

Two years ago, Congress strengthened Tunney by making judicial reviews mandatory rather than voluntary, he noted.

DOJ_NMG_0076329

It's not clear when Sullivan may issue his findings on the previous mergers, but Daniel Berninger, an analyst with Tier 1 Research, said the judge's statements so far haven't commended the Justice Department's handling of the matter.

``He's said they've done a crummy job justifying their actions," Berninger said.

Dave Pacholczyk, an AT&T spokesman, said the carrier sees no reason why review of the merger announced last March should be delayed any longer.

``The reasons for the merger are no different now than they were when we announced it," he said. ``The competitive environment is more strenuous, cable companies are jumping into our business, there's a convergence of technologies and networks."

Pacholczyk said that regulators in 18 states have reviewed the merger and approved it without imposing conditions.

``All 18 states looked at the same record we have now before the FCC," he said.

In a research report issued by the Prudential Equity Group this week, Susan A. Lynner and Erin Dwyer wrote they doubt that congressional intervention will significantly delay regulatory approval of AT&T's deal, but they said that it's likely conditions aimed at promoting competition will be imposed.

Jason Oxman, a spokesman for a group opposing the merger, the Competition Coalition, called the matter ``a test of AT&T's political power. It will be interesting to see if that power can overcome bipartisan concerns about harms to the nation in this deal."

Jim Speta, a member of Northwestern University's law faculty specializing in telecom issues, said that ``AT&T has pushed very hard for merger approval. I'm sure that the Justice Department and FCC will listen to what influential lawmakers say, but I couldn't predict what effect it'll have.

Ryanair Makes Hostile EU1.48 Billion Aer Lingus Bid (Update8) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Fletcher

Bloomberg, October 6, 2006

Oct. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Ryanair Holdings Plc, Europe's biggest discount airline, made a hostile 1.48 billion-euro ($1.88 billion) bid for Aer Lingus Plc to combine Ireland's dominant carriers and add long-haul routes to the U.S.

Ryanair acquired a 16 percent stake and offered 2.80 euros a share for the rest of Aer Lingus, 12 percent more than yesterday's closing price in Dublin. The Irish government, owner of 28.3 percent of Aer Lingus, rejected the bid, which comes eight days after the company's initial public offering.

``This is going to be such a huge deal in Ireland that I think they'll have to increase the bribery and pay significantly more," said Mike Powell, a Madrid-based analyst for Dresdner Kleinwort with an ``add" rating on Ryanair shares.

Chief Executive Officer Michael O'Leary said Ryanair would reduce fares at Aer Lingus and acquire planes at lower cost by combining orders. The enlarged group would have 50 million passengers a year, helping it compete with British Airways Plc and its partner Iberia SA, which have 63 million.

``It makes sense to combine the two Irish airlines so that we can compete with the likes of British Airways, Lufthansa and Air France," O'Leary said in an interview. ``We can boost Aer Lingus's growth and profits and produce a better return than putting our spare cash on deposit." The two carriers will have separate operations and brands, he said.

Shares of Ryanair, founded in 1985 with one 15-seat plane, fell as much as 37 cents, or 4.3 percent, to 8.33 euros and were down 0.6 percent at 3:27 p.m. in Dublin. Aer Lingus surged 15 percent to 2.89 euros.

Government Reaction

Together, Ryanair and Aer Lingus handle about 70 percent of the passengers at Dublin airport. The takeover would face scrutiny from Irish and European regulators. Cathal Hanley, a spokesman for the Competition Authority in Dublin, declined to comment.

``The government is fully committed to competition in the aviation market and it will not be selling its shares in Aer Lingus," Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern told lawmakers in Dublin today. ``It was always the intention to maintain a significant minority shareholding."

Aer Lingus's board is considering Ryanair's announcement and urged shareholders ``strongly" not to take any action until the board makes an announcement, the company said in a statement.

Ryanair on Sept. 29 raised its full-year profit forecast and ordered an additional 32 Boeing Co. planes. Discount airlines are expanding in Europe, with a 24 percent share of the market compared with 5 percent in 2001. Ryanair has introduced a new base at Bremen, Germany, and expansion of the Barcelona-Girona base in Spain in the past two weeks.

Higher Price

``We're happy to see this offer," said Colin McLean, managing director of SVM Asset Management, who holds shares in Ryanair and Aer Lingus. The airline ``might have to up their offer and there is the possibility of someone else entering" with a rival bid, he said.

Aer Lingus Chief Executive Officer Dermot Mannion has said he plans to use the proceeds of the IPO to double Aer Lingus's long-haul fleet to 14 jets, expand the 28-plane short-haul fleet by 50 percent and spend about 2 billion euros adding U.S. and Asian routes.

Gillian Culhane, an Aer Lingus spokeswoman in Dublin, declined to comment. Employees owned 9.9 percent of the airline following the initial public offering.

Ryanair has a strategy of taking market share from national carriers, while defending its Irish market. Unlike Aer Lingus, Ryanair has no long-haul routes. The Ryanair bid would be the largest airline transaction in the past 12 months if successful, according to Bloomberg data.

Competition Regulator

``It's hard to see how the Irish competition regulator can permit such a concentration of capacity at Dublin airport," said Chris Avery, an analyst at J.P. Morgan with an ``overweight" rating on Ryanair stock. ``If the regulator objects, it is then hard to see what Ryanair hopes to achieve."

The combined group would operate on about 500 routes, competing on only 17, Ryanair said. Ryanair will combine purchasing with Aer Lingus to drive down fares and costs. The airline had about 2.2 billion euros of cash before buying a stake in the carrier, said O'Leary.

``We can comfortably fund this from our own resources," said O'Leary. ``We're happy to work with the Irish government as a significant minority shareholder if they decide not to sell," O'Leary said, adding he didn't anticipate antitrust or regulatory difficulties.

Ryanair History

O'Leary joined the Dublin-based company in 1988 from accounting firm KPMG LLP. Ryanair for the first time in August 2005 carried more passengers than British Airways.

When O'Leary was asked to head what was then an unprofitable local airline, he said it should be shut down. He changed his mind after flying to Dallas to pick Herb Kelleher's brain on how he built Southwest into the world's largest low-fare carrier. O'Leary typically targets his route expansion at state-owned or former national airlines which often struggle with higher costs.

O'Leary and Ahern's government have had a strained relationship, particularly over landing fees at state-owned Dublin airport. O'Leary said Ahern was treating Irish people as ``fools" for allowing the Dublin Airport Authority to raise car parking charges by 50 percent, the Irish Times said on April 1 2005. He has routinely described Ireland as ``Bertie's blunder land," citing overruns on infrastructure including the Port Tunnel in the capital.

Aer Lingus slashed 2,100 jobs, more than a third of the workforce, to avoid bankruptcy and return the carrier to profit after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the U.S. hurt demand for trans-Atlantic travel.

Ryanair Strategy

Ryanair plans to accelerate Aer Lingus's strategy of cutting fares on short-haul routes, as well as adding beds on transatlantic routes, O'Leary said.

``Our strategy for Aer Lingus is to speed up their own business plan, which has already been signed off by the Irish government," he said. Ryanair has no plans to start its own long-haul service, he said.

``Ryanair has a well-known history of hostility to its staff and shabby treatment of its customers," IMPACT, a Dublin-based union which represents about 2,000 airline employees including pilots and cabin crew, said in a statement. The union said it was opposed to the proposed takeover.

``If accepted, the government will have realized over 500 million euros from the sale of its shares in Aer Lingus just four years after the company nearly went bankrupt," said O'Leary. ``The staff would realize over 220 million, which averages just over 60,000 euros."

Aer Lingus and the Irish government raised an additional 96.6 million euros by selling extra shares on Oct. 3, taking the total raised by the airline's initial public offering to 740.7 million euros.

Ryanair Steps Up Industry Shakeout (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

The surprise €1.48 billion ($1.88 billion) bid by Ryanair Holdings for recently privatized Irish flag carrier Aer Lingus underscores how onetime budget upstarts are increasingly calling the shots in an industry long dominated by state carriers.

If successful, the takeover could create one of Europe's biggest and most profitable airline groups. But it won't be smooth sailing: Aer Lingus's board unanimously rejected the offer. Chairman John Sharman called the approach "unsolicited and wholly opportunistic" and said it "significantly undervalues the group's businesses." In addition, the Irish government, still Aer Lingus's biggest shareholder, and unions lambasted the proposed takeover and vowed to fight it.

Ryanair's bid, announced yesterday morning, is the latest example of how feisty budget carriers are revolutionizing an airline industry still recovering from the shocks of deregulation, terrorist threats and volatile oil prices. Traditionally, large state-run airlines have started or bought their own low-cost airlines in an effort to tap into a profitable market they can't tackle on their own, because of their cumbersome legacy costs. Now, Ryanair Chief Executive Michael O'Leary wants to do the opposite: tack Aer Lingus's long-haul routes onto his budget carrier's operations.

Mr. O'Leary said that if the deal were successful, he would keep Ryanair and Aer Lingus as separate brands within "one strong airline group for Ireland" that would have "the ambition, expertise, financial strength and cost base to take on European and global competitors." Buying Aer Lingus offers the best way to get returns for Ryanair's €2.2 billion cash reserve, he said, and wouldn't affect Ryanair's business or aggressive expansion.

Ryanair said it had acquired 19.2% of Aer Lingus shares on the open market. The Irish government kept a 28% stake in the airline after its Monday initial public offering, while its employees hold 15%. The Irish government said yesterday that it wouldn't sell to Ryanair and was "firmly committed to competition in aviation markets."

Ryanair's unsolicited cash offer for all of Aer Lingus prices the carrier's shares at €2.80, a 12% premium to the closing price Wednesday and a 27% premium to the share price when the airline was listed Monday. For 2005, Aer Lingus reported revenue of €883 million and net profit of €72.4 million.

It was unclear what type of regulatory hurdles a deal could face. Though it would create a monopoly inside Ireland, antitrust authority will almost certainly rest with the European Union, because most of the two airlines' business is outside Ireland. Ryanair argued that several airlines in the EU have merged and that the U.K., Spain, and France have seen domestic consolidation.

"We're pretty confident of regulatory clearance" from the EU, said Ryanair Chief Operating Officer Michael Cawley. But political opposition to losing the flag carrier to Ryanair, a rapacious, cost-slashing airline, is fierce in Ireland, a country with a strong trade-union history. Impact, a union representing pilots and cabin staff, has already voiced its opposition to the bid and cited Ryanair's "well-known hostility to its staff" and "shabby treatment of customers." Ryanair declined to comment.

Even the nuts-and-bolts of the operation may prove problematic. Aer Lingus's former management turned the airline from a basket case to one of the continent's most-profitable carriers, but it still has much higher costs, lower profit margins and a vastly different corporate culture than Ryanair.

"We said we'd never wave the white flag" when the Irish government privatized Aer Lingus, said Michael Halpenny, general secretary of Ireland's Siptu union, which represents about 1,800 Aer Lingus employees. "We warned everybody this is exactly what would happen," he said in an interview.

Win or lose, Ryanair's bid puts Aer Lingus in a bind. The bid is conditioned on securing 50.1% of Aer Lingus, making it all but impossible for the government to block if Ryanair's offer seduces minority shareholders. If for some reason it is unsuccessful, analysts said, Ryanair may aggressively attack Aer Lingus's Irish operations.

In the past 15 years, Ryanair transformed itself from an unprofitable Irish puddle-jumper to Europe's biggest budget airline. It offers hundreds of short, inexpensive, no-frills flights throughout Europe and carried 34.8 million passengers last year.

Ryanair's relentless focus on lowering costs helped maintain industry-leading profit margins in recent years despite higher oil prices and a belated counterattack by traditional airlines. The market has rewarded those efforts, pushing Ryanair shares up 29% during the past year.

Buying Aer Lingus could open up another potential revenue stream for Ryanair: lucrative long-haul passengers, which have so far been an elusive goal for Mr. O'Leary. Entering the long-haul market was virtually impossible, given Ryanair's spartan service and business model based on flying planes as long as 12 hours a day on different routes. Aer Lingus, which flies between Ireland and Boston, Chicago and Los Angeles, would bring long-haul passengers and the chance to funnel them into Ryanair's extensive European network.

Tata Steel Considering Corus Merger (FT)

By John Willman

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

Tata Steel of India confirmed on Thursday that it is considering a bid for Corus, the Anglo-Dutch steel producer, as part of a review of global opportunities for industry consolidation.

However, it added that there was no certainty that any move would be made, or that if it did, it would be for Corus. Tata's move may also draw out other potential bidders.

The announcement came after days of stock market speculation over an offer of 580p a share that led to heavy trading in Corus shares on Wednesday. Nearly 90m shares shares changed hands by later afternoon on Thursday, taking the price up 50¼p to 458p, at which price the group is valued at £4.08bn.

Corus is the seventh largest steel producer, with output of around 20m tonnes a year, but Tata's statement is bound to reignite speculation over its future. It has long been rumoured as a takeover target, and has been searching for a merger partner for six months.

Tata Steel is a subsidiary of Tata Group, India's largest privately owned company, and produced 5m tonnes last year. It has ambitious plans to quadruple its output in India, and has expanded into Singapore and Thailand.

In an interview with the Financial Times earlier this week, B Mutharaman, managing director, refused to comment on whether it was interested in a deal with Corus.

However, the €26.9bn takeover of Luxembourg-based Arcelor by Lakshmi Mittal's Mittal Steel in June merged the two largest steel producers to create a business with capacity of more than 110m tonnes – three times more than its closest rival. This has prompted speculation over further consolidation in the industry.

Tata Steel Might Bid $10 Billion For U.K.'s Corus (WSJ)

By Peter Wonacott And Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

India's Tata Steel Ltd. is in talks with Corus Group PLC on a potential bid of about $10 billion for the British steelmaker, according to people familiar with the matter. The talks come amid a wave of consolidation reshaping the steel industry and a broader rush overseas among Indian companies.

Tata Steel, India's largest privately owned steelmaker by output, said it is exploring a possible bid for Corus in a drive to pick up customers and technology in the fragmented global steel industry. While no formal bid has emerged, Tata Steel is likely to make an offer in coming days, according to people familiar with the matter.

Tata Steel, of Mumbai, said in a statement it is "reviewing various opportunities," but added that "there can be no certainty that an approach will be made and if made that it will result in an offer."

Tata Steel executives declined to elaborate on the statement. A Corus spokeswoman declined to comment. Details of a potential bid for Corus have yet to be determined, said the people familiar with the matter. Wednesday, before Tata Steel's interest was disclosed, Corus had a market value of about £3.6 billion ($6.8 billion).

Shares of Corus shot up 16% to a six-year high yesterday in London to 473.75 pence ($8.90). Tata Steel rose 2.7% to 537.35 rupees ($11.79) on the Bombay Stock Exchange, outpacing the 1.5% rise in the exchange's benchmark index.

A takeover of Corus -- among the world's 10 largest steel producers -- would far exceed anything Tata Steel has attempted. Its biggest deal to date was last year's $286 million acquisition of Singapore's NatSteel Asia Pte. Ltd. Now ranked 56th among global steel producers, Tata Steel would likely have to load up on debt to make a bid for Corus, according to analysts.

While Corus is more than three times the size of Tata Steel in terms of output, the Indian company is part of a larger industrial group controlled by Ratan Tata, who wants to expand the conglomerate globally. The family-controlled company made almost $1 billion in acquisitions last year, including in hotels, chemicals and software services.

Many Indian companies are joining counterparts in China and Russia in expanding globally. The buying binge by Indian companies still is small -- $5 billion through the end of August, according to Ernst & Young consultants. But the pace and size of deals are growing rapidly. Last year, Indian companies made a record $3.7 billion in foreign acquisitions.

"Indian companies want to drive the top line up -- they are looking to buy companies much larger than themselves," says Arindam Bhattacharya, a director of Boston Consulting Group in Gurgaon, India.

Many analysts say the global steel industry is poised for a shake-up. This year, Mittal Steel Co., based in the Netherlands but controlled by the family of Indian-born tycoon Lakshmi Mittal, acquired Arcelor SA of Luxembourg for about $34 billion.

Tata Steel is no stranger to overseas forays. In addition to Singapore's NatSteel, it has acquired a controlling stake in Thailand's Millennium Steel PCL and has entered joint-venture pacts with companies in South Africa, Australia and Iran.

Corus, meanwhile, has put itself on the block. A tie-up with Tata Steel would offer one clear cost advantage: inexpensive iron ore from Tata's mines.

If Tata Steel makes a bid, Corus would likely draw attention from other buyers, analysts said. Russian metals companies have shown interest in Corus.

Vodafone, Rivals Face EU Roaming Fine, People Say (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, October 6, 2006

Oct. 5 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators are recommending a fine against Vodafone Group Plc, the world's largest mobile phone operator, and two rivals for overcharging international travelers, people with knowledge of the case said.

Staff for the European Commission, the EU's executive arm, have written a draft ruling that may also lead to fines against Vodafone's German unit, the U.K.'s O2 Plc and Deutsche Telekom AG's T-Mobile International, according to four people who declined to be identified because the draft isn't public.

``An antitrust case is an additional point of pressure," Michelle de Lussanet, an analyst at Forrester Research Inc. in Amsterdam, said in an interview. ``There are other challenges such as regulation cutting roaming fees and more price competition."

The penalties would follow France's record 534-million euro fine ($678 million) last year against the mobile-phone units of France Telecom SA, Vivendi Universal SA and Bouygues SA for colluding on prices over a six-year period. The EU typically fines companies from 2 percent to 3 percent of annual sales. The largest monopoly fine was 497 million euros levied against Microsoft Corp.

Roaming Fees

The commission is stepping up its push to lower so-called roaming charges, the fee that one operator pays another to allow its clients to make calls outside the home market. In July, the agency proposed rules that would force companies to cut the fees by as much as 70 percent. About 147 million EU citizens pay roaming charges that average five times the cost of providing the service, according to the Brussels-based commission.

A final decision on the fines will be made by the commission as early as next month, the people said. Under EU law, the commission can fine companies as much as 10 percent of their annual sales.

Jonathan Todd, a commission spokesman, said, ``We have an ongoing antitrust investigation."

David Nicholas, a spokesman at Telefonica SA's O2, said the company has filed a complaint about the commission's probe to the European Ombudsman, which reviews complaints by EU citizens and companies about administration at public institutions.

``The nature of the investigation has changed a number of times," Nicholas said. ``The way the investigation has been conducted by the EU hasn't been proper."

Five-Year Probe

Vodafone shares fell 1.25 pence, or 1 percent, to 126 pence as of 12:05 p.m. in London. Deutsche Telekom's shares rose 8 cents to 12.68 euros in Frankfurt, while Telefonica's stock rose 7 cents to 13.78 euros in Madrid.

The ruling will cap an investigation that has lasted more than five years. EU investigators raided the offices of Vodafone and eight competitors in July 2001, searching for evidence that they violated cartel rules by fixing prices on calls between networks in Germany and the U.K.

The commission didn't find evidence of illegal collusion between network operators. The probe then shifted to possible abuse of monopoly positions in national markets.

In July 2004, Mario Monti, the former competition commissioner, charged Vodafone and O2 with ``unfair and excessive prices." The commission said at the time that the two companies' international roaming charges contrast ``sharply" with the rates used on domestic calls.

Market Definition

In February 2005, the regulator said Vodafone and T-Mobile made international travelers pay ``unfair and excessive prices" to connect calls in Germany.

``It is clear that the outcome of these two investigations will have far-reaching effects for all mobile operators in Europe and should send a clear message to all operators whose wholesale roaming prices may also be excessive," the commission said then.

The alleged infringement of antitrust law covered 1999 to 2003, the people said. A key point in the probe was how the commission defined the market.

The commission's argument is based on a legal theory -- untested in an EU court -- that each mobile operator is a monopoly unto itself because roaming users have little choice of connections and networks don't compete on price, the people said.

Foreign Operators

Regulators determined that when a network provider was indispensable for a foreign operator to have roaming in a country, then that nation was considered a separate market, the people said. Under those circumstances, the agency found that the operators dominated their national markets.

Foreign operators were forced to sign up with all national companies to get the best coverage. The commission determined that the national operators overcharged the foreign companies for that service, the people said.

Charlie McCreevy, the EU's internal market commissioner, will rule on the case because Neelie Kroes, the top competition official, excused herself because she was formerly a board member at O2. Kroes was a director at the company from 1998 to 2004.

In March 2005, O2 changed its name from MMO2. Telefonica, Spain's biggest phone company, bought O2 in 2005 for 17.7 billion pounds ($22.5 billion).

Spinach Companies Taken Aback By FBI Searches (MCT)

By Ken McLaughlin And Brandon Bailey, San Jose Mercury News

McClatchy, October 6, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - When the first of the dozen or so federal agents arrived Wednesday about 9:30 a.m. at Growers Express in Salinas, Calif., equipped with side arms and search warrants, some employees initially thought it was some kind of sick joke.

It wasn't.

The FBI and Food and Drug Administration agents spent the next six hours meticulously sifting through paper and computer records looking for evidence of violations of federal law that might have led to an E. coli outbreak in bagged spinach that has now led to two confirmed deaths.

"They told us we were free to stay, but they locked down our computers and told us if we left we couldn't come back into the building," said Woody Johnson, the company's vice president of sales and marketing.

The Salinas Valley, already rocked by weeks of economic havoc, was further jolted by the raids at Growers Express and Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista - whose bagged spinach has tested positive for the particular strain of E. coli involved in the outbreak.

Particularly surprising was the raid at Growers Express, often hailed as a model of food safety in the valley. Another fact that had farmers scratching their heads: Growers Express doesn't process any fresh bagged spinach, the only product found to have E. coli contamination. And the company says the small amount of bagged spinach it markets is purchased from processors not connected to the recent recall.

Johnson on Thursday tried to unravel the mystery, maintaining that the company's system for ensuring that food is safe to eat is what led to the raid - not spinach.

Growers Express, he said, serves as a sales and marketing service for independent growers, many of whom don't have the will or know-how to run a sophisticated food-safety program. So, he said, the firm provides protocol and policy procedures for ensuring the safety of their customers' products. It also contracts with third-party auditors such as Primus Labs of Santa Maria, which does E. coli testing for growers.

"We provide the independents with the price of admission to sell to national retailers," Johnson said. "We have internal audits, external audits, and there's a lot of documentation here."

Johnson said the company was shocked by the raid because Growers Express has "a policy of having our records available," saying the company doesn't have the sophistication to hide the records.

"We were surprised they chose to do it with a sledgehammer and not just pick up the phone," he said.

It was unclear if investigators were acting on suspicions involving Growers Express or one or more of its clients. Natural Selection says independent and government tests at its processing facility have come up "clean" and says it suspects the E. coli problem started "in the fields."

Spokesmen for the U.S. Attorney's office and the FBI declined to discuss the case in detail, but FBI Special Agent Joseph Schadler noted that agents could not get a warrant without convincing a judge there was reason to expect they might find evidence of a crime. Meanwhile, Idaho officials on Thursday announced that genetic tests have confirmed that the Sept. 20 death of a toddler was caused by the same strain of E. coli involved in the nationwide outbreak. Federal officials say the outbreak has sickened 192 people and also caused the death of a 77-year-old Wisconsin woman.

The Idaho case involved a 2-year-old boy, Kyle Allgood, who became ill and died after drinking a "smoothie" that his mother made from spinach, juice and berries on Sept. 12. Ross Mason, a spokesman for the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare, said the boy's mother and older sister also became ill after having some of the drink, but they have recovered.

Health officials had suspected the death was linked to the contaminated spinach, but they had to wait for lab tests to confirm the connection, Mason said.

While the original source of E. coli is still a mystery, California health officials said they are awaiting results from tests that could answer the question.

Investigators announced this week that they detected E. coli bacteria in samples of manure found in cattle pastures next to spinach fields where officials suspect the contaminated vegetables may have grown. They are now conducting genetic tests to see if the bacteria in the manure is a genetic match to the strain found on the spinach.

If the strain is the same, state officials said they also want to know how the E. coli found its way into the spinach fields. Some environmental and consumer groups say that contaminated water runoff from livestock operations is a serious potential threat to food safety.

"It's very common and very difficult to control all the time," said Christine Bruhn, a food scientist and director of the Center for Consumer Research at the University of California-Davis. She suggested a likely source of the outbreak could be contaminated water or compost containing manure that had not fully decomposed.

Federal Agents Looking For Signs Of Negligence At Spinach Plants (AP)

By Lisa Leff

AP, October 6, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - Federal investigators trying to build a criminal case against two produce companies in the contaminated spinach outbreak are following a script first used a decade ago to prosecute a company whose E. coli-tainted apple juice killed a baby and sickened dozens of other people.

Federal officials do not think anyone deliberately contaminated the spinach with E. coli, which has killed two and sickened at least 193 others. Instead, the probe is focused on whether the companies took appropriate steps to make sure their products were OK to eat.

To be convicted of criminal charges, the companies need not have known their products were contaminated, but merely negligent in their duties to keep tainted foods from the market, legal experts said.

FBI and Food and Drug Administration agents spent 11 hours Wednesday searching Natural Selection Foods LLC and Growers Express.

The raids largely involved sifting through records for evidence indicating the spinach producers skirted proper food safety procedures. Those records included agricultural testing results, sales information, regulatory compliance information, training records, meeting logs and employment records, according to Natural Selection.

"We are looking more toward the food safety issue at this point," FBI spokesman Joseph Schadler said Thursday, adding that the investigation was in its early stages and may or may not lead to criminal charges. It could also spread to other spinach producers, he said.

Lawyers involved in previous food poisoning cases said the government likely will try to charge the companies under the 1938 Federal Food Drug and Cosmetics Act, which makes it a crime to sell or distribute "adulterated" products - defined as any item deemed unsafe for human or animal consumption.

Distributing contaminated food through interstate commerce is usually a misdemeanor, but it can rise to a felony if authorities find evidence that company officials knowingly took action to compromise the safety of the food supply. Penalties can then include jail time.

That would be hard to prove in this case, said Fred Pritzker, a food safety lawyer in Minneapolis who represents several victims in the recent spinach scare.

"If they charge it out, it would be unusual, and could signal an egregious set of facts," he said.

Tests on spinach recalled from grocers in the affected states point to nine spinach farms that supplied produce to Natural Selection, one of the nation's largest distributors of bagged salads. The company has repeatedly asserted their plant is clean, and that they're cooperating fully with government officials investigating the case.

Growers Express operates a food-safety program in which small-scale farmers pay the company to provide health and safety inspections and maintain databases of audit reports. The company turned over these audit reports to the FDA and FBI on Wednesday.

"We make a policy of having our records available," said Vice President Woody Johnson. "It's not like we have a Web site where you can see an audit, but it's all very transparent. We're not sophisticated enough to even try to hide this."

The federal Food Drug and Cosmetic Act is unusual because simply allowing contaminated foods into interstate commerce could result in criminal charges, even if there was no intent to violate the law, said Eric Greenberg, a food safety lawyer.

"The result of prosecution under this statute is that you can be considered a criminal, and you may even go to jail, and it may simply be because you made a mistake, or one of your employees made a mistake," he said.

The government has most often used the law to go after importers who sell foreign products that don't conform to FDA standards or manufacturers who substitute inferior, cheaper ingredients in their products. After ignoring repeated warnings, for example, members of a family run business in Mississippi were sent to prison for using corn syrup to sweeten maple syrup and honey they marketed as 100 percent pure.

The 1996 Odwalla apple juice case was the first criminal conviction stemming from mass food poisoning. Although investigators never determined how the E. coli got into the apple juice, the company was held criminally liable because its juice was unpasteurized, which allowed the bacteria to thrive. Odwalla pleaded guilty and paid a $1.5 million fine - at the time the largest food injury fine in FDA history. The outbreak also led to new pasteurization and labeling requirements for fruit juices.

Since then, the act has been used to prosecute other companies. In 2001, Sara Lee Corp. pleaded guilty to selling adulterated hot dogs and lunch meats and paid a $200,000 fine after a nationwide outbreak of listeriosis killed 15 people and caused six miscarriages.

Bill Marler, a Seattle lawyer who has represented dozens of clients in lawsuits connected to contaminated greens, said the government also could prosecute farmers and processors under federal clean water laws and other environmental statutes if they failed to safeguard irrigation water.

"When you have cows in such close proximity to fields and the cows are upstream, it doesn't take a rocket scientist to find that since cows are the biggest reservoir for (E. coli) and cows poop, maybe the outbreaks have something to do with cows," Marler said.

There have been outbreaks involving greens in the past, but industry observers said this contamination's reach and the government's reaction might lead the fresh produce industry to really tighten enforcement and avoid similar incidents in the future.

"My hope is that this is the tipping point for the spinach and lettuce industry in California," Marler said. "It's time for them to come to terms with what issues they need to deal with."

Toddler's Death Linked To E. Coli Outbreak (WP/AP)

By Rebecca Boone, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

BOISE, Idaho -- A 2-year-old boy who died from kidney failure last month had been infected with the same strain of E. coli bacteria that prompted a nationwide consumer warning on fresh spinach, health officials said Thursday.

Kyle Allgood's was the second confirmed death in the outbreak, which also killed an elderly Wisconsin woman and sickened at least 190 other people.

"This confirms what we suspected for quite some time," said Ross Mason, a spokesman for the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare.

The boy died Sept. 20 in Salt Lake City after developing a type of kidney failure caused by E. coli. Health officials had to wait for the results of genetic testing on the bacteria to determine whether his illness was from spinach.

The sample taken from the boy was fairly small, so technicians had to let it grow for several days at a laboratory before analyzing it, officials said.

Last week, the Food and Drug Administration lifted a two-week consumer warning on fresh spinach. On Wednesday, the FBI searched two California produce companies for evidence of possible felony violations of federal environmental laws.

E. coli lives in the intestines of cattle and other animals and typically is linked to contamination by fecal material. It causes an estimated 73,000 infections each year in the United States, including 61 deaths, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Sources can include uncooked produce, raw milk, unpasteurized juice, contaminated water and meat, the agency said.

Idaho Lab Ties Death Of Boy, 2, To Spinach Drink (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

The 2-year-old who died of kidney failure set off by E. coli last month ate a spinach blend tainted with the same strain of the bacteria that has sickened nearly 200 people since mid-September, making his the second confirmed death in the outbreak, health officials say.

"It's not a surprise," a spokesman for the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare, Ross Mason, said Wednesday of the conclusion that the death of the toddler, Kyle Allgood of Chubbuck, Idaho, on Sept. 20 was linked to the outbreak. "We figured that would be the case."

Scientists conducted tests since the death at a state laboratory in Boise to determine whether the E. coli strain in Kyle's system matched the strain that killed an elderly Wisconsin woman and sickened 192 others.

The Federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention considered Kyle's death, as well as that of an elderly Maryland woman who died on Sept. 13 after eating fresh spinach, as suspect cases possibly linked to the outbreak. Health officials in Maryland said this week that they had not reached a finding on the woman's death.

Tests to compare E. coli strains start with stool samples. By the time Kyle's doctors knew that he had E. coli, the kidney failure had flushed his system so completely that obtaining a sample to test was impossible, Mr. Mason said.

After Kyle died, health officials at the state laboratory in Boise found a small sample that a hospital had taken before he was transferred to Primary Children's Medical Center in Salt Lake City, where he died, Mr. Mason said.

Bush Policy Irks Judges In West (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

SEATTLE, Oct. 5 -- Using language that suggests they are fed up with the Bush administration, federal judges across the West have issued a flurry of rulings in recent weeks, chastising the government for repeated and sometimes willful failure to enforce laws protecting fish, forests, wildlife and clean air.

In decisions in Oregon, California, Montana and Wyoming, judges have criticized the judgment, expertise and, in some cases, integrity of the federal agencies that manage natural resources on public lands.

The rulings come at a time when an emerging bipartisan coalition of western politicians, hunters, anglers and homeowners has joined conservation groups in objecting to the rapid pace and environmental consequences of President Bush's policies for energy extraction on federal land.

Specialists in environmental law cite a noticeable increase in the number of recent court rulings in which federal judges in the West have ruled against the administration, using blunt language that shows impatience and annoyance.

"You are seeing frustration in the federal judiciary," said Dan Rohlf, a law professor at Lewis & Clark Law School, in Portland, Ore. The law school has the nation's oldest environmental law program. "When judges express that frustration on paper, which is not all that often, they are often reflecting what they see as a systematic effort to get around the law."

The most scathing and exasperated of the recent court orders came late last month out of Portland, where U.S. District Judge James A. Redden has presided for six years over a stalled federal effort to prevent endangered salmon from going extinct in the Columbia and Snake rivers.

Federal agencies "have repeatedly and collectively failed to demonstrate a willingness to do what is necessary" under the Endangered Species Act to save fish at risk of extinction, wrote Redden, who was appointed in 1980 by President Jimmy Carter.

Responding to Redden's language and to other recent critical comments by federal judges in the West, Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia J. Magnuson said: "It is regrettable whenever a court chooses to examine and speculate about the motives of a federal agency rather than applying the applicable laws to the facts of the case."

The agencies that Redden said are refusing to enforce the law include the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which leads the salmon-recovery program, as well as the Army Corps of Engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation and the Bonneville Power Administration, which markets power from federal dams on the rivers.

Bob Lohn, regional head of NOAA Fisheries, declined to comment on Redden's criticism of his agency's work. Through a spokesman, Lohn said that any comment would be inappropriate because of legal disputes pending before Redden and other judges.

In his court last year, Redden said the administration's plans to protect fish had been proposed "more in cynicism than in sincerity." He noted in his order last month that federal agencies now "seem to be more concerned with ensuring" that Idaho irrigators get water for their crops than with mitigating the damage that dams and water diversions do to endangered fish.

Having tossed out two earlier federal plans for running the river system (one was proposed late in the Clinton era), Redden warned that he "will not allow another invalid" plan to remain in place while urgent action is needed to protect salmon. The warning suggests that the judge might halt the operation of federal dams on the Snake River -- dams that Bush has described as vital to the economy of the Northwest.

U.S. District Judge Charles R. Breyer ruled in San Francisco in late August that the "Forest Service's interest in harvesting timber has trampled" environmental laws protecting timberland in and around California's Giant Sequoia National Monument. He was appointed by President Bill Clinton in 1997.

In a much broader ruling, another federal judge in California used scolding language two weeks ago in tossing out a Bush administration plan that allowed governors to decide what national forest land is suited for logging, mining or energy development.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Elizabeth D. Laporte largely reinstated a Clinton-era "roadless rule," which had put nearly a third of the national forests off-limits to development.

Laporte chastised the administration for changing the 2001 roadless rule without regard to consequences for endangered species, and for failure to cite "any new evidence" justifying the junking of land protections that had been years in the making.

Laporte was selected as a magistrate judge in 1998 by other judges in the northern district of California.

In Montana last week, U.S. District Judge Donald W. Molloy wrote that the Fish and Wildlife Service had lost touch with science when it declined to investigate whether the North American wolverine is at risk of extinction.

Molloy, appointed by Clinton in 1996, found "a dramatic loss" in the range of wolverines, a decrease in their population and growing threats to the weasel-like scavenger from genetic isolation and human encroachment.

The Fish and Wildlife Service, he ruled, had ignored "substantial scientific information that would lead a reasonable person to conclude" that listing wolverines as endangered or threatened may be warranted. He ordered the agency to look into the matter for a year.

In western Wyoming, the Bureau of Land Management ignored air-quality and wildlife data when it sold energy leases on national forest land in western Wyoming, according to a September ruling by Bruce R. Harris, a deputy chief administrative judge who works for the land appeals board in the Interior Department.

The ruling temporarily halted energy development on 20,000 acres in the Wyoming Range, where hiking outfitters and conservation groups have fought the encroachment of oil and natural gas exploration.

Specifically, Harris wrote that the BLM had not made itself aware of a recent study showing that endangered lynx were living within the leased parcel. He said that "little, if any, attention was given to air quality issues" before granting the lease. In the nearby Pinedale region, extensive gas drilling on BLM land has caused widespread air pollution.

Federal court rulings in much of the West are appealed to the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit. Like lower courts in the West, it has often been caustically critical of the Bush administration.

Wildlife Report Paints 'Bleak Picture' Of West (LAT)

By Robert Lee Hotz

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

Rising temperatures in the 11 Western states from global warming will cause more pervasive droughts, a four-fold increase in wildfires and extensive die-offs in regional plant, fish and game habitats, according to a report Thursday by the National Wildlife Federation.

To avoid the consequences of climate change, the 1 million-member wildlife organization urged national limits, following those recently adopted in California, on the greenhouse gases responsible for rising temperatures, such as carbon dioxide and methane.

The national appetite for energy, fed by carbon-rich coal, oil and natural gas, imposes a double penalty on the ecological health of the West, the group said. The search for fossil fuels -- drilling permits on public lands have tripled in six years -- disrupts fragile habitats, even as the rising levels of carbon dioxide alter the regional climate in ways that will make it impossible for many species to survive.

The federation report, called "Fueling The Fire," brings a regional focus to climate research findings from federal agencies, academic reports and science journals.

The researchers offered growing evidence that rising regional temperatures already have had an effect, causing warmer winters, earlier springs, less snow and more rain. That, in turn, has raised the risk of floods in winter and the likelihood of diminished water supplies in summer.

The winter snow pack, the source of 75 percent of the water supply in the West, has declined by almost a third in the northern Rocky Mountain region and more than 50 percent in the Cascades since 1950, the federation reported.

As the Western landscape becomes ever more desiccated, wildfires consequently become more common, more widespread and harder to control, experts said.

This past wildfire season was the most severe on record, said ecologist Steven Running at the University of Montana College of Forestry and Conservation. During the past summer, more than 9.6 million acres burned -- twice the seasonal average -- and firefighters spent a record $1.5 billion to control them.

"The warming trend we are under is clearly accelerating and expanding the wildfire activity," Running said. "There is no reason we can see that it will reverse anytime soon."

Anacostia Club Charged With Illegal Dumping (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

Federal authorities have filed a criminal charge against a yacht club along the Anacostia River for illegal dumping months after D.C. officials said the club was in the running for a prestigious environmental award.

The District Yacht Club illegally discharged 240 square feet of concrete debris into the river in 2003, according to recent misdemeanor charges filed by the U.S. Attorney's Office in federal court in the District.

According to the charging documents, which do not name any yacht club members or officers , the club dumped the concrete into the Anacostia without seeking a permit.

Criminal prosecution under the federal Refuse Act, which the yacht club is accused of violating, includes penalties of up to $2,500 for each violation and/or imprisonment ranging from a month to a year.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which monitors discharge permits, yesterday referred questions about the investigation to the Justice Department.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said that a hearing in the case is scheduled Dec. 5. A plea deal is expected in the case, according to court records.

DOJ_NMG_0076341

The charges come four months after D.C. officials announced that the District Yacht Club was one of four yacht clubs and marinas in the District being considered for an official designation in the "Clean Marina Award" program.

Yacht club officials could not be reached for comment yesterday.

A volunteer at the club, who asked that his name not be published, said that the concrete ended up in the river in connection with a project to install a rail system used to help lift boats in and out of the water.

The volunteer said that the concrete was being used as a foundation to provide support for the rail system, but that the government's investigation mostly centered on the failure to obtain a permit from the Army Corps of Engineers.

The volunteer also said that the yacht club is a small organization with about three dozen members. He said that club members plan to meet to discuss the case this weekend.

It's not clear what prompted the investigation. Under federal law, tipsters who provide information leading to successful prosecution under the federal Refuse Act can receive half of whatever amount a judge determines violators should pay in fines.

Interior Dept. To Study Potential Impact Of Choctaw Casino Project In Mississippi (USAT)

By Ana Radelat, Gannett News Service

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Interior Department will examine a proposal for a casino the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians hopes to build in Jackson County.

In a notice in the Federal Register on Wednesday, the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) said it intends to study the potential environmental impact of the casino, which would consist of a hotel, shops and parking near the intersection of Highway 57 and Interstate 10.

State officials oppose the project.

“The governor campaigned against it and consistently said he opposes the expansion of gaming beyond where it is today,” said Pete Smith, Gov. Haley Barbour's spokesman.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., says the project would pose unfair competition for Gulf Coast casinos that, unlike tribal enterprises, aren't exempt from state taxes and other regulations.

The complex would be built on 40 acres the tribe owns in Jackson County and 61 adjoining acres the Choctaws have asked the federal government to put into trust, which would take it out of state control.

The environmental impact study will assess the proposed casino's effects on traffic and wildlife, air quality and sewage and water systems. Possible social and economic impacts also will be reviewed.

The BIA established a 30-day period for the public to comment on the proposal and has scheduled a public meeting Oct. 18 on the project in the Ocean Springs Civic Center.

It called the Choctaws' plan a “preferred alternative” for the land, saying it would “maximize potential economic benefits” for the tribe and create jobs. Otherwise, the BIA notice said, the Choctaws would close two county businesses: First American Printing and Direct Mail and First American Plastic Molding, which together employ more than 100 people.

Kurt Chandler, the BIA's regional environmental scientist in Nashville, said Choctaw Chief Phillip Martin decided to pay at least $2 million for the environmental impact statement to convince residents and Mississippi officials that it would not have any negative consequences.

Choctaw representatives could not be reached for comment.

HAZCLEAN Environmental Consultants of Jackson will do most of the work on the environmental impact study under the supervision of the BIA.

“Nothing is going to get past me,” Chandler said. He said the study will take six to nine months.

Farewell, Martha (WP)

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

HOLLYWOOD WOULD have scripted a different ending for the saga of Martha, the bald eagle who with her mate, George, captured the imagination of the Washington area. But rather than feeling sad for what has been lost, we prefer to focus on the lessons that this improbable pair imparted about the beauty and value of the natural world.

Martha was put to sleep this week after veterinarians wisely concluded that it would be cruel to keep her alive in captivity following injuries that would have prevented her from ever flying again. Martha and George were so named by workers building a replacement for the Wilson Bridge, which the two bald eagles nested near in spite of the noise and commotion. They became mascots, and a public eager to imbue animals with human qualities saw love and loyalty as they stayed together and, over the years, produced 16 eaglets. Martha was injured in an attack by another bird in April, and her struggle to recover and rejoin George became national news.

That attack epitomizes both the good and bad news about the state of bald eagles today. Once threatened with extinction, the bald eagles' population has rebounded to a point where some are suggesting they no longer need to be on the endangered species list. The eagle that attacked Martha is a sign of that increase; the battle, which was over territory, is evidence of the loss of habitat to urban encroachment.

George and Martha showed thousands of commuters a better side to a lousy ride over a bridge. As a result, many drove away with a new respect for wildlife.

Study Says Lab Meltdown Caused Cancer (LAT)

By Amanda Covarrubias, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

Radioactive emissions from a 1959 nuclear accident at a research lab near Simi Valley appear to have been much greater than previously suspected and could have resulted in hundreds of cancers in surrounding communities, according to a study released Thursday.

Chemical contamination from rocket engine testing at the site continues to threaten soil and groundwater in the area around Rocketdyne's Santa Susana Field Laboratory, the study also found.

The nuclear meltdown, which remained virtually unknown to the public until 1979, could have caused between 260 and 1,800 cases of cancer "over a period of many decades," the study concluded.

But the advisory panel that oversaw the five-year study, conducted by an independent team of scientists and health experts, said it could not offer more specifics about potential exposure to carcinogens because the Department of Energy and Rocketdyne's owner, Boeing Co., did not provide key information.

"This lack of candor … makes characterization of the potential health impacts of past accidents and releases extremely difficult," the panel concluded.

Boeing officials vigorously disputed the findings, saying the study was based on miscalculations and faulty information.

"We disagree entirely with the report's conclusion," said Phil Rutherford, a health, safety and radiation manager for the company. He cited a Boeing-commissioned study released last year that found overall cancer deaths among employees at the field lab and at Canoga Park facilities between 1949 and 1999 were lower than in the general population.

The Boeing report contradicted findings from an earlier UCLA study that found elevated cancer deaths among workers exposed to high levels of radiation.

Critics chided Boeing officials Thursday for failing to provide information for the new study.

"The pattern of secrecy and misrepresentation that began at the time of the accident continues to this day, where sloppy practices are done under a cover of darkness," said Dan Hirsch, a physicist and co-chairman of the advisory panel.

The lab was opened on a craggy plateau in easternmost Ventura County in 1948 as the nearby San Fernando and Simi valleys were on the cusp of a postwar population boom. Originally operated by North American Rockwell, it conducted nuclear research for the federal government for more than four decades before ceasing those operations in the late 1980s. It has also been the site of more than 30,000 rocket engine tests, the thunderous explosions serving as a Cold War-era hallmark for nearby residents.

The 2,850-acre site has been the source of much controversy since the nuclear accident was first widely publicized in 1979. A team of UCLA graduate students obtained documents through the Freedom of Information Act detailing the meltdown.

The disclosure resulted in a number of environmental studies that found widespread radioactive and chemical contamination at the lab. In turn, several investigations into the potential impact on the health of lab workers and area residents were triggered.

The advisory panel was created by local legislators in the early 1990s to oversee some of the studies. Its new report specifically focuses on how the lab's operations, which included decades of rocket engine testing, may have affected the health of people in nearby communities.

The study, paid with federal funding, asserted that the rocket engine tests had caused chemical contamination of water and soil in nearby areas in recent years and "may indicate pathways for other contaminants."

Among the scientists' other key findings:

• As much as 30% of the most worrisome compounds associated with nuclear testing at the lab, iodine-131 and cesium-137, may have been released into the air. But Boeing's Rutherford said data from the site's own airborne monitoring system refutes that claim.

• Unable to obtain weather data from Boeing, scientists made calculations based on varying assumptions about wind speed and direction and estimated the number of potential cancers at 260, with the rare possibility that the number could be as high as 1,800, within 62 square miles surrounding the field lab.

"These cancers, if they occurred, would have been amidst a population of several million people and over a period of many decades," the report said. "The ability of epidemiological studies to identify these cancers, if they exist, in a population that large, is limited, given the uncertainty of where the exposures occurred."

• For years, in violation of restrictions prohibiting such activity, radioactive and chemically contaminated components were disposed of at an open-air sodium burn pit at the field lab, polluting soil and groundwater.

• Perchlorate, a component of rocket fuel, migrated off the lab site, toward populated areas, in surface water runoff. Other contaminants may have spread off site in this manner as well, the report said.

The report also disclosed little-known information about lab operations: It was home to 10 nuclear reactors and numerous low-power reactors, plutonium and uranium carbide fabrication plants and a "hot lab" used for remotely cutting up irradiated nuclear fuel shipped in from other federal nuclear plants.

About 150 people attended a public meeting Thursday night to discuss the report's findings. Many of those in the audience are residents or former residents of the area surrounding the field lab.

They said they appreciated the findings and hoped the report would spur regulators to force a thorough cleanup of the site.

Marjorie Weems, who lives on property adjoining the site, said her daughter, Priscilla, 34, had to have part of her thyroid removed 13 years ago and worries about a possible connection to the lab's operations.

"It's been such a coverup for so many years," said Weems, 62, whose husband, now retired, worked at the lab. "They lied and lied and lied and said there was no contamination. But now we know that's not true."

At the time of the 1959 nuclear accident, little information appeared in the media. Lab officials released a statement saying "no release of radioactive materials to the plant or its environs occurred, and operating personnel were not exposed to harmful conditions."

The advisory panel overseeing the most recent study accused the lab's operators of maintaining a pattern of deception and secrecy ever since.

For instance, it said researchers discovered that a meteorological station was atop the nuclear reactor on July 13, 1959, when fuel rods ruptured and partially melted, emitting radioactive gases into the plant and the atmosphere.

When the researchers requested the station's weather data to try to determine how far radioactive gases may have traveled from the hilltop lab, Boeing officials refused, asserting that the information was "proprietary — a trade secret," the panelists said in the report.

"How can you possibly declare a trade secret which way the wind blew on a certain day?" Hirsch said.

Boeing officials said they do not recall any specific requests for weather data, adding that such information might not even exist.

Santa Susana Field Laboratory timeline

1959: Fuel rods in the first nuclear reactor in the country to produce electricity for a commercial power grid rupture and partially melt, releasing radioactive gases into the atmosphere. But the accident is not widely publicized until 1979.

1997: A UCLA health study, which reviewed the records of employees of Rocketdyne and predecessor North American Aviation from 1949 to 1994, finds elevated cancer deaths among workers exposed to high levels of radiation.

2005: A health study by lab owner Boeing Corp. concludes that overall cancer deaths among nearly 47,000 employees who worked at the Rocketdyne lab and its Canoga Park facilities between 1949 and 1999 were lower than in the general population.

2006: An independent panel of scientists releases a report that finds the 1959 nuclear accident appears to have been much worse than previously suspected and could have resulted in hundreds of cancers in surrounding communities. It also finds that chemical contamination from rocket engine testing at the site continues to threaten area soil and groundwater.

Firm Fights Pollution Charges (SLT)

By Judy Fahys, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 6, 2006

Lawyers for a West Valley company and two of its managers say local water officials bungled the pollution limits that are behind a 29-count federal indictment against their clients.

Accused of tampering with pollution readings, the three have filed suit in 3rd District Court in hopes of proving the limits on selenium were illegal and, consequently, that a dozen of the charges should be dismissed from the federal pollution case.

The selenium cap at the Central Valley Water Reclamation Facility "was not properly set, and therefore, we shouldn't be held criminally responsible," said Max Wheeler, one of the three defense attorneys on the case.

The U.S. Justice Department indicted the Pennsylvania-based Johnson Matthey Inc. in March and charged John David McKelvie, the former general manager of the West Valley plant, and Plant Manager Paul Card Greaves with violations of the Clean Water Act.

The indictment includes charges of conspiracy to discharge pollutants in excess of permit limits, selective sampling, concealment and manipulating wastewater discharges. One time, the indictment alleges, freshwater from a hose was added to discharge water to dilute the selenium.

The company faces maximum penalties of $12.5 million. McKelvie faces fines of $4.5 million and 90 years in prison. Greaves faces 125 years in prison and nearly $6.3 million in fines.

Reed Fisher of the Central Valley Water Reclamation Facility referred comments on the case to the Justice Department. The Justice Department did not return a telephone call seeking comment.

In past statements, Fisher has noted that even with the allegedly high discharges from Johnson Matthey into the Jordan River, the district kept within its own discharge limits for selenium.

Selenium is a naturally occurring element. Small amounts of it are required for good nutrition, but too much can cause havoc with human health and wildlife. A state task force is looking at curbing the human sources of selenium in the Great Salt Lake, which some suspect is harming waterfowl reproduction.

Wheeler called Johnson Matthey's selenium discharges "a zero-impact situation" because of the "inconsequential" amounts that wound up in the Jordan River.

He said the water reclamation district used the wrong chart from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to set its limits. Had it used the correct table, the limits would have been nearly three times higher, and 12 counts of the indictment would be invalidated.

A Bad Start In The Parks (NYT)

Just before it made tracks out of town, the Senate confirmed Mary Bomar's appointment as the new head of the National Park Service. Ms. Bomar testified in person in late September before the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, but the bulk of her testimony took the form of written answers to written questions posed by members of the committee. Her answers were intently managerial in tone — not particularly evasive and not particularly helpful.

At one point, for instance, Ms. Bomar was asked to list the "three greatest challenges facing the Park Service." Number one, she said, is "re-energizing the support of the American people," and number three is "preparing a new generation of leadership." (Two is improving the park service's "capabilities.")

In reality, the biggest challenge facing the service is to take politics out of parks management. Again and again over the past six years, demoralized career park service employees have been forced to watch sensible decisions overturned or bad decisions made on a political basis. They have witnessed a brazen attempt to break the parks wide open in favor of commercial interests. They've seen the integrity of park service science compromised and its results disregarded.

If Ms. Bomar can put the national park system back on a sound managerial footing, she will not need to re-energize the support of the American people.

There are a lot of ways Ms. Bomar could set a new tone and demonstrate her commitment to apolitical good management. One opportunity involves the problem of snowmobiles in Yellowstone. Ms. Bomar said recent experience has demonstrated that snowmobiles "may be operated without unacceptable impacts to park resources and visitors" under the current limits and requirements. That is exactly what has not happened.

For the past two winters, snowmobile numbers have been running about 250 a day in Yellowstone — roughly a third of the maximum allowed under a temporary plan. Even that smaller number exceeds the weakened noise standards established by the Bush administration in 2003, and the National Park Service has rejected two environmental impact statements that find the presence of snowmobiles in Yellowstone unacceptable.

But Senator Conrad Burns, who is facing a tough battle for re-election in Montana, has proposed legislation that would force the park to continue admitting up to 720 snowmobiles a day and strip the courts of their ability to rule on the issue. It is a classic face-off between the forces of politics and parks stewardship. Ms. Bomar had a chance to send a message about her intention to manage impartially, in her written responses. She missed the opportunity.

The Interior Department has recently approved a strong set of management policies that put preservation first. Ms. Bomar would do well to put those policies first and put an end, at last, to snowmobiles in Yellowstone.

Judge Order Bonds's Trainer Released, Citing `Snafu' (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, October 6, 2006

Oct. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Greg Anderson, baseball player Barry Bonds's trainer, will be released from jail today after being held for contempt for refusing to testify in a federal steroid probe, a judge said, citing a court error.

U.S. District Court Judge William Alsup, noting a ``snafu" in his handling of Anderson's case, said U.S. marshals in San Francisco should release Anderson today at 5 p.m. local time.

Yesterday a three-judge panel of a San Francisco-based appeals court said Anderson must be released under a law that requires contempt appeals to be resolved within 30 days. Anderson was jailed Aug. 28 for refusing to answer grand jury questions about whether Bonds and other athletes lied to a grand jury about using steroids. He could have been jailed for months.

``This snafu has arisen because of an apparent failure of this court to be clear in its findings," said Alsup in a ruling today. ``He will be released on his own recognizance."

Mark Geragos, Anderson's attorney, couldn't be reached. Anderson was ordered to appear at an Oct. 19 hearing. The appeals court could order Anderson back to jail after reviewing Alsup's findings concerning the legality of a government tape of Anderson. Alsup has not issued a written ruling on his findings. Anderson said the tape, which the government refused to turn over, is illegal and tainted the grand jury proceedings.

The government is seeking Anderson's testimony to determine whether any athletes, including Bonds, lied to a federal grand jury about taking steroids. Bonds has denied using them.

Anderson was jailed for 15 days in July for refusing to testify and released when the grand jury's term expired. A new grand jury then resumed the probe. Anderson again refused to testify about Bonds when brought before the panel on Aug. 17, prosecutors said.

Anderson pleaded guilty last year to distributing steroids to unidentified athletes and served three months in jail. He is trying to withdraw the guilty plea.

The case is Greg Anderson v U.S., 06-90292, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Bonds' Trainer Released From Jail (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

Greg Anderson's newfound freedom may be short-lived.

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds' personal trainer Greg Anderson walked out of prison Thursday hours after a federal judge ordered him released because of a "legal snafu."

U.S. District Judge William Alsup told marshals to free Anderson because a federal appeals court hadn't affirmed his contempt order within the required 30 days after he was jailed for refusing to testify to a grand jury investigating the Giants slugger.

Anderson, 40, could be returned to prison if the appeals court affirms Anderson's Aug. 28 contempt citation for refusing to answer questions before the panel probing whether Bonds committed perjury when he said he never knowingly used steroids.

Bonds told a grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid ring in 2003 that Anderson gave him what he believed were flaxseed oil and arthritic balm. Anderson later pleaded guilty to distributing steroids and money laundering.

Anderson, who served three months in prison and three months of home detention for his conviction, has appealed his contempt jailing on several fronts.

His main contention is that a secret, illegally recorded tape of him discussing Bonds' steroid use is the basis for grand jury questions he faces.

Although Alsup dismissed that claim and others, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeal last week sent Anderson's appeal back to the judge, saying Alsup's ruling regarding the tape was not clear enough.

"This snafu has arisen by an apparent failure by the court to be clear of its findings," Alsup said.

In clarifying his order Thursday, Alsup said he agreed with prosecutors that there was ample evidence beyond the tape to question Anderson. Prosecutors on Thursday said the questions they want answered are based on athletes' secret testimony in the BALCO case and a search of Anderson's house that turned up drug records, some with Bonds' name on it.

The appeals court could rule any day.

Anderson has been imprisoned twice for refusing to testify whether Bonds used steroids. He served 15 days in July and was let out because the grand jury probing the Giants slugger had expired and a new grand jury was formed.

Other than the tape dispute, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has rejected the merits of Anderson's appeal. Among them, Anderson claimed his BALCO plea deal prevented him from cooperating with the government's steroid investigation.

Anderson will seek to withdraw his 2005 guilty plea because the tape amounts to an illegal wiretap and may have been the basis for the BALCO case against Anderson, defense lawyer Mark Geragos said.

Prosecutors claim the tape is legal and was made in a face-to-face meeting with Anderson.

Bonds's Trainer Is Released From Prison (NYT)

By Carol Pogash

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 5 — Barry Bonds's personal trainer, Greg Anderson, was released from prison Thursday after what Judge William Alsup of the United States District Court called "a snafu."

Anderson, 40, was being held in contempt of court for refusing to answer grand jury questions about Bonds in connection with the ongoing investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative. Anderson, who has been jailed three times in connection with the case, most recently on Aug. 28, could be returned to prison.

In the late morning, the somber-looking Anderson, who had come to work wearing an ill-fitting tan prison uniform, strode out of the federal building here sporting a new navy extra-large navy sweatshirt, large gray sweatpants and laced black shoes with the tag still attached. After his release, his lawyer, Mark Geragos, had rushed to a Levi's store in the rain to purchase clothes for his client.

On Sept. 28, a federal appeals court heard six claims from Geragos challenging the contempt order. The court sent the case back to Judge Alsup for clarification on one of those claims: that the grand jury questions Anderson refused to answer were based on an illegally recorded tape of Anderson discussing steroid use by Bonds.

A person in prison on federal civil contempt charges is entitled to bail if his appeal is not disposed of in 30 days. Thursday marked Anderson's 37th day in jail. On Wednesday, the appeals court ordered that Anderson be released by 5 p.m. the next day.

Judge Alsup blamed himself for "the apparent failure of this court to be clear in its findings" and the government for not supplying evidence. "Mr. Anderson should not bear the burden of these omissions," the judge said before releasing him on his own recognizance.

Anderson is still not free of the investigation. If he is called before the grand jury again and refuses to answer questions about Bonds, he could be returned to prison.

AP, October 6, 2006

OKLAHOMA CITY Federal officials in Oklahoma City say 21 gang members and their associates face a total of 85 conspiracy, gun and drug-related charges in a federal indictment that was unsealed today.U-S Attorney John C. Richter says the defendants are members or associates of the Walnut Gangster Crips. They're accused of conspiring with four unindicted coconspirators to possess with intent to distribute more than 30 kilograms of cocaine, cocaine powder and over 1,000 tablets of ecstasy.The indictment alleges that members of the street gang associated themselves with others who acquired the cocaine powder in Los Angeles to manufacture the crack for redistribution in the Oklahoma City area.The indictment seeks forfeiture of firearms, ammunition, cash and some property.

Local Men May Get 40-year Terms In Marijuana Case (TUCCIT)

Tucson Citizen, October 6, 2006

Mark A. Simmons, 35, and Ernest R. Washington, 37, were found guilty by a Tucson jury Wednesday.

Prosecutors said the men plotted to move the drugs between Tucson and Ohio. During the investigation, officials seized about 1,500 pounds of marijuana while it was being transported between the states.

Evidence at the trial showed the men used rental cars and tractor trailers in 2003 and 2004 to transport the drugs. Three kilograms of cocaine seized in Philadelphia were also linked to the two, authorities said.

A drug conspiracy conviction carries a maximum penalty of 40 years in prison. Sentencing for the men is scheduled for Dec. 14.

Man Sentenced For Dealing Ecstasy, Conspiracy (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

BALTIMORE, Md. -- A New Jersey man who operated an Ecstasy drug ring and tried to have an informant killed has been sentenced in Baltimore.

DOJ_NMG_0076348

U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein said Fred Caruso was sentenced to 13 years and seven months in prison, followed by five years of supervised release.

Caruso was charged with conspiracy to distribute Ecstasy, conspiracy to retaliate against a witness and conspiracy to commit kidnapping, police said.

Caruso pleaded guilty to distributing ecstasy in Maryland and New Jersey from 1999 to 2000.

Rosenstein said Caruso began selling in 2000 to a man named Thomas Dixon. Dixon was under police surveillance when he received the first delivery of about 41,000 tablets. Dixon was arrested and agreed to cooperate with law enforcement, officials said.

After agreeing to testify against Caruso in 2002, Dixon was shot six times as he left his home but survived.

Rosenstein said court documents showed Caruso admitted hiring individuals to shoot Dixon.

Union-tribune Breaking News Team

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 5, 2006

SAN DIEGO – The arrest of nine people Wednesday by drug enforcement officials has dismantled of a major drug trafficking organization operating in San Diego, authorities said.

Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration arrested the group, seized three pounds of methamphetamine and confiscated about $30,000 after serving seven search warrants, said Dan Simmons, a spokesman for the DEA.

The organization reportedly distributed several pounds of methamphetamine, several times a week to buyers in San Diego County, Las Vegas and Omaha, Neb., and sold more than $100,000 worth of methamphetamine a month, officials said.

Also seized were three weapons, two vehicles and bullet-proof gear.

Rosenstein Case Witnesses Ask For Disguises (JERP)

The Jerusalem Post, October 5, 2006

The six Israel Police detectives who are due to testify at the trial of suspected drug dealer Ze'ev Rosenstein in Miami requested permission on Thursday to appear in court wearing wigs and make up fake so that their identities would not be exposed.

In addition, the detectives also asked to be identified in court by their police numbers only, not by name.

The detectives made the request out of fear that they would be targeted by Rosenstein's associated when they continued to work in Israel after the trial.

Rosenstein, identified by federal prosecutors as one of the world's biggest distributors of Ecstasy has pleaded not guilty to charges that could put him in prison for up to 40 years.

The 51-year-old entered the plea in May, nearly three months after he was extradited from Israel to face charges that he conspired to distribute more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in the US between summer 1999 and November 2001.

MIAMI Israeli undercover agents want to wear wigs, fake facial hair and makeup so they can testify without revealing their true identities at the upcoming trial of a man charged with running a worldwide Ecstasy distribution ring.

As many as six surveillance officers of the Israel National Police also want to appear in the U.S. federal trial of Zeev Rosenstein using only an "officer identification number" rather than their names. They want to limit defense cross-examination that might reveal confidential tactics and spy technology.

"The underlying principle behind these procedures is that in order to operate effectively in a country like Israel, an undercover surveillance officer must preserve his or her complete anonymity," U.S. prosecutors Michael Sullivan and Ben Greenberg said in a motion filed in federal court this week.

Rosenstein, 51, is scheduled to go to trial in November on charges of conspiracy to distribute in the U.S. more than 1 million pills of the synthetic drug MDMA, more commonly known as Ecstasy. Rosenstein is on the U.S. list of 44 top worldwide drug traffickers. He has pleaded not guilty and has been held without bail since his extradition from Israel in March.

The prosecutors' motion says that the Israeli agents' testimony "goes to the heart" of the U.S. case because they witnessed numerous meetings Rosenstein allegedly had with other conspirators in the Ecstasy ring. There was no audio surveillance, making these eyewitness accounts even more critical, the motion said.

In the U.S. justice system, a defendant has a right to confront and cross-examine accusers, and courts have ruled both ways on whether witnesses may testify in disguises because of concerns about that right and about the impact on jurors. The Israeli government, however, said cover for these agents would be forever blown if they are not disguised.

"In stressing the importance of these protections, we wish to note that Israel is a very small country, with a relatively small and close-knit organized criminal community," the Israeli Ministry of Justice said in a letter to U.S. prosecutors. "The exposure of the identity of any surveillance officer thus inevitably means the end of his or her effectiveness."

The motion asks U.S. District Judge William Dimitrouleas to approve a "light disguise" for the Israeli agents "including makeup, wigs and/or other facial hair for men" as well as the restrictions on questioning about methods and use of numbers instead of names. Dimitrouleas had not ruled on the motion as of Thursday.

Rosenstein's attorney, Howard Srebnick, did not immediately return telephone and e-mail messages seeking comment about the request.

Undercover Agents May Testify In Disguises At Trial Of Accused Israeli Drug Lord (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 5, 2006

Prosecutors in the case of accused Israeli drug lord Ze'ev Rosenstein want Israeli undercover agents testifying at his Miami trial to wear disguises and use numbers instead of names to protect their identities.

They filed a motion Monday requesting the special measures, which are mandated by Israeli law but go against a fundamental principle of American justice -- a defendant's right to confront witnesses at trial.

They proposed the agents be referred to by identification numbers and appear in court wearing "light" disguises such as wigs, makeup and artificial facial hair.

"Rosenstein will still have the opportunity for a virtually unfettered face-to-face encounter with the undercover surveillance officers," the brief states. The prosecutors also asked U.S. District Judge William Dimitrouleas to bar defense lawyers from asking the agents probing questions about their investigative techniques or devices.

Rosenstein, a suspected mob boss whom some Israelis liken to Al Capone , was extradited to South Florida in March on charges he conspired to import and distribute Ecstasy in the United States.

He pleaded not guilty and his trial is scheduled to start in November.

Sullivan and Greenberg plan to put on the stand six current and former Israeli agents to testify about their surveillance of meetings involving Rosenstein and his alleged associates.

The disguises worn by the agents would not obscure their eyes or distort their voices, so jurors would still be able to assess their credibility, the lawyers stated.

The agents' true names are not relevant because jurors would be informed the witnesses are undercover officers employed by the Israeli government, the lawyers said.

Howard Srebnick, Rosenstein's defense attorney, could not be reached.

Miami defense lawyer Jane Moscowitz, who is not involved in the case, said the government's request should be rejected because it violates one of the basic tenets of a fair trial.

"I understand Israel's concern, but if these agents are going to testify in U.S. courts, they should testify under our rules," Moscowitz said.

In June, an Illinois federal judge agreed to close the courtroom during testimony from two Israeli intelligence agents in a terrorism fundraising case.

The agents will also use code names and wear light disguises when they appear in court.

While such cases are the exception, judges have permitted witnesses to use fictitious names or testify in disguise.

AP, October 6, 2006

ROME, Ga. _ A northwest Georgia businessman and real estate investor pleaded not guilty Thursday to charges of conspiring to distribute more than a ton of marijuana.

Mario Armas, 45, also entered a not guilty plea to a related charge of money laundering.

A federal indictment and a search warrant affidavit unsealed Thursday morning alleges that Armas conspired with Lonnie Merren and Kevin Redstrom, both of Rockmart, between January 2003 and November 2004 to distribute at least 1,000 kilograms _ 2,200 pounds _ of marijuana in the Rome area, U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias said.

The drug dealing was allegedly linked to other crimes, including kidnapping, burglary and laundering the profits of drug deals. Search warrants were executed Thursday at business and residential properties related to Armas and the alleged drug scheme.

Armas owns multiple businesses and properties in the Rome area.

"The indictment unsealed today is the result of a two-year investigation into allegations of drug trafficking and money laundering of at least $2 million generated by marijuana sales in Northwest Georgia," Nahmias said in a statement. He called Armas the "principal financier," using his business, N & A Corporation, as a front. He said Redstrom and Merren allegedly were money couriers for Armas.

Armas remains in federal custody, and a bond hearing is scheduled for him Wednesday.

Agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Drug Enforcement Administration have been investigating and gathering evidence at Armas' home and office. More than a dozen cars were parked out front of Armas' home Thursday, and officers and agents were seen entering and leaving with boxes and tools.

Merren and Redstrom are both expected to be arrested in separate locations outside Georgia and will make their initial appearances before the magistrate judge next week.

U.N.: Afghan Opium May Up Heroin Deaths (UPI)

UPI, October 5, 2006

VIENNA, Oct. 5 (UPI) -- The U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime warns the robust Afghan opium trade will likely cause a dramatic increase of heroin-overdose fatalities.

In a letter sent to nearly 90 health ministers, the text of which was released Thursday, UNODC Executive Director Antonio Maria Costa advised health authorities to prepare for "a substantial increase in the number of deaths by overdose."

The 2006 Afghan Opium Survey released last month revealed a record production of 6,100 tons of opium, an increase of 49 percent from 2005.

"The abundant supply of Afghan heroin is likely to result in dramatic increases in the purity of street heroin," Costa said in the letter sent from UNODC headquarters in Vienna. "Addicts are not used to injecting doses containing such high concentrations of the drug."

He called on the Afghan government to take strong action against opium traffickers and trade violators and encouraged local health authorities "to take every possible measure in the period ahead and to alert practitioners to the possible risk increase." In order to effect change, the director proposed penalizing governors and police officials presiding over opium-growing provinces and suggested drug-free areas be rewarded.

Western countries must also help, he said, adding "heroin habits in the West put huge sums of money into the pockets of criminals and insurgents, who destabilize Afghanistan and kill soldiers and civilians alike."

Uribe Hinting At Talks With FARC (MH)

By Steven Dudley

The Miami Herald, October 6, 2006

BOGOTA - Despite a strong mandate validating his first four years of waging all-out war against leftist rebels, Colombian President Alvaro Uribe has opted for a more peaceful beginning to his second term.

Since his inauguration in August, Uribe has reached out to leaders of the hemisphere's largest rebel group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia or FARC, by offering to swap imprisoned rebels for kidnapped politicians, citizens and soldiers in guerrilla hands.

"The result of this security campaign can't just be of scorched earth, killing guerrillas and putting at risk our soldiers," Uribe said on local radio this week, referring to his so-called Democratic Security plan. ``This policy of Democratic Security is a way to achieve total reconciliation among us Colombians."

The seeming about-face by Uribe comes just months after the president and his allies won landslide victories in this year's presidential and congressional elections. The elections were seen as a validation of Uribe's policy to strengthen the country's armed forces and police, and launch unprecedented military offensives in various parts of the country, which forced the guerrillas to seek hiding and lowered rebel violence and kidnapping rates.

But results in the war have been waning of late. Uribe also has been hit by scandals in the military and recent reports that the production of coca, the raw material for cocaine, continues apace despite years of concerted attack on what many consider the principal funding source for warring groups in this country of 42 million people.

"Initially, Uribe insisted on ending the guerrillas by fighting them," said former Inspector General Jaime Bernal Cuéllar. ``But now he has two things going against him: the impossibility of winning the war against the guerrillas, and the polls that show the majority of Colombians are for a prisoner swap."

Yet, some analysts say Uribe has always had it in his mind to negotiate. Uribe has already negotiated with right-wing paramilitaries -- who also fought the guerrillas -- leading to the demobilization of more than 32,000 illegally armed troops and the surrender of the group's top commanders.

Uribe also began preliminary peace talks with guerrillas from the country's second-largest rebel group, the National Liberation Army, or ELN, in Cuba.

"At the end of the day, Uribe is a political realist," said Fernando Cubides, a sociology professor at the National University in Bogotá.

IMPOSSIBLE TASK

``Inside he knew that a military defeat of the guerrillas was never a possibility. What he wanted was to strengthen the state for an eventual negotiation."

Regardless of when the president's plan began, Uribe officially authorized his peace commissioner, Luis Carlos Restrepo, this week to contact FARC commanders to begin negotiations on the prisoner swap.

The FARC is holding 59 Colombian politicians, police and soldiers as well as three United States military contractors it captured after shooting down their airplane in 2003. The government is holding some 500 rebels in jails across the country.

One of the FARC's prisoners is Ingrid Betancourt, a Colombian and French national and former presidential candidate here, who has sparked European nations such as France, Switzerland and Spain to take a strong interest in backing the swap.

The United States, however, has been playing coy -- stating only that it supports the liberation of all kidnap victims. Still, the State Department has declared the FARC a terrorist group, and U.S. officials have always said they are against negotiating with terrorists.

What's more, there are several guerrillas in United States' prisons facing drug trafficking and kidnapping charges, and the Justice Department has recently stepped up its efforts to indict FARC members at large in Colombia for drug trafficking, money laundering, kidnapping and terrorism.

For its part, the FARC has made a point of mentioning two of these U.S.-based rebel prisoners as part of the possible prisoner swap.

REBEL DEMANDS

The guerrillas have also demanded the demilitarization of two municipalities to make room for the negotiations and possible deal, something the government seems unwilling to do. Uribe's predecessor, Andrés Pastrana, demilitarized an area in the south the size of Switzerland to negotiate with the FARC.

The guerrillas used the territory to talk peace, but also to regroup and retrain, hold kidnap victims and launch attacks on nearby military sites and police stations.

"It cannot be a zone of refuge for crime," Uribe said of the area where talks may take place. ``It can't be a point to regroup for terrorist acts that serve to put political pressure [on us]."

Uribe's recent declarations in favor of a prisoner swap have surprised some and consoled others. Others have seen a transformation of the president since he began his tenure in 2002.

"I see a lot of change with regard to his rhetoric, especially toward the FARC," Fabiola Perdomo, the wife of a local assemblyman taken hostage by the FARC in 2002, said of Uribe. ``He's become more flexible."

So flexible, in fact, that Uribe has even mentioned the possibility that a prisoner swap could lead to peace talks and possibly a National Assembly, which the FARC has long demanded.

Woman Given 15 Years For Setting Apartments On Fire (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

A 25-year-old Germantown woman who set her apartment building on fire when she tried to burn her boyfriend's clothes was sentenced yesterday to 15 years in prison -- a punishment three times longer than the one sought by prosecutors.

The fire set at the Oak Hill apartments by Roxana L. Benavides on Dec. 18 displaced 75 families the week before Christmas.

"It really is an absolute miracle that there were not more people seriously injured or perhaps even killed," Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge Eric M. Johnson said. "What you did was very selfish."

No one was injured in the fire, which caused about $2.5 million in damage.

Benavides, who pleaded guilty to first-degree arson in July, cried as she read a statement in court.

"There isn't a day that goes by that I don't feel guilt for causing the turmoil, not only in the victims' lives, but my family's as well," she said. "That night, a lot of innocent people as well as myself could have died because of my stupidity."

Assistant State's Attorney Sherri D. Koch urged the judge to impose a five-year sentence, and defense attorney Jeffrey B. Henry asked for an unspecified more lenient sentence. It is unusual for Montgomery judges to give a substantially stiffer sentence than the one the state seeks.

Henry said he was taken aback by the sentence, especially coming from Johnson, whom he and other lawyers consider a judge more likely to give relatively low sentences.

"This girl doesn't deserve 15 years," Henry said. "I've had actual violent rapists get 10 years. I've had a mother who murdered her 4-year-old daughter with a pillow who got 15 years."

He said he would ask the judge to reconsider.

Tammy Krogmann, 48, a building resident who lost property in the fire, admonished Benavides during her victim-impact statement. She lamented the loss of her notes, drafts of her thesis and photos that belonged to her grandmother.

"You do not set someone's clothes on fire," Krogmann said.

That night, Benavides, 25, was arguing with her boyfriend, Kenneth Ray, because he wanted to dance and she didn't feel like it. Enraged, she lighted a pile of his clothes on fire in her bedroom, attempted to extinguish the blaze and then went to sleep thinking it was out.

"Unfortunately, they have broken up," he said, quickly adding: "Which is probably a good thing in light of the facts."

IMMIGRATION:

In Border Fence's Path, Congressional Roadblocks (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

No sooner did Congress authorize construction of a 700-mile fence on the U.S.-Mexico border last week than lawmakers rushed to approve separate legislation that ensures it will never be built, at least not as advertised, according to Republican lawmakers and immigration experts.

GOP leaders have singled out the fence as one of the primary accomplishments of the recently completed session. Many lawmakers plan to highlight their $1.2 billion down payment on its construction as they campaign in the weeks before the midterm elections.

But shortly before recessing late Friday, the House and Senate gave the Bush administration leeway to distribute the money to a combination of projects -- not just the physical barrier along the southern border. The funds may also be spent on roads, technology and "tactical infrastructure" to support the Department of Homeland Security's preferred option of a "virtual fence."

What's more, in a late-night concession to win over wavering Republicans, GOP congressional leaders pledged in writing that Native American tribes, members of Congress, governors and local leaders would get a say in "the exact placement" of any structure, and that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff would have the flexibility to use alternatives "when fencing is ineffective or impractical."

The loopholes leave the Bush administration with authority to decide where, when and how long a fence will be built, except for small stretches east of San Diego and in western Arizona. Homeland Security officials have proposed a fence half as long, lawmakers said.

"It's one thing to authorize. It's another thing to actually appropriate the money and do it," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.). The fine-print distinction between what Congress says it will do and what it actually pays for is a time-honored result of the checks and balances between lawmakers who oversee agencies and those who hold their purse strings.

In this case, it also reflects political calculations by GOP strategists that voters do not mind the details, and that key players -- including the administration, local leaders and the Mexican government -- oppose a fence-only approach, analysts said.

President Bush signed the $34.8 billion homeland security budget bill Wednesday in Scottsdale, Ariz., without referring to the 700-mile barrier. Instead, he highlighted the $1.2 billion that Congress provided for an unspecified blend of fencing, vehicle barriers, lighting and technology such as ground-based radar, cameras and sensors.

"That's what the people of this country want," the president said. "They want to know that we're modernizing the border so we can better secure the border."

Bush and Chertoff have said repeatedly that enforcement alone will not work and that they want limited dollars spent elsewhere, such as on a temporary-worker program to ease pressure on the border. At an estimated $3 million to $10 million per mile, the double-layered barrier will cost considerably more than $1.2 billion.

Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who chairs the Senate subcommittee that funds the Department of Homeland Security, said that before the legislation was approved, the department had planned to build 320 miles of fencing, secure 500 miles of hard-to-traverse areas by blocking roads and monitor electronically the rest of the 2,000-mile-long southern frontier.

"I think there'll be fencing where the department feels that it makes sense," Gregg said, estimating that "at least 300 to 400 miles" will be built.

Congress withheld $950 million of the $1.2 billion, pending a breakdown by Chertoff of how he plans to spend the money. It is due in early December, after the midterm elections.

Asked whether Homeland Security would build 700 miles of fence, department spokesman Russ Knocke would not say. Instead, he noted that department leaders announced last month that they will spend $67 million to test a remote-sensing "virtual fence" concept on a 28-mile, high-traffic stretch of border south of Tucson over eight months, and then adjust their plans.

"We plan to build a little and test a little. . . . Stay tuned," Knocke said. "We're optimistic that Congress is going to provide the department with flexibility."

The split between GOP leaders hungry for a sound-bite-friendly accomplishment targeting immigration and others who support a more comprehensive approach also means that the fence bill will be watered down when lawmakers return for a lame-duck session in November, according to congressional aides and lobbyists.

The office of Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.) yesterday released a letter from House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) promising to ensure that Chertoff has discretion over whether to build a fence or choose other options. Homeland Security officials must also consult with U.S., state and local representatives on where structures are placed.

The letter was inserted in the Congressional Record on Friday night because Congress ran out of time to reach a final deal, aides said.

"State and local officials in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas should not be excluded from decisions about how to best protect our borders with their varying topography, population and geography," Hutchison said in a statement added to the record.

Congress also hedged on when a fence would be completed. The law mandating it said Homeland Security officials should gain "operational control" of the border in 18 months. But the law funding it envisions five years. Chertoff has set a goal of two to three years, but only after completion of an immigration overhaul.

U.S. Border Fence Plan Upsets Mexicans (AP)

By Olga R. Rodriguez

AP, October 5, 2006

Mexico lobbied for six years for a comprehensive immigration reform that would allow millions to cross into the United States legally. Instead, they're getting a fence.

Mexicans — from leading politicians to migrants preparing to cross illegally — consider the U.S. plan to fence off much of the border shameful, offensive and ill-conceived.

President Bush on Wednesday signed a bill that would allot $1.2 billion for hundreds of miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexican border and for more vehicle barriers, lighting and infrared cameras.

But migrants resting at a Tijuana shelter after being deported from the United States said more walls wouldn't deter them. Alfonso Martinez, a 32-year-old from southern Mexico, had been working as a farmhand for six months in Vista, Calif., when he was arrested and deported last week.

"Wall or no wall, I will try at least three times," said Martinez, who said he would try to cross by himself through Tecate, a mountainous town about 35 miles east of Tijuana. "I have three girls that I have to support, and in Mexico there is no work."

Mexican immigrants in the United States and the Mexican government had lobbied lawmakers for more ways to cross the border and work legally.

While Bush had proposed a temporary worker program, it didn't garner enough support in Congress for passage. The idea has been dropped by Washington, at least until after the November congressional elections.

Congress focused on security over immigration, arguing that the porous border could be used by terrorists who want to sneak into the U.S. undetected. There is no evidence that has happened, however.

The Mexican government this week sent a diplomatic note to Washington criticizing the plan for 700 miles of new fencing along the border. Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez called it an "offense" and said Wednesday his office was considering taking the issue to the United Nations.

But Ruben Aguilar, the spokesman for President Vicente Fox, said Thursday that Mexico had ruled out that possibility. He added he was "confident" the additional fencing would never become a reality because an immigration accord would eventually replace it.

President-elect Felipe Calderon Thursday criticized the U.S. plan, but said the case is a bilateral issue that should not be taken to any international organization.

"I think it is a deplorable decision that has been made by the United States Congress for the construction of this wall, and it does not solve our common problem, which is emigration," Calderon told a news conference in Santiago, Chile.

Guillermo Alonzo, a migration expert at the Tijuana-based Colegio de La Frontera Norte, said fences instead will force migrants to look for new ways to sneak into the United States and find new routes through deadlier terrain.

"When migrants are determined to cross, they find a way to jump the fences," Alonzo said. "Walls don't stop anything."

Alonzo cited the construction of a fence between Tijuana and San Diego, known in Mexico as "the tortilla wall." It was completed in the 1990s and forced migrants into the sparsely populated and dangerous Arizona desert.

While there are walls at various points along the border, the one in Tijuana is the longest stretch, running 14 miles west from the Otay border crossing and plunging into the Pacific Ocean.

It has become a symbol of the divisive immigration issue, a blank slate for graffiti, crosses, photos and other remembrances of those who have lost their lives trying to sneak into the United States. Some families, divided by the border, even meet at the fence, talking through the metal wires.

While the wall downgraded Tijuana from the illegal migration mecca it was in the 1990s, hundreds of migrants still come here, Alonzo said.

"Now smugglers hide migrants in trunks of cars or get false documents," he said.

Luis Kendzierski, a priest who directs a Tijuana migrant shelter, said building a wall is an unfriendly gesture that will lead to a hike in smugglers' fees and more migrant deaths.

Between 2001 and 2006, almost 2,000 migrants died while trying to sneak into the United States, according to El Colegio de la Frontera Norte.

"We are supposed to be neighbors and friends, and instead of building bridges and doors, we're building obstacles," Kendzierski said.

House Immigration Bill's Author On 'Victory Tour' (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. -- The House's top immigration negotiator says the House won the first round in the debate over the issue, and he is on a "victory tour" of the Southwest border states to drive that message home.

Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and primary author of the House's immigration-enforcement bill, said that by getting the president to sign a funding bill that included a down payment on the border fence and other enforcement measures, the House position on enforcement first has prevailed.

"I want the American public to know that we won on this, and the House Republicans were able to not only pass, but fund important border security measures," the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee said.

The Mexican government this week sent a diplomatic note to Washington criticizing the plan for 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez called it an "offense" and said Wednesday that his office was considering taking the issue to the United Nations.

But Ruben Aguilar, a spokesman for outgoing President Vicente Fox, said yesterday that Mexico had ruled out that possibility. He added that he was "confident" the additional fencing would never become a reality because an immigration accord eventually would replace it.

President-elect Felipe Calderon yesterday criticized the U.S. plan but said the case is a bilateral issue that should not be taken to any international organization.

"I think it is a deplorable decision that has been made by the United States Congress for the construction of this wall, and it does not solve our common problem, which is emigration," Mr. Calderon said.

The House and Senate had been deadlocked all year over whether to pass immigration enforcement legislation, as the House wanted, or a broader bill that also legalized most undocumented aliens and created a temporary-worker program.

Congress adjourned last week having passed a bill to build the border fence and a funding measure that includes the first down payment for that fence, as well as money for an additional 1,500 Border Patrol agents and 6,700 new detention beds to hold illegal aliens awaiting deportation.

That, Mr. Sensenbrenner said, was a victory for the House. He held a press conference here yesterday at a technology company's headquarters to drive home provisions the increased funding for technology in the bill. On Wednesday, he was in San Diego at the site of a drug-smuggling tunnel that had run under the border. The funding bill also established stiff prison time for tunneling under the border.

President Bush signed the spending bill in Scottsdale on Wednesday.

"It's what the people of this country want -- they want to know that we're modernizing the border so we can better secure the border," he said as he signed the bill.

The president has yet to sign the 700-mile fence bill, though he has said he will do so.

Some lawmakers said they don't know whether the fence will ever be funded.

Sen John Cornyn, Texas Republican, told reporters this week that the fence bill was a symbol of Congress' commitment to enforcement, but that he wasn't sure the rest of the money would be forthcoming.

"It's one thing to authorize. It's another thing to actually appropriate the money and do it," he said, according to reports.

But Mr. Sensenbrenner said that was misguided.

He pointed out that spending bills start in the House, not the Senate, and urged Mr. Cornyn to work with the House to get the funding done.

Former U.S. Attorney To Plead Guilty In Tax Fraud Scheme (AP)

By Elizabeth Dunbar, The Associated Press

AP, October 6, 2006

A former U.S. Attorney, state judge and state Republican chairman has agreed to plead guilty to charges related to a tax fraud conspiracy, federal prosecutors in Raleigh, N.C., said Wednesday.

Samuel T. Currin will plead guilty to conspiring to launder $1.45 million through his law firm's client trust account and to lying on his taxes by failing to report an offshore debit card account, prosecutors said. Three others also have been charged.

Currin, 57, will also plead guilty in a related case to obstructing a grand jury investigation into securities fraud, in which he conspired to withhold documents and provide false testimony, U.S. Attorney Gretchen Shappert said.

He could be sentenced to as many as 43 years in prison.

Prosecutors allege Currin and his conspirators sent out fraudulent promotional materials on several publicly traded Nevada companies. When stock prices and trading volumes increased, those participating in the scheme profited on the sale of the securities, they say.

Prosecutors said Currin received more than $240,000.

"At the end of the day, I hope the public will recognize that Sam has had a long and distinguished career as an attorney and public servant," Currin attorney Mark Calloway said in a statement. "Sam recognizes he has made a serious mistake, and he is doing what he can to make it right."

Tax attorney Ricky Graves; Howell Way Woltz, president of Sterling Trust in the Bahamas; and his wife, Vernice Woltz, a director of Sterling Trust, are also charged.

Currin was an aide to U.S. Sen. Jesse Helms; U.S. Attorney for eastern North Carolina from 1981-87; state GOP chairman from 1996-99; and a Superior Court judge until 1990.

Doctor, Wife Indicted In Tax-shelter Scheme (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff

San Antonio Express-News, October 6, 2006

A former San Antonio doctor and his wife have been indicted on charges that they hid more than $656,000 from the Internal Revenue Service in an offshore tax-shelter investment scheme.

A federal grand jury on Wednesday indicted Daniel Luczkow, 40, and his wife, Mary Luczkow. They are accused of using fake entities offshore to reduce their total income by $490,080 in 1999 and $166,824 in 2000.

Luczkow was an emergency room physician at Baptist Health System in San Antonio in the late 1990s and is now practicing in Massachusetts, where he went to medical school, according to his lawyer, Van Hilley.

The pair are charged with conspiracy to defraud the IRS, punishable by up to five years in prison, and three counts of subscribing to a materially false tax return for a potential refund. Those counts each carry a maximum of three years in prison.

Hilley said the couple attended a seminar put on by people associated with Anderson's Ark and Associates.

The government contends in the indictment that Anderson's promoted offshore "investment" opportunities that helped people dodge taxes.

With administrative offices in Hoodsport, Wash., the organization spanned five countries and had more than 1,500 clients, according to a Justice Department news release.

Hilley said the Luczkows filed amended tax returns and tried to repay the money. He said his clients plan to plead not guilty.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Hastert Takes Responsibility, But Won't Step Down (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Andrew Zajac

Chicago Tribune, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert offered a public apology Thursday for his handling of a complaint about a congressman's suggestive electronic messages to an underage page as the House ethics committee opened an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley's contacts with pages.

"I'm deeply sorry this has happened and the bottom line is we're taking responsibility," Hastert told a news conference outside his district office in Batavia, Ill. "The buck stops here."

The political damage from the cyber-sex scandal that Republican candidates already had sensed began to show up in polling data, indicating a sharp drop in support for the GOP and public distrust of congressional leaders' explanations for their handling of a complaint about Foley. However, it is not yet clear how lasting the falloff in support will be as lawmakers and the FBI pursue separate investigations of the six-term Florida Republican. Foley abruptly resigned his seat last week.

President Bush again offered his support for Hastert (R-Ill.). But Republicans were nervously assessing polls for a broader measure of the damage, and some were distancing themselves from the speaker by canceling scheduled campaign events with him.

A Time magazine poll released on Thursday found two-thirds of Americans aware of the page scandal believe Republican leaders tried to cover it up. Fox News reported that internal Republican polling indicates the party could now lose as many as 50 seats in the House in the Nov. 7 elections, giving the Democrats control.

An AP/Ipsos poll showed that half of likely voters say the Foley scandal will be "very or extremely important" when they vote. By nearly a 2-1 ratio, voters say Democrats are better at combating corruption.

Rep. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.), chairman of the House ethics committee, said a subcommittee formed to look into the scandal already had approved nearly four dozen subpoenas for witnesses and documents and he pledged the investigation "will go wherever our evidence leads us."

The committee's senior Democrat, Rep. Howard Berman of California, said the panel's investigation should take "weeks, not months," holding out the possibility of answers before the elections.

Hastert's office also floated the idea of appointing former FBI Director Louis Freeh, who is reviled by many Democrats because of his clashes with the Clinton White House, to examine procedures for protecting pages. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California objected, however, arguing that the ethics committee should first examine whether current procedures were followed, a spokeswoman said.

The FBI is moving deliberately in its inquiry, mindful of congressional anger last May when agents raided the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) in a bribery investigation.

The Justice Department is still negotiating access to Foley's House office computer and other evidence, according to a law enforcement source familiar with the inquiry. "There's clearly sensitivity there," the source said.

Another difficulty is determining whether Foley's electronic messages, though possibly offensive to some people, meet the test for a criminal solicitation of sex. Through his attorney, Foley has denied having sexual contact with minors.

Former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham, who has said he warned Hastert's office of Foley's inappropriate behavior with pages more than two years ago, was interviewed Thursday by FBI agents at his lawyer's office in Washington.

Fordham's attorney, Tim Heaphy, said his clientdecided to warn Hastert chief of staff Scott Palmer because of "one particular incident" involving Foley and pages. Heaphy declined to elaborate. Palmer has denied receiving the warning.

In the fall of 2005, an aide to Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) complained to Hastert's office about an inappropriate e-mail Foley sent to a former page. The office's quiet handling of that complaint—Foley received only a private warning to cease contact with pages—has been the focus of criticism since more explicit electronic messages were revealed last week.

"I don't know who knew what when," Hastert said Thursday. "If it's members of my staff or they didn't do the job, we will act appropriately."

Hastert declared at his news conference that he had no thoughts of resigning over his handling of the matter and anticipated remaining the Republican Party leader in the next Congress.

After nearly a week of not making any direct contact with either Hastert or other House GOP leaders, Bush called the speaker Thursday night to voice his support.

"He thanked him for making a clear public statement today in which the speaker said he takes responsibility and reiterated that House leadership is accountable," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

Still, the national Republican establishment remained divided on whether Hastert should stay as speaker, with no clear consensus emerging. A national Republican leader described two camps in discussions, with one arguing that the departure of Hastert would provide the public a catharsis for the scandal but the other contending that the departure of the party's highest-ranking congressional leader would only further feed the frenzy.

Comments that Hastert made in a Tribune interview suggesting the scandal had been orchestrated by ABC News, Democratic political operatives aligned with the Clinton White House and liberal activist George Soros were considered a serious misstep in national Republican circles, an official said. Senior Republican officials contacted Hastert's office before his news conference Thursday to urge that he not repeat the charges and he backed away from them in his press conference.

"The Chicago Tribune interview last night—the George Soros defense—was viewed as incredibly inept," a national Republican official said. "It could have been written by [comedian] Jon Stewart."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called the allegations "a Republican lie. It's a disgrace. They are blaming everyone but themselves for what happened."

Clinton spokesman Jay Carson said, "By pointing fingers at everyone but himself, Speaker Hastert certainly has an interesting definition of 'The buck stops here.'"

Soros told Fox News in an interview that any suggestion that he is involved in orchestrating the Foley revelations "is so far off the mark, it's really laughable."

A Soros-funded foundation provided a grant to a liberal-leaning ethics group that had obtained a copy of a suggestive e-mail from Foley to an underage page and forwarded it in July to the FBI with a request for an investigation. At the time, the FBI declined to investigate.

ABC News, which broke the Foley story, has said it obtained the e-mail from a Republican source.

The identity of a former page who had communicated with Foley though instant messages was revealed after a mistake by ABC News resulted in the former page's screen name being shown in a transcript posted on its Web site. Researchers were then able to use this information to learn the identity of the now 21-year-old former page.

Hastert, A Political Survivor, Vows To Overcome Scandal (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

WASHINGTON, Oct. 5 — J. Dennis Hastert, who was installed as House speaker eight years ago through backroom maneuvering in a moment of crisis for his party, has no distinct power base in Congress, not much of a national reputation and, in an age of television politics, little polish in front of the camera.

But Mr. Hastert has survived and survived to become the longest-serving Republican speaker. And on Thursday, standing outside his district office in Batavia, Ill., he made it clear that he did not intend to become a casualty of the Mark Foley scandal, saying he expected to win re-election to his seat and run for speaker again when the new Congress convenes in January.

Mr. Hastert made his statement soon after the leaders of the House ethics committee promised a vigorous investigation into the handling of the Foley case, approved dozens of subpoenas and said they expected to finish their work in weeks. [Page A23.]

Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned from the House last Friday after being confronted by ABC News with sexually explicit messages he had sent to teenage pages.

With both parties still trying to adapt to the fallout from the case with less than five weeks until Election Day, Mr. Hastert moved to squelch speculation that he would step down in response to suggestions that he and his staff had failed to heed warning signs about Mr. Foley.

Without acknowledging any shortcomings by himself or his aides, Mr. Hastert said he took responsibility for the matter. But he seemed to concede that leaders in times of crisis could sometimes fall victim to perceptions as much as to any wrongdoing or bad judgments on their part.

"Any time that a person has to, as a leader, be on the hot seat and he is a detriment to the party, you know, there ought to be a change," Mr. Hastert said, answering a question at the news conference about whether he had become a drag on Republican election prospects. "I became speaker in a situation like that."

Mr. Hastert got his job in 1998 after the party's first choice to replace Newt Gingrich, Robert Livingston of Louisiana, pulled out at the last minute amid revelations about an extramarital affair. Since then, Mr. Hastert has endured a number of crises, in part by staying more in the background while higher-profile colleagues, particularly his one-time sponsor, Tom DeLay, plunged into the partisan fray.

Mr. DeLay is now gone, under indictment in Texas in a campaign finance case and under investigation in the Jack Abramoff lobbying case. And now Mr. Hastert has been thrust front and center, forcing him to confront the biggest threat to his hold on the speaker's post, and to do so at a time when his party was already nervous about losing control of the House and perhaps the Senate.

Mr. Hastert, who had a busy October of campaign travel penciled into his calendar, is suddenly seen as a liability for the first time since being elected speaker. Republican candidates across the nation were canceling, postponing or reconsidering appearances with him, fund-raisers said, wary of campaigning with Mr. Hastert, even though pollsters say he carries no more than a 40 percent name recognition.

For nearly a week, Republicans said they saw the need for Mr. Hastert publicly to concede that mistakes had been made on his watch. While he stopped short of issuing a direct apology Thursday, saying he still was not aware of the extent of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior toward pages, Mr. Hastert did declare, "The buck stops here."

Hours later, President Bush called Mr. Hastert to offer his support, thanking him for "taking responsibility and for saying the House leadership is accountable," said a White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino.

Earlier in the day, officials said Mr. Bush would not go further than the measured comments of support he delivered on Tuesday, but they later said they saw Mr. Hastert's appearance as an important step toward cooling the furor.

The speaker also won support from former President George Bush on Thursday. In an interview with Larry King of CNN, Mr. Bush said: "I'm very, very fond and think very highly of Hastert."

When Mr. King asked, "Don't you think he should quit?" Mr. Bush responded, "Oh no. No, no, no."

The signs of support were part of a carefully woven effort to bring worried Republicans back on board as the party fights to hold control of the House and the Senate. To do so, Republicans sought to stir suspicions among conservatives that revelations about Mr. Foley were delivered as part of a media conspiracy to influence the election.

The strategy largely played out under-the-radar, with Mr. Hastert conducting interviews from his home in Plano, Ill., speaking to conservative talk-radio hosts on Thursday, including William J. Bennett, Mike Gallagher and Laura Ingraham. Earlier this week, he told his version of events to Rush Limbaugh.

Since leaving Washington on Tuesday, Mr. Hastert has remained in his home in the Fox River Valley nearly 60 miles west of downtown Chicago, surrounded by his wife, Jean, and close friends. He took calls from several Republican members of Congress, aides said, and held a conference call with his House leadership team before his afternoon news conference.

Mr. Hastert, a former schoolteacher and wrestling coach, is more at home in Illinois than in Washington, traveling back to the state almost every weekend with Scott Palmer, his chief of staff, and Mike Stokke, his deputy chief of staff. When Congress is in session, the two aides and Mr. Hastert share a townhouse near the Capitol, living a bachelorlike existence. The speaker once boasted that neither he nor his roommates had cooked a meal since 1986, preferring to dine out.

It is Mr. Palmer and Mr. Stokke who are now at the center of a House inquiry into when the speaker's office became aware of Mr. Foley's conduct. Mr. Stokke offered his resignation this week, an aide said, but Mr. Hastert declined to accept it.

In Washington, the resignation of Mr. Foley has opened the door to the biggest crisis of Mr. Hastert's tenure as speaker, a position he neither planned for nor was particularly eager to take over back in 1998. Even after he assumed the speaker's chair, he was seen widely viewed inside the Republican leadership circle as a figurehead to Mr. DeLay.

He was neither the leader of a revolution, like his predecessor, Mr. Gingrich, nor was he a brash dealmaker like Mr. DeLay. His power base, associates say, simply turns on the good will he has earned among the members of Congress. And the Congressional page scandal has been his first solo test since the departure of Mr. DeLay in June at holding together a worried Republican caucus.

"The essence of Denny Hastert's leadership is that you lead by letting other people take credit for things," said Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee. "That's a strength of his. He's not a limelight seeker."

Mr. Hastert's penchant for avoiding the limelight also illustrated a weakness, Republicans said, as he refused initially to accept responsibility for the uproar surrounding Mr. Foley's case. He spoke to reporters on Monday, but did not take questions in front of television cameras, a decision that proved to be a mistake, aides said. His remarks on Thursday were televised live.

"It shows he's a specialist at the game of inside politics, not the outside game of public relations," said John J. Pitney, who studies Congress and teaches government at Claremont McKenna College in California. "He's very good at dealing with members one on one, but focusing on a public message is not his strength."

But in his own district, where Mr. Hastert faces a little-known Democratic challenger who is half his age, he responded to the scandal on several fronts, including placing recorded telephone calls to the homes of constituents across the 14th Congressional District.

The calls were quickly ordered up by Mr. Hastert's campaign, and recorded by a local announcer, to respond to a telephone recording placed by a liberal group this week that accused the speaker of protecting pedophiles in Congress.

Mr. Hastert has largely escaped controversy during two decades in Congress, particularly the kind that has befallen many House leaders before him.

In recent years, though, his steady accumulation of wealth through land deals has been scrutinized, particularly after he sold a parcel of land near a federally financed highway project he supported. His net worth, according to a Chicago Tribune analysis this summer, has risen to more than $6 million from $290,000 during his time in Washington.

His aides have dismissed suggestions that Mr. Hastert has used his position to leverage financial gain, saying that he, like others in his fast-developing district, invested during a real estate upswing. At 64, he is looking toward retirement, which he flirted with after the last election.

The president, however, wanted Mr. Hastert to stay on and push his agenda through Congress.

"I hope you're going to run again," Mr. Bush said at the close of 2004, said Andrew H. Card Jr., who at the time was the White House chief of staff. "We need you."

Despite Scandal, Bush Supports Hastert (AP)

By Terence Hunt

The Associated Press, October 5, 2006

A week into a sex scandal involving teenage House pages, President Bush called House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Thursday to thank the embattled Republican leader for how he has handled the situation.

In a phone call lasting several minutes, Bush expressed support for Hastert, under fire from conservatives unhappy with what he did and didn't do about former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually suggestive messages to teens.

"The president thanked him for going out and making a clear public statement that said the House leadership takes responsibility and is accountable," White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said.

"He said he appreciated that when they got the information, they swiftly took action making clear that Rep. Foley should step down and promptly requested a Department of Justice investigation. And he expressed his support for the speaker," Perino said.

Earlier in the day, the White House tried to distance Bush from any political backlash, saying that House Republicans were dealing with the matter and do not need to be told what to do.

"Everybody here wants the president to come in and tell the House how to do its business," said presidential spokesman Tony Snow, emphasizing that Congress and the White House are separate branches of government.

Some conservatives have called for Hastert's resignation on grounds that he and his staff did not act quickly enough on warnings about the conduct of Foley, R-Fla., who resigned last week after the disclosure that he sent sexually explicit messages to teenage pages.

Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney support the speaker and do not want him to resign, Snow said, although the spokesman acknowledged that the facts of the case are unclear.

"In absence of full information, we're sticking with what we've got," Snow said of Hastert. "We don't think that Denny Hastert's the kind of guy who says, 'Man, that's great stuff; we're really glad Foley was doing that on the sly.'"

Republicans are worried the scandal could cost them control of the House and possibly the Senate in next month's elections. That would throw a huge cloud over the remaining two years of Bush's presidency, giving Democrats power to probe his administration's decisions and derail his priorities.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that about half of likely voters say recent disclosures of corruption and scandal in Congress will be very or extremely important when they cast their vote next month.

"I don't think you should hold every member of Congress responsible for what happened in the case of Mark Foley," Snow said. "Come Election Day, the question is whether people are going to be voting on the basis of disgusting IMs (instant messages) between a grown man and a young man or something that's probably more important to everybody, which is safety, security and prosperity."

"Have you been reading the press? Of course, it's a trial," he said. "They've got a hanging jury out there and everything." Later, he said he was being glib.

Hot Seat In Foley Scandal, Republican Leader Comes Under Fire (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

When reporters in suburban Buffalo, N.Y., gathered Monday night to hear local Rep. Tom Reynolds explain his role in the House page sex scandal, they were surprised to see the local congressman flanked by dozens of children, some squirming in their parents' arms.

"I'm not going to ask any of my supporters to leave," a defiant Mr. Reynolds told reporters, who had suggested that the topic -- about former Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley's sexually charged computer messages to a male page -- wasn't appropriate for children. For 45 minutes, the crowd stood by as the coos and occasional cries of the children provided background noise and Mr. Reynolds fielded questions.

As much as anybody, Mr. Reynolds is in the hot seat over the Foley scandal. As chairman of the House Republicans' campaign committee, he's responsible for protecting the party's majority. That tough task has become tougher, in part because Mr. Reynolds finds himself among the most vulnerable candidates.

He is tainted, like other House leaders, for having been privy to early concerns about Mr. Foley. Mr. Reynolds hopes one day to be speaker of the House. But he first must figure out how to handle the delicate balance between self-preservation and party preservation. He professes to support the current speaker, Dennis Hastert, even as he has tried to shift the blame to him.

The Reynolds dilemma shows the broader tensions among House Republicans brought to the surface by the Foley matter. Republicans have traditionally been known for a discipline that fractious Democrats have long envied. Now that united front is shattered. The controversy is stoking Republican fears that they will lose control of the House on Nov. 7.

As they grapple with how to contain the escalating political crisis, Mr. Reynolds and his fellow Republicans have had to consider two separate paths. One is for the party to hang tough and blame Democrats for the timing of the disclosures. The other is to take full responsibility and move on -- while presumably sacrificing a top leader, like Mr. Hastert.

Yesterday, officials seemed to be gravitating toward the first choice, and Mr. Hastert brushed aside calls he should step down. "I haven't done anything wrong," he said at a news conference from his home in Batavia, Ill. "Republicans dealt with it immediately" he said, and are now "trying to correct the problem" through new investigations and a review of the page program.

Hang-Tough Strategy

The hang-tough strategy is being urged by former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, conservative talk-show hosts such as Rush Limbaugh, and increasingly, according to several Republicans, by party Chairman Ken Mehlman and White House political advisers. "Get indignant," as one former House Republican and top party strategist put it. "We don't have to take any lectures from Democrats."

Advocates of this approach call for avoiding responsibility for not taking action against Mr. Foley, while reminding the public about past Democratic sex scandals, notably President Clinton's, involving former White House intern Monica Lewinsky. They suggest -- so far without evidence -- that Democrats held on to information about the Foley emails and instant messages until close to Election Day. "As much as we'd love to take credit for chasing a child predator out of Congress, their charges are ridiculous," said Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

In the days since last Friday's disclosure of Mr. Foley's lurid instant messages to house pages and the congressman's resignation, Republican House leaders and their staffs have turned on each other. In disputing who was responsible for dealing with the Floridian's behavior, they have contradicted each other, and sometimes themselves.

Mr. Reynolds began the back-and-forth last Saturday, suggesting he'd acted responsibly by telling the speaker last spring, after he had learned from a Louisiana congressman about some "overly-friendly" electronic messages to a 16-year-old page. That, as Mr. Reynolds knew, contradicted the speaker's own comments that he only learned of the matter the day before through news reports. "I stand by my Saturday statement," Mr. Reynolds said in an interview yesterday.

At his Monday news conference, Mr. Reynolds said that upon learning of the "despicable" Foley messages last Friday, "I immediately began to work for his resignation." That conflicts with Speaker Hastert's account. "I think Foley resigned almost immediately upon the outbreak of this information, and so we really didn't have a chance to ask him to resign," Mr. Hastert has said.

But Mr. Reynolds, in the interview, said, "I did not talk to Foley but I asked Kirk Fordham" -- then Mr. Reynolds's chief of staff -- "to go down and secure his resignation."

On Wednesday, Mr. Fordham resigned, saying that he had repeatedly urged the speaker's staff as far back as 2003 to stop Mr. Foley's inappropriately personal contacts with male pages. The speaker's office denied that claim.

Mr. Fordham's contention raises questions for Mr. Reynolds as well. While Mr. Reynolds insists he knew nothing until last spring, Republicans privately say they can't believe Mr. Fordham wouldn't have made Mr. Reynolds aware as well. "Monday morning quarterbacking is great," Mr. Reynolds quipped.

At a news conference, Mr. Hastert yesterday took his own swipe back at Mr. Fordham. "It's interesting, Kirk Fordham also said, just about three or four days ago, that he worked for this guy for 10 years and he never did anything wrong."

Even before the Foley scandal broke, nonpartisan handicappers were predicting the Democrats could net the 15 seats needed for a House majority, and perhaps gain the six needed to take the Senate. The news came on the last day of a Congressional term that was unusually unproductive and contentious.

For example, the Republican-led Congress rejected the president's top-priority Social Security and immigration proposals. It also weathered corruption scandals that forced out the majority leader, Tom DeLay.

Now the Foley affair is providing new grist for Democrats as well as a controversy that voters can easily understand. "If you had a teacher [engaged in inappropriate contact with] a high school student, and the principal knew, and they had taken no action, what would happen to both the teacher and the principal once word got out?" asks Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, Mr. Reynolds's counterpart as head of House Democrats' campaign committee. "Well, that's how the American people see this."

The Republican leaders' sniping at each other, meanwhile, keeps the story alive, even for far-removed Republican members back home campaigning. "The more the spotlight shines on the dysfunction in Congress, that makes it very hard for these members to change the subject," says Amy Walter, who analyzes House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

The Foley fallout is especially dangerous, Ms. Walter adds, for incumbents already under clouds of their own. One is Pennsylvania Rep. Don Sherwood, who stars in his own campaign ad asking voters' forgiveness for an extramarital affair. Republicans now expect to lose the seat Mr. Foley gave up, which was considered fairly safe until last week.

On Monday night, a group of House Republicans held a strategy conference call to brainstorm over how to respond to the Foley situation. Though he's in charge of the Republican House campaigns, Mr. Reynolds didn't phone in, as he was busy with his own race. But participation was high. "I guarantee you it was the largest one of these we've ever had," said Republican Rep. Patrick McHenry of North Carolina.

Rep. Judy Biggert of Illinois suggested every member contact the parents of the pages they'd sponsored, to provide reassurance and perhaps learn of other problems. "We seem to be forgetting that this is all about the children. We keep talking about who did what to whom, and who's covering up," she said yesterday in an interview. Mrs. Biggert says she has reached the mothers of three of the five pages she has sponsored, and none reported problems, only delight with the program.

Republicans have also discussed deflecting the scandal by talking up youth programs and education initiatives. Those issues were the focus this week when Reps. Reynolds, John Sweeney of New York, and Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania had campaign visits from First Lady Laura Bush, who remains hugely popular with voters. And Republicans have talked about surrounding themselves with children in public events -- just as Mr. Reynolds did at his Monday news conference.

As Mr. Reynolds prepared the party for the fall campaign, he took credit for an election strategy that had Republicans emphasizing local issues, and the federal funds they've brought home. That was to help them overcome the hostile national climate.

But now Mr. Reynolds's "all-politics-is-local" strategy is overwhelmed by the page scandal. That's particularly true in his own race. His district is a western New York stretch of suburbs, small towns and farms from Buffalo nearly to Rochester. It's traditionally Republican but less so as manufacturing job losses have unsettled voters. His rival is Republican-turned-Democrat Jack Davis, a 73-year-old businessman who took 44% of the vote against Mr. Reynolds two years ago, and says he will spend $2 million on this race.

On the Defensive

Several links to Mr. Foley have Mr. Reynolds on the defensive. He talked the reluctant congressman into running for a seventh term -- at a time when critics say he may have been aware of suspicions surrounding Mr. Foley. "I don't recall if I had a conversation with him before or after I learned about the overly-friendly emails," he said in an interview yesterday.

After learning of the emails 52-year-old Mr. Foley sent to the 16-year-old, the campaign contributed $5,000 to Mr. Foley, according to campaign finance documents. Once it was clear the Floridian likely was safe for re-election, Mr. Reynolds accepted $100,000 from Mr. Foley for his National Republican Congressional Committee coffers.

Mr. Reynolds's now-departed chief of staff, Mr. Fordham, has said that, as a friend, he counseled his former boss Mr. Foley prior to the congressman's resignation Friday. Mr. Reynolds has said he wasn't aware of his chief of staff's role.

Even as a seasoned politician, Mr. Reynolds is tested by the recent events. "Ah, politics is what it is," he says. He's been at it for a long time. Starting as a town councilman at 23, Mr. Reynolds moved on to the Erie county legislature, then the New York state assembly, where he was the Republican minority leader. He was elected to Congress in 1998.

Mr. Reynolds was immediately marked as a comer among House Republicans. Party leaders put him on the prestigious tax-writing Ways and Means Committee. He raised significant sums for the party, and for Mr. Bush's 2000 campaign. Nearly four years ago, he was elected to chair the National Republican Congressional Committee, where he seemed to work closely with Mr. Hastert. "Not bad for a kid from Springfield," he said on the drive to another campaign event last month.

On the recent campaign trip, Mr. Reynolds proudly said at one point, "I am a member of the House Republican leadership." But at Monday's news conference, he took a different tone when a reporter challenged him on why, as a leader, he didn't do more to confront Mr. Foley earlier.

"I did due diligence by talking to the speaker" in the spring, he reiterated. "I heard something, I took it to my supervisor." Asked if Mr. Hastert should have done more, he replied, "That's a question you have to ask the speaker."

Yesterday, two other House leaders who had likewise laid responsibility for the Foley issue on the speaker -- Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and Roy Blunt of Missouri -- issued press releases of support for him as calls for the speaker's departure built. Mr. Reynolds did not.

Hastert Takes Responsibility For Page Scandal, But Refuses To Resign (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - House Speaker Dennis Hastert and the House ethics committee moved Thursday to contain political damage from the congressional page scandal, mixing words of contrition with promises to complete a bipartisan ethics investigation within weeks.

Hastert made it clear that he wouldn't resign.

Republican ranks appeared to be firming behind him after days of second-guessing and finger-pointing over whether he and other leaders in the House of Representatives had acted quickly and responsibly enough after learning that former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., had exchanged inappropriate emails with teenage congressional pages. Foley resigned last week.

Barring explosive new revelations, Hastert seemed likely to avoid being forced out before Nov. 7's midterm elections. A new Pew Research Center poll showed that the scandal so far isn't moving voters.

Hastert, in a news conference from his Illinois district that was televised nationwide, said he was "deeply sorry" about any actions that might have jeopardized the safety of congressional pages and that he was taking responsibility, and he added "the buck stops here."

He also expressed optimism that Republicans would maintain control of the House and would choose him to remain their leader. "I'm going to run and presumably win in this election, and when we do I expect to run for speaker," he said.

Hastert maintained that he never attempted to cover up anything related to Foley, but he acknowledged mistakes. "Could we have done it better? Could the page board have handled it better? In retrospect, probably yes," he said.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and third-ranking House Republican Roy Blunt, R-Mo., who a day earlier were critical of Hastert's handling of the matter, issued strong statements of support for him Thursday. "I believe strongly he should remain our speaker," Boehner said. Said Blunt: "We all now realize that this terrible situation could have been handled differently. We are all upset; we are all horrified; but we all stand together with our speaker."

In Florida, Rep. Clay Shaw, a Republican locked in a tight re-election contest in a district beside Foley's, also voiced support for Hastert.

On Capitol Hill, the House ethics committee had a closed-door hearing on the matter. Then its members held a news conference to outline the panel's coming investigation into what lawmakers and their staff knew about Foley's involvement with pages, when they knew it and what they did with the information. Committee Chairman Rep. Doc Hastings, R-Wash., said the panel already had approved nearly four dozen subpoenas for documents and testimony.

Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., the panel's top Democrat, said of the investigation's expected timeline: "We are looking at weeks, not months." But neither he nor Hastings would commit to producing a report before the elections.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., rejected a plan by Hastert to bring in former FBI director Louis Freeh to investigate the page program. A Pelosi spokesman said the minority leader was concerned that the move could interrupt the ethics investigation and become a public relations ploy.

The Pew Research Center poll suggested that the Foley scandal isn't moving voters much. Before the news broke, voters were telling Pew surveyors that they preferred Democrats to Republicans by 51-38 percent, and after the scandal broke they said the same by 50-37 percent. The differences are statistically insignificant. The Iraq war dominated voters' thinking, not Foley. The survey was conducted Sept. 21-Oct. 4.

ABC News reported Thursday that three more former pages had contacted the network to say that Foley had made advances to them. They weren't identified.

House Republican leaders maintain that they had no knowledge of sexually explicit instant messages between Foley and former pages until ABC News published them last week.

Kirk Fordham, a former chief of staff to Foley and to Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., charged Wednesday that he'd told Hastert's chief of staff three years ago that Foley's relationships with pages could be a problem. Hastert's chief of staff denies that.

Timothy Heaphy, Fordham's attorney, said the FBI interviewed his client Thursday, though he declined to say what was discussed. Heaphy said Fordham stood by his statement that he'd warned Hastert's staff three years ago: "He's not backtracking from that at all."

House Republicans Move To Back Hastert (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Michael Abramowitz

Republicans are calculating that the smartest way to survive the Mark Foley sex scandal is to rally around House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and hope that no new evidence surfaces before Election Day that shows GOP leaders could have done more to prevent the congressman from preying on young male pages, according to several GOP lawmakers and strategists.

The White House and top House Republicans remain deeply nervous that the scandal will hurt them politically, and that additional information will come out contradicting statements by Hastert and others that they were unaware of Foley's sexual messages to underage boys, the lawmakers and officials said.

For now, they said, it would be politically disastrous for Republicans to oust Hastert because it would be viewed as akin to a public admission of guilt in the scandal, as well as a pre-election victory that would buoy Democrats and help their turnout efforts.

"Calls for resignation are just inappropriate," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Tex.). "I would be absolutely shocked if the facts led us to that he knew more than he says he knew."

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) said every Republican lawmaker is rejecting calls from some conservative leaders to oust Hastert. "You are seeing a rally-around-the-speaker effort more than anything else," he said.

Several GOP lawmakers in tough races said voters are not reacting as harshly to the scandal as they first feared, buying Hastert even more room to save his job. Still, lawmakers are privately furious with how Hastert and other leaders have handled the scandal. It has created tension among GOP leaders who have sometimes viewed each other suspiciously since House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) took over after the resignation of Tom DeLay (R-Tex.). And many expect that the worst is still to come.

Top advisers to Hastert have accused Boehner of undermining the speaker's campaign to save his job. They pointed to Boehner's comments earlier in the week that it was Hastert's responsibility to fully investigate charges that Foley was making improper contact with underage boys. "That still stings," said one top adviser, who believed that the remark "was pretty close" to an insurrection.

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Boehner, said his boss was "in no way trying to blame Hastert. It was merely a description" of responsibility for the page program, which the speaker's office technically oversees.

Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Hastert, played down alleged tensions. "We are all sticking together through this. This has been a tough time for the House Republican majority, and we are going to make it through," he said.

A top Boehner adviser said the majority leader wanted to make it clear he is not to blame for the leadership's handling of allegations against Foley. "This has opened up and made more obvious some managerial problems in the speaker's office," the adviser said. Boehner has made it clear to colleagues that he plans to run for speaker if Hastert steps down or for minority leader if Republicans lose the House in November.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), in a phone call to Hastert this week, told him that critical comments Blunt made about Hastert were taken out of context.

"Those who are trying to create the appearance of disunity between myself and the speaker should know: There is not, and has not been, any daylight between the speaker and me," Blunt said in a statement yesterday.

Even if some GOP leaders turn on him, Hastert has a very powerful ally in President Bush. White House aides are nervous that the controversy has clouded, at least for now, Bush's effort to try to shape the midterm elections around the issue of terrorism.

But they are warning against a quick ouster of Hastert. Bush called Hastert last night to offer support and to thank him for his public statement taking responsibility for the situation, a White House spokeswoman said.

This approach comes as a sharp contrast to the administration's handling of the controversy in 2002 over Sen. Trent Lott's comments about then-Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) -- which cost Lott (Miss.) his post as Senate GOP leader. In Lott's case, Bush was quick to nudge him out of power. The president, however, feels deeply indebted to Hastert, who has pushed through his agenda and has quietly provided advice on how to deal with a restive Republican Congress.

Still, many Republicans accused Hastert of badly bungling the political fallout of the Foley scandal and waiting until yesterday to take responsibility and decisive action to investigate the matter.

"I don't think anyone has handled this particularly well," said a top House Republican, who requested anonymity in order to speak candidly. Hastert and other leaders "are having to focus on staying clear of this scandal individually, and not thinking about reelecting people."

Others complained that Hastert's blame-the-media-and-Democrats strategy looks odd when conservatives are leading the charge for his resignation.

Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.), who faces one of the toughest reelection fights in the country, said lawmakers will stand by Hastert -- at least until all the facts are known. "He is not the kind of guy you would think would condone this kind of behavior," he said. "Calling for someone's resignation is simply a political stunt if you don't have all the facts."

DENNIS HASTERT SHOULD RESIGN as speaker of the House of Representatives. Not necessarily because he failed to act quickly when shown evidence suggesting that Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) was abusing his power with teenagers — not all the details are known, though the ones that are don't look good. No, the Illinois Republican should resign because he's an unimaginative politician and an uninspired legislator. Unfortunately, these days that just makes him a typical congressional Republican.

At his job-preserving news conference Thursday, Hastert said, "The buck stops here," then proceeded to blame some of this Republican scandal on the Democratic Party. "I haven't done anything wrong, obviously," he added.

That sound you hear is Harry Truman rolling over in his grave. Still, it was an improvement over the speaker's contention Monday that critiquing his oversight amounted to nothing more than "woulda, coulda, shoulda." To repeat: Even disregarding the well-documented rumors of Foley's unhealthy obsession with young interns dating to at least 1995, and accepting Hastert's insistence that his office first heard about Foley's misbehavior last fall, the speaker had more than enough information to launch an investigation. Instead, he was more interested in protecting his party's fortunes than the safety of minors.

Is that reason enough for Hastert to resign? Perhaps. But let's give Hastert the benefit of the doubt, on the principle that it's unfair to judge a man for a single mistake. Looking at his record only makes the case for his resignation stronger.

Start with his laugh-out-loud assertion Thursday that the Republican Party has been "holding the line on spending." From 1999, when Hastert was elected speaker, to 2005, non-defense discretionary spending increased 34%, according to the Heritage Foundation. Pork-barrel line items have grown exponentially on Hastert's watch, and ballyhooed attempts at reform have largely fizzled. Instead of trying to prevent his colleagues from raiding the public purse, Hastert has saved his scorn for judges who authorize the FBI to search the offices of fellow lawmakers charged with crimes.

The same Republican Party that swept into a House majority 12 years ago amid fire-breathing promises to clean house and inject new blood is now led by a 19-year veteran whose oldest son is a lobbyist.

On policy, Hastert's no better. He's presided over the House's becoming a fever swamp of immigration rhetoric that even some Bush administration officials see as xenophobic and damaging. He has suggested that New Orleans might be better off "bulldozed." And he has allowed the House to become a rubber stamp for the Bush administration's expansion of executive-branch power.

If he has a compelling vision for the nation, or frankly any vision at all, it has escaped our attention. The 109th Congress can't do any more harm, thankfully. But Hastert shouldn't head the 110th.

Hastert Career Has Milestones In Misfortune (USAT)

By William M. Welch

USA Today, October 6, 2006

He's been called the accidental speaker.

Dennis Hastert, the Republican speaker of the House of Representatives, is a quiet, hulking Midwesterner who rose to power over the misfortune and missteps of fellow Republicans.

And just as a colleague's sex scandal propelled him into the job, a sex-related scandal involving another House Republican has threatened his hold on power.

It was one week ago that Rep. Mark Foley resigned his seat under pressure from fellow Republicans amid reports that he had sent overtly sexual messages to a teenage male congressional page.

Since that day, Hastert has been besieged by the news media and been the target of finger-pointing by other Republicans — among them Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York — who said they had tried to bring the Foley problem to his attention well before last week.

On Thursday, Hastert, 64, returned to his district office in Batavia, Ill. — a conservative, far-western suburb of Chicago — for a news conference in which he defended his handling of the matter.

Hastert accepted responsibility but insisted he had done what he should — if not all that he might have — to end Foley's inappropriate contacts with the high school boys working in Congress.

“I am deeply sorry this has happened,” Hastert said. “When Congress found out about the explicit messages, Republicans dealt with it immediately, and the culprit was gone. We are now trying to correct the problem.”

Known to friends as “Denny,” Hastert is a former high school wrestling coach who has held the highest constitutional job in Congress longer than anyone since Massachusetts Democrat Thomas “Tip” O'Neill left the post in 1987 after 10 years.

Nevertheless, Hastert has been largely unknown to average Americans. A CBS poll in April 2005 found that only 13% had an opinion about Hastert, good or bad — far less than others who have held the job, such as O'Neill and Hastert's predecessor, Newt Gingrich.

He has never been comfortable in front of cameras or reporters. He appears more at ease chatting with blue-collar workers at a tool-and-die factory in his district than publicly representing his party in Washington. Rather than attending to the Washington social circuit, Hastert goes home to Illinois every weekend, where he tinkers with old cars and his 1954 fire engine.

Yet throughout his adult life, Hastert has been a successful organizer to whom colleagues eventually turned for leadership.

As a coach, Hastert turned a start-up high-school program into a winner, and organized coaches of the minor sport into a national association, which he led. Married to a colleague — his wife Jean was a physical education teacher at the same high school — Hastert developed a taste for politics and ran for the Illinois Legislature in 1980.

He finished third in the primary. When the winning candidate fell mortally ill, party leaders turned to Hastert to take the nomination. He won the election and spent six years in Springfield.

When his congressman was fatally stricken with cancer in 1986, party leaders placed Hastert's name on the ballot. He won narrowly, with 52% of the vote, but has never had a tough race since.

By the time Republicans won a majority in 1994, Hastert had already become a confidant of the party's leadership. He was a floor leader in the push to pass the GOP's "Contract with America" early in 1995, and he managed the campaign of Texan Tom DeLay to become House GOP whip.

DeLay immediately made Hastert his chief deputy, putting Hastert in position to count noses, and twist arms, on every important vote the House took. He had a chummy approach — his bear-like arm around a colleague was usually more welcome than the tough-guy approach that earned DeLay the nickname "The Hammer."

When Gingrich quit after the 1998 elections shrunk the GOP's majority, the speaker's job fell into Hastert's lap. Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., had been selected for the job, but before he could take it, he quit Congress, admitting he had had an extramarital affair.

"He was just handed the keys," said National Journal's Hotline editor Chuck Todd. "You sort of wonder if that's coming home to roost."

Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., credits Hastert with delivering the tough news to DeLay and two other GOP congressmen when scandal meant they had to resign, and says he's taken charge now.

"I believe he probably gets it behind him now," LaHood said. "He did what he should have done two or three days ago."

The Speaker's Feint (WP)

HOUSE SPEAKER J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) yesterday came up with yet another ploy to shield himself and his colleagues from scrutiny while pretending to do the opposite.

The issue is how House leaders dealt with warnings that Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had sent inappropriate e-mail to a teenage page. The speaker announced with considerable satisfaction that he hopes to appoint an independent "person of high caliber" -- but not to do what is obviously needed, which is investigate whether the House botched the response, thereby endangering more pages. Instead, Mr. Hastert said, he wants someone "to advise us on the page program." He floated the idea of naming former FBI director Louis J. Freeh but pulled back when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) wouldn't go along.

Let's save the speaker, and whoever his eminent person turns out to be, some time by offering advice right now: No congressman should harass pages. No one should send them what White House press secretary Tony Snow dismissed as "naughty e-mails." And if there's even a hint that one of your colleagues is doing so, or wants to, don't brush it off. "The buck stops here," the speaker said yesterday, declaring that "we're taking responsibility." But announcing that doesn't make it so.

Yesterday's gambit followed an earlier tack, which was to turn the matter over to the FBI. The FBI has a role to play in determining whether criminal violations occurred, but the appropriate constraints on the bureau -- in the scope of its investigation and its ability to share information with the House and the public -- make it an ill-suited vehicle "for us to try to find out what happened," as the speaker put it. Meanwhile, responding to the uproar with finger-pointing suggestions that the other side leaked the matter, as Mr. Hastert did yesterday, isn't going to fly. Would he be happier if the information hadn't come out?

The House ethics committee's announcement yesterday of an investigation is a development to be taken more seriously. As we've said previously, there are legitimate questions about the panel's ability to handle something with this much political sensitivity, given Republican efforts to undermine its power and independence and given its dysfunction during the Abramoff scandal. That's why an independent investigator -- a "person of high caliber," in the speaker's phrase -- would have been the best way to ensure a thorough investigation and unsparing conclusions.

That apparently wasn't seriously considered, though, so now the ethics committee's integrity is on the line. It should resist calls for haste (including from Ms. Pelosi, who risks appearing more interested in electoral timelines than a thorough inquiry), but it also must work briskly and without regard for political fallout.

Path Is Risky For Gay GOP Politicians (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Jenny Jarvie

Months later, according to the acquaintance, when she offered to send him the photo, Foley looked anxious.

The intern, "male or female?" he inquired.

"Female" was the reply.

For most Republicans, being photographed in a compromising position with a young woman could be scandalous. But in the sometimes strained world of gay Republicans, it was an asset.

Foley resigned a week ago over revelations that he had engaged in sexually explicit online banter with male teenagers. And though it was the age of those House pages that forced his downfall and a criminal investigation, Foley's sexual orientation had been a huge political liability for him for years.

Gays hold many prominent positions in government and business in Washington. But in the GOP ranks, homosexuality is still politically risky. In fact, with the exception of the military, perhaps no institution in America has as strong a "don't ask, don't tell" approach as the Republican Party.

"Obviously, the far right has kind of got a stranglehold on the Republican Party," said Minnesota state Rep. Paul Koering, a Republican who came out publicly last year. "The very first time I ran, I literally almost made myself sick worrying about somebody finding out I was gay."

Congress has three openly gay members, one of them a Republican — Jim Kolbe of Arizona, who is retiring when this term ends. Kolbe acknowledged his sexual orientation in 1996 after a gay magazine was about to "out" him for voting against government recognition of same-sex marriages.

Staffers from both parties say they think that several other Republican members of Congress are gay but, at least officially, in the closet.

"It's kind of like a secret society," said a gay former congressional staffer who, like others interviewed for this article, spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

One reason for the secrecy, gay Republicans say, is that their party has grown more hostile to gays in recent years. The trend began with the 2002 congressional election, when GOP leaders made the strategic decision to use religious conservative groups' opposition to gay marriage to turn out voters. For those groups, which consider homosexuality a deviant "lifestyle," few issues rile their membership more.

"While pro-homosexual activists like to claim that pedophilia is a completely distinct orientation from homosexuality, evidence shows a disproportionate overlap between the two," Family Research Council President Tony Perkins said this week in a message to supporters.

David Catania, who serves on the District of Columbia city council and is gay, said he left the Republican Party over its opposition to gay marriage. He expressed sympathy for his gay friends who remained active Republicans.

"They've hitched their stars to the party, hoping to hunker down and ride out the Taliban-esque wing, hoping their views will come back into the mainstream," Catania said. "It's got to be very demoralizing for them."

"It's difficult for them," the staffer said. "For the most part, they grew up in Republican households and families. It's like a religion to them. They may even be out to their families. But they are not out professionally."

Early in Foley's congressional career, friends and associates say, he took measures to deflect attention from his sexual orientation. He showed up at parties with a woman on his arm, made references to girlfriends, and used photos of himself with his sister and niece in campaign literature. Many voters assumed the photo showed him with a wife and daughter.

In Florida, Foley had a host of glamorous and wealthy female companions, including Petra Levin, a former model and philanthropist, and Nancy Jean Davis, the Miami heir to the McArthur Dairy fortune.

"He always had a knockout woman on his arm," said Jack Furnari, president of the Boca Raton Republican Club. "People would say, 'See that woman Mark was with?' and chuckle. It was all a show."

At times and in certain circles, however, Foley was less reticent about being seen with his longtime male partner, friends and associates say. In Palm Beach, the luxury winter resort island that some describe as fiscally conservative but socially liberal, Foley would arrive at fundraisers and galas with his companion, a local dermatologist. But they always sat at separate tables.

Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Republican Party of Palm Beach County, who says he saw Foley a month ago at a restaurant with Foley's companion as well as his sister and her husband, said the congressman's sexuality was not an issue in Palm Beach.

"Nobody cared," Dinerstein said. "Liberals think all Republicans are stupid bigots, but we knew. It just wasn't talked about. We cared about his political skills, his legislative skills."

Rand Hoch, former chairman of the Democratic Party of Palm Beach County and openly gay, remembers speaking at length with Foley in 1997, when some gay newspapers were outing public officials.

"I tried and tried to persuade him to come out," Hoch said. "But ultimately he thought that at that time in Washington, D.C., and nationally, an up-and-coming Republican politician could not be openly gay."

Foley was a tireless socializer, a trait that served him well politically. He won plaudits from charities for his willingness to help raise money, and he earned the loyalty of fellow Republicans in Washington and Florida for his ability to shake donor trees in Hollywood and elsewhere.

In the House's tightknit Republican caucus, he rose to the rank of deputy whip, a junior member of the leadership. In 2003, Foley was considered the GOP front-runner to succeed then-Sen. Bob Graham (D-Fla.), who had decided to run for president.

Though Foley had a campaign fund worth millions, the White House moved aggressively to recruit a different candidate, then-Housing and Urban Development Secretary Mel Martinez. Party strategists worried about what a Foley candidacy would mean for President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign in the state that had decided the election four years earlier.

Foley, it seemed, had gone as far in politics as he could as a gay Republican. And in a way, acquaintances said, the failure of his Senate bid appears to have freed him to be somewhat more open about his homosexuality. For instance, he began appearing more often at social events with his partner; if you invited one to dinner, socialites learned, you invited both.

For gay Republicans, staffers say, discretion is the key. And Foley, it seems, had trouble being discreet.

In Washington, he was known as someone who liked to stay out late. And at parties, he did not hide his interest in young men.

Friends and colleagues urged Foley to take steps to avoid scrutiny. He resigned his membership at a popular gay gym on the advice of his former longtime political advisor and chief of staff Kirk Fordham, according to one former Capitol Hill staffer.

Fordham also was known to follow Foley to parties, in some cases intervening to stop the congressman from inviting partygoers back to his apartment.

"Kirk told him to knock it off," said the former staffer, who is a Democrat.

In recent days, gay political staffers and activists have expressed anger with Foley.

"Thanks a lot, Mark," said Catania, the District of Columbia councilman. "You weren't any help to us when you were in the closet, and you've really hurt us now.

"It leaves the impression that we're all predators."

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), one of the two openly gay Democratic members of Congress, expressed concern this week that the Foley scandal could lead to a "real purge of gays in the Republican Party."

"Republicans," Frank said in an interview posted on TheAdvocate.com, the website of the Boston-based gay newspaper, "will now be more nervous having gay people in positions of power."

GOP Pushes Issues To Deflect Fallout (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Ralph Z. Hallow

DOJ_NMG_0076371

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

Republican lawmakers inside the Beltway are using a multipronged strategy to limit fallout from the Foley scandal: Focus on national security, keep congressional races on local issues and blame Democrats -- even operatives of former President Bill Clinton.

"We will do the same thing we have been doing -- spending tens of millions of dollars reminding voters this election is about local issues and local personalities and not a national referendum," said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Mr. Forti said average voters want to know where candidates stand on immigration and taxes, and they aren't daily bombarded in their local newspapers with dire predictions for Republicans' chances of keeping control of Congress in November.

"We built these House races in 2002 and 2004 on these issues because we knew President Bush wasn't going to have coattails," Mr. Forti said.

New polls, taken after Rep. Mark Foley of Florida resigned last week amid charges he sent sexually explicit e-mails to an underage male congressional page, show about half of likely voters said that recent disclosures will be very or extremely important in their vote next month.

One former senior administration official who remains close with top Bush advisers said the White House strategy is clear:

"We've got to start going back on the offense, doing what the president did in September, when he began to deliver a series of speeches on national security and the war on terror."

Republicans, the official said, will continue to address the scandal by saying "this is not endemic to the Republican Party, this is one bad guy ... and he's gone. Then, we pivot, say enough's enough, it's under investigation, we're not saying any more about it. ... If Democrats try to localize what is a national story, they do it at their peril."

At the White House, the strategy is simply to not talk about it, with press secretary Tony Snow telling reporters yesterday, "I will be maddeningly but consistently nonresponsive beyond what you are about to hear."

But outside the Beltway, some state Republican leaders say the party remains in disarray, with no cohesive message on how to deal with the daily sordid developments and keep the races from becoming a national indictment on the party.

"We haven't really seen much of a plan" for how to deal with the scandal, said Saul Anuzis, chairman of the Michigan Republican Party.

The state leader said there was an early talking-points e-mail to state leaders from the House Republican Conference, but that simply pointed out that the Democrat-controlled House in 1983 "was embroiled in scandal after two Members of Congress were found to have engaged in inappropriate sexual relations with teenage congressional pages."

Celinda Lake, a top Democratic pollster, said if Mr. Bush's job-approval rating remains in the 30s, then Republicans have a near-zero chance of holding the House and will probably lose the Senate as well.

But, said Miss Lake, an approval rating up around 44 percent will make it more difficult for Democrats to make the net gain of 15 seats to take control of the House and six seats to take over the Senate.

Republican analysts say the national party has been slow off the mark to deal with the developing Foley story.

Asked whether there was a plan to communicate with the nation outside the Beltway, Republican pollster Frank Luntz said, "No, and that's the problem."

"Back in the days of [former House Majority Leader] Tom DeLay, there would have been an immediate conference call, not to defend the position of the leadership, but to articulate what needs to be said from this point forward. There would have been sample releases, there would have been sample talking points, there would have been an op-ed produced -- none of that's happening," Mr. Luntz said.

The silence from Republican Party leaders has given Democrats locked in tight races across the country an edge. For instance, in Minnesota's 6th Congressional District race, Democrat Patty Wetterling, a children's-safety advocate, rushed a TV ad onto the air on Tuesday calling for a criminal investigation of Mr. Foley.

On Wednesday, Mrs. Wetterling, who says in the ad that the Republican Party "knowingly ignored the welfare of children to protect their power," was chosen to the give the national Democratic response to tomorrow's weekly radio address by Mr. Bush.

Democrats, who for a year floundered to find a message to run on this year, say the Foley scandal illustrates that the Republicans are preoccupied with protecting their congressional majority at the expense of public interest, even the safety of young pages.

John Zogby, a Democratic pollster, said this scandal has legs because it is far more understandable than normal Washington scandals over policy or White House access.

"The bottom line is that married voters, parents and grandparents, are the ones who vote for Republicans, and there's damage out there, real damage."

He said that his recent polling shows a high number of evangelicals undecided, "and frankly, if they're undecided, they may not vote. ... Voters not showing up could be devastating."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, who some conservatives have said should resign over his handling of the scandal, on Wednesday suggested that operatives aligned with Mr. Clinton knew about the Foley accusations and might have been behind the disclosures in the closing weeks before the Nov. 7 elections.

The Illinois Republican offered no proof, and yesterday said he was merely citing press reports.

Democrats Use Foley Scandal To Hit GOP (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

The Democratic Party is using the unfolding scandal involving Rep. Mark Foley to bash Republican candidates and raise support for their party, arguing that Republicans have too much power and mishandled the situation.

From Virginia to New Mexico, Democrats have demanded the resignation of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois and challenged Republicans to return money donated by Mr. Foley, who resigned last week after it was reported that he had sent sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage boys in the congressional page program. Meanwhile, the Democratic National Committee cited the scandal in two e-mails to supporters this week -- one asking for volunteers, the other asking for money.

In yesterday's fund-raising e-mail, DNC Chairman Howard Dean said Democratic operatives were ready to defeat Florida's Mr. Foley and Republicans long before the scandal, but stressed that "Democrats are fighting in important races up and down the ballot on the idea that the culture of corruption and cover-up just won't stand up against a message of real change."

The seemingly boldest attack on Republicans so far has come from House Democratic candidate Patty Wetterling in Minnesota, who began airing television ads contending Republican leaders "admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman," and "knowingly ignored the welfare of children to protect their own power." Mrs. Wetterling, a child safety advocate, was chosen by Democrats to deliver their weekly radio address tomorrow.

House Republican leaders have denied covering up the scandal. After resigning, Mr. Foley checked into a rehabilitation program for alcohol abuse, leaving Republican leaders scrambling to fend off critics who accuse them of covering up his behavior.

Mr. Hastert said yesterday he was "deeply sorry" the situation occurred, called for several investigations and a review of the page program, but denied any wrongdoing.

Democratic leaders quickly slammed him.

"The problem today isn't the page program," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "The problem today is that House Republican leaders had evidence of a sexual predator in their ranks and chose to cover it up instead of choosing to protect these children."

Jonathan Collegio, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, counted 33 House campaigns so far in which the Democratic candidate has either called for Mr. Hastert to resign, urged the Republican candidate to return Mr. Foley's donations or made politically charged statements about the scandal.

He called such efforts "the type of election year antics that voters can see right through," and will reject.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee this week blasted key Republican senators for refusing to acknowledge a Republican cover-up and lashed out at others, such as Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, for campaign contributions made by Mr. Foley.

Mr. Allen's office donated the amount Mr. Foley had given them to a Virginia nonprofit group that protects children.

New Mexico's Attorney General Patricia Madrid, a House Democratic candidate, called for Mr. Hastert to resign, then demanded her Republican opponent, Rep. Heather A. Wilson, join her -- a tactic used by other Democrats.

"They're using it to their benefit," said Jennifer Duffy, political analyst for the Cook Political Report. "Republicans would, too."

She warned it's premature to say the scandal will put Democrats over the top in the midterm elections because "voters have a fairly short attention span."

In the Loop (WP)

By Al Kamen

The controversy over whether embattled House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) should remain in office has divided hard-line anti-pedophiles such as conservatives Richard Viguerie , David Bossie and the Washington Times, who demanded Hastert's head, from moderate anti-pedophiles such as President Bush and Vice President Cheney and some talk-show types, who can better appreciate the larger implications of this matter.

One problem for the hard-liners is that there is no mechanism to force Hastert to quit, to give him the standard option of resigning or being fired. The House is not in session, so there's no way to have a vote until lawmakers return Nov. 9, after the election. (Bush could call them back in a true emergency, as he did in the Terri Schiavo case, but that doesn't appear likely.) What's more, House experts say there's no historical guide -- there has not been a vote to kick out a speaker in at least a century, maybe ever. (There is a provision that if the speaker doesn't show up for three days, the chair can be deemed vacant and a motion would be in order for the election of a new speaker.) Were the House around, presumably someone who voted for Hastert last time could call for a new vote.

One reason this situation may be unprecedented, a House official said, could be that a speaker, who technically doesn't have to be a member of the House, is only chosen for one Congress, or two years. Usually it would take someone a year or so to really mess up, and then their term would be almost up anyway. In the past, the House could "usually wait them out," he said.

Signs To Say Negron Will Get Foley Votes (AP-Y)

Supervisors of elections in former Rep. Mark Foley's district may post signs telling voters that Joe Negron is the Republican candidate even though it will be Foley's name on the ballot, Florida elections officials said Thursday.

An e-mail from the State Division of Elections to election supervisors in counties that are part of Foley's district said that "preferably, the notice would be placed in every voting booth" and in absentee ballot mailings. The suggestion angered some Democrats who said it gives Negron unfair help.

Counties do not need to post such notices, but the agency sent out its recommendations after being asked by local elections officials, spokeswoman Jenny Nash said.

Foley had been heavily favored to beat Democrat Tim Mahoney in November before a scandal involving inappropriate messages to young pages led to his high-profile resignation. Republican leaders picked Negron, a state legislator, to replace him, but it was too late to put his name on the ballot.

State Democratic Party Chairwoman Karen Thurman sent a letter to state officials noting that state laws prohibit signs from being posted at polling places.

Nash said that the clarifying notices were meant to help voters, not any particular candidate, and that such notices have been used in past elections when a candidate has been replaced after ballots have already been printed.

Gov. Jeb Bush said the move would help alleviate confusion.

"Joe Negron is, by law, the candidate," Bush said. "You can't have his name on the ballot because of state law but to inform people is more than fair. ... To provide information is more than appropriate."

Foley Foe Was Long Shot, Now Has Big Shot (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. -- As Republican leaders in Washington work to contain the Mark Foley scandal, Democratic challenger Tim Mahoney is hoping it will propel him into Congress.

Mr. Mahoney has gone from long shot to strong contender because of Mr. Foley's resignation after news reports that he sent sexually explicit communications to teenagers who were House pages. It is a dramatic reversal for a political newcomer who had trailed Mr. Foley in most polls despite spending nearly $400,000 of his own money on the race.

But while Democrats are celebrating the likely gain of a solidly Republican House seat, the choice of Mr. Mahoney illustrates the ideological compromises the party is making to retake the House. A self-described conservative Democrat, Mr. Mahoney is a former Republican who didn't switch his party affiliation until 2005. He describes Ronald Reagan as a political hero and himself as a "conservative Christian." He talks about the need to reduce abortions, though he doesn't favor banning them. Mr. Mahoney owns a gun and says he supports the right to firearms and doesn't want stricter gun laws. He also favors eliminating the estate tax on family farms and securing the nation's borders better.

Whatever his ideological leanings, there is little question that Mr. Mahoney's campaign slogan -- "to restore integrity to public office" -- was prescient. "My message hasn't changed. I was talking about morals and values and what's wrong with Washington a year ago," he says in an interview after a lunch-time campaign event here. "What's happened is that national events have caught up."

Aides to Mr. Mahoney say the campaign's fund raising has surged in the days since the Foley scandal broke. High-profile Democrats such as former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner are showing up to campaign with Mr. Mahoney.

Republicans aren't conceding the seat, and Joe Negron, the Republican state representative appointed to succeed Mr. Foley in the race, is pledging a fight. Mr. Negron's nascent campaign received a boost Tuesday when Florida's Division of Elections recommended that election supervisors in this affluent, Republican-leaning district post notices in voting booths and send letters to absentee voters indicating that votes for Mr. Foley count for Mr. Negron. Democrats are likely to challenge that recommendation in court since they are hoping to capitalize on the fact that Florida law requires Mr. Foley's name to stay on the ballot.

Still, strategists from both parties say Mr. Mahoney stands a better than even chance of winning the race, a sharp shift in electoral fortunes that is contributing to Democrats' optimism about taking the House next month.

Democrats need 15 seats to gain the majority, and have strong chances in three races once seen as firmly in Republican control. Besides the Foley seat, the others are those of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas, who resigned amid fund-raising investigations, and of Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio, who pleaded guilty to bribery charges and isn't running for re-election.

"Those three seats are gifts for the Democrats," says nonpartisan political analyst Stuart Rothenberg. "The Republicans have wrapped them up with nice wrapping paper, put bows on them, and handed them to the Democrats."

Mr. Negron disputes that analysis, saying Mr. Mahoney is a "liberal Democrat" out of step with the values of a district that has elected Republican congressmen for the past 25 years. With $600,000 left over from his previous campaigns, Mr. Negron expects to raise at least $400,000 more in the final weeks of the campaign. Florida Gov. Jeb Bush will campaign with him next week, the first of a series of visits by prominent Republicans designed to distance Mr. Negron from the Foley scandal. "This election is not a referendum on Mark Foley, even though Tim Mahoney wants it to be," Mr. Negron says in an interview.

Within hours of Mr. Negron's selection, the Republican National Committee sent out talking points that quoted from a negative appraisal of Mr. Mahoney's candidacy by Mr. Rothenberg, who in October 2005 described the Democratic challenger as "an unpolished second- or third-tier House candidate who is not yet prepared for a U.S. House race."

Mr. Rothenberg says candidates like Mr. Mahoney generally improve over time and added that he now has the opportunity to run a positive, issues-based campaign because the scandal removed his strongest opponent.

"He's not being compared to a veteran Republican who won with 70% of the vote anymore; now the implicit comparison is with a disgraced Republican congressman," Mr. Rothenberg says.

Mr. Mahoney is saying little publicly about the scandal. "People don't want their congressmen out there continuing to fan the flames of this salacious thing," he says.

Instead, the 50-year-old financier is playing up his business background and the fact that he isn't a career politician. He grew up in a large Irish-Catholic family in New Jersey that venerated John F. Kennedy, but became a strong supporter of Mr. Reagan after graduating from college. He made his fortune in finance, running a small investment-banking firm out of his house. The firm grew into an investment-banking and private-equity company called vFinance Inc., which has more than 200 employees and $1 billion in assets.

Last year, Mr. Mahoney was in Washington trying to build support for an effort to promote job creation in small and midsize firms. He found himself in the office of Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat leading the party's effort to win back the House, and was surprised when Mr. Emanuel asked him to run for Congress. "I thought he wanted a donation," Mr. Mahoney says.

These days, Mr. Mahoney wakes at 6 a.m. to devote a few hours to vFinance business before starting a full day of fund raisers and campaign events like a meeting with the local chapter of the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee, where he faced questions about Iran's nuclear program. He says he expects to raise at least $2 million dollars, with much of that money coming from Democrats outside Florida who are energized about winning a race once written off as hopeless.

Mr. Negron says Democrats can only win in this district by tying the race to Mr. Foley, but Mr. Mahoney says he has a different Republican target in mind. "George W. Bush's approval rating in our district is 33%," he notes. "Even Mark Foley was trying to run away from the president."

Area Republicans Won't Hesitate To Vote Foley/Negron (PALMBEACHP)

By Jennifer Sorentrue

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 6, 2006

If you listen to the political pundits or even some Washington Republicans, it's going to be an uphill battle for the GOP to convince voters that a mark on their ballot for former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley is really a vote for replacement candidate Joe Negron.

With less than five weeks for Negron to raise money and campaign before the Nov. 7 election, some have even said it could even be an impossible feat. Negron, a state representative from Stuart, was chosen by Republican Party officials to replace Foley, who resigned in disgrace.

"To vote for this candidate (Negron), you have to vote for Mark Foley. How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?" House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said in a radio interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity this week.

But an informal survey of a dozen Republicans in Foley's former congressional district Thursday shows the experts may be wrong. Despite the scandal, most still plan to check Foley's name when they go to the polls, according to unscientific results.

"To me, it's the person — Foley — not the Republican Party," Stuart resident Mary Emrick said, referring to allegations that Foley exchanged sexually explicit Internet messages with teenage boys.

"You can't condemn the whole party," said Emrick, who typically votes Republican and plans to vote for Negron by marking Foley's name on her ballot. "There are people everywhere, in every walk of life, doing things. I think it's just the person."

Like Emrick, all of those surveyed said despite the allegations against Foley, they would have no problem recognizing that a vote for Foley is actually a vote for Negron. However, some said they don't know enough about Negron and haven't made up their minds in the race.

Although some political observers have suggested the allegations may cause Republicans to stay home on election day, many of those surveyed said they still planned to vote Republican straight through their ballot.

"I will turn out," said Martin County resident Renee Nesbit. "I will vote.... I'll just go ahead and vote Foley/Negron."

Nesbit, 58, said that any Republican who shies away from voting in the race because of Foley's actions is "just not using their head."

"I think that's really immature," Nesbit said. "There are using emotions over intellect."

Foley's former district, which includes parts of eight counties, stretching from Wellington to Fort Pierce and west to Port Charlotte, voted 54 percent for President Bush in 2004.

It was seen as a safe GOP seat until Foley's resignation last week. Now, Negron is expected to face a difficult race against Democrat Tim Mahoney.

Martin County resident Kurt Schaeffler, 40, said he needs to know more about Negron before deciding whether to vote for him. He will likely wait until the last minute before making a decision in the race, he said.

"I don't know anything about the man," Schaeffler said. "He is jumping into a situation where he is behind the ball.... Up until this new enlightenment, as far as I could tell Mark Foley was in there, and he was doing a good job. I would have left him right there."

Like Schaeffler, Stuart resident Chip DuBois doesn't know anything about Negron, but he plans to vote for him. He said there's no way he would vote for Mahoney.

"I would vote for my dog instead of Mahoney," DuBois said. "I just don't like him."

Royal Palm Beach resident Dana Hepworth said Negron seemed "capable," but didn't think he had enough time to reach voters before the election.

Still, he plans to vote for Negron. Most voters who select Foley's name will be doing it because they want to vote Republican, Hepworth said.

"The focus now is on Mark Foley, not the issues at hand," said Hepworth, 55, a certified addictions counselor. "I think (Negron) is in a real difficult situation. I think that anyone that is going to be voting for Negron is going to be voting strictly Republican."

Wellington resident Susan Gordon also made up her mind. She says she'll check Foley's name "just because I want to see a Republican in office."

While all of the Republicans surveyed were familiar with the scandal surrounding Foley, several said they knew little about the party's candidate for the U.S. Senate — Katherine Harris, who received at least as much publicity in 2000 as Foley is now. Harris, now a congresswoman from Longboat Key, was Florida's secretary of state, responsible for overseeing the disputed presidential election between Bush and Al Gore.

Royal Palm Beach resident Suzy Crawford said she'll probably vote for every Republican on her ballot. Asked about Harris, she said, "Don't know anything about her. But a woman could probably do a better job."

Rep. Pelosi Envisions A Better-run House (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, October 5, 2006

Relishing the prospects of a triumph, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Thursday promised to restore integrity and civility to the House if voters put her party in control this fall.

"We'll turn the most closed and corrupt Congress into the most open and honest Congress," Pelosi, D-Calif., told The Associated Press in an interview.

She spoke five weeks before the midterm elections as the House ethics committee opened an investigation into an unfolding sex scandal that led to Rep. Mark Foley's resignation and calls for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., to step down.

"The only way you can make the change that needs to be made for our country — a new direction where we're there for the many and not the few — is to drain the swamp," said Pelosi, who is in line to be the nation's first female House speaker if Democrats ascend to power.

With Nov. 7 looming, an AP-Ipsos poll released Thursday found the majority of likely voters favoring Democrats to win control of the House and half of likely voters saying recent disclosures of corruption and scandal in Congress will be very or extremely important when they cast their vote.

Republicans are scrambling to try to stop the political bleeding that began last week when Foley resigned amid reports that he sent sexually explicit communications to teenage boys who once worked as House pages. That set off finger-pointing among House Republican leaders who were accused of failing to react quickly when they were warned of Foley's behavior.

Hastert spurned calls from the party's conservative base for his resignation. After days of cracks in support, House Republicans and others, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, rallied around the speaker. Still, some Republicans expressed fears that the scandal could cost the GOP the House.

In Idaho, Republican Rep. Mike Simpson said he was no longer confident that Republicans would retain power, a shift from a week ago when he was "fairly confident we were going to keep the majority." Now, he said, it's "a real tossup."

Republicans outside of Washington, meanwhile, chastised Democrats for criticizing House leaders while ignoring what Republicans called a long and tawdry history of Democratic impropriety and sex scandals.

"What we don't have to do is allow our friends on the left to lecture us on morality," former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., said at a party fundraiser in South Carolina. "There's a certain stench of hypocrisy."

On Capitol Hill, Pelosi expressed confidence that Democrats would gain the 15 seats they need to seize control of the House from Republicans who have ruled for a dozen years.

Should Democrats win, she promised they would approve rules to "break the link between lobbyists and legislation" and enact legislation adopting all the recommendations of the bipartisan commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. The party's agenda also includes raising the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour and cutting the student loan interest rate.

The Foley scandal, Pelosi said, cuts to the heart of Democrats' argument that a change in power is needed and resonates with voting groups that will be crucial to who wins on Nov. 7 — senior citizens and women.

"This is an issue, though, that just highlights so clearly the fact that they don't play by the rules," Pelosi said, questioning why Republican leaders did not notify the bipartisan committee that oversees the page program when questions about Foley's behavior first arose.

"You would think if you knew of something like this, your best defense is to inform the Democrat on the committee," Pelosi said. "But they just don't see it that way."

"What could have been going through their heads, where they have an over-50-year-old man making these overtures to a kid" who was under the responsibility of Congress, Pelosi asked. "They chose not to address it."

How The Democrats Can Step Up (WP)

By David Ignatius

It's too late for the Democrats to forge coherent positions on Iraq or tax policy before the November elections. But fortune has presented them with a mission that can be summed up in a simple sentence: They must be the party of accountability and reform.

The pollsters report that nearly two-thirds of the country now believes that America is heading in the wrong direction. The events of the past several weeks offer a devastating argument for the Democrats of why that is so. With the Republicans in control of the executive and legislative branches, arrogance has become a way of life. In a series of widely disparate cases -- from ignoring the ethics problems of former House majority leader Tom DeLay to refusing recommendations to fire Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to covering up the egregious conduct of Rep. Mark Foley -- the Republican leadership's instinct has been political self-protection rather than accountability and effective government.

The Democrats are talking about a culture of corruption in Washington, but what are they going to do about it? That's the question Democrats should address over the next month if they want a mandate for change. If they win the House of Representatives, will the Democrats embark on a two-year binge of investigations and score-settling? Or will they get serious about solving the country's problems?

The challenge for the Democrats, if they do triumph in November, will be to break out of the partisan straitjacket that constricts American politics. That has been the real inner demon of the Republicans -- they appeared to care more about their party and its prerogatives than about the country's welfare. The Democrats, in recent years, have drunk deep from that same poisoned chalice, and they need to stop.

The Democrats' first priority next year should be ethics reforms that address the gross misconduct that surfaced in the DeLay and Jack Abramoff scandals. They should start by seeking GOP co-sponsorship for new legislation on lobbying and campaign finance. The Republicans will try to paint Democrats in the next Congress as liberal fanatics bent on revenge. The Democrats should answer with a spirit of bipartisanship -- an offer to work with the Republicans on effective oversight of the executive branch and congressional reform. If a Democratic victory in November becomes an exercise in "payback," the public rightly will be angry.

To see how far the Republicans have strayed from accountability, it's useful to recall their response to the DeLay scandal. At every opportunity, they tried to evade, obstruct and bully. When the House ethics committee admonished DeLay in late 2004 for ethics violations, the GOP leaders stonewalled. First they changed the Republican caucus rules so that DeLay could remain as leader even if he was later indicted. The leaders were forced to back down on that one, but they then fired the conscientious Rep. Joel Hefley as chairman of the ethics committee and purged two other Republican members and several staffers. The effect was to gut the committee, which didn't function at all during 2005.

Even after the Abramoff influence-peddling investigation brought a string of indictments, the GOP-controlled Congress failed to pass lobbying reforms. "These are the worst congressional scandals in three decades, and Congress has done absolutely nothing about it," argues Fred Wertheimer, president of the campaign watchdog group Democracy 21.

The case of Rumsfeld partakes of the same circle-the-wagons spirit that has sapped the GOP. Rumsfeld should have resigned after the Abu Ghraib scandal in mid-2004. (Imagine what that signal of accountability might have done to help America's image.) But by early this year, it was obvious even to those in the Bush White House that Rumsfeld had to go. They were moving to ease him out this spring when a parade of retired generals called publicly for his resignation. I'm told that the White House, fearful of being seen as caving in to pressure, backed off at that point and left Rumsfeld in place.

And now we have the Foley scandal, which, even by Washington standards, is a remarkable piece of hypocrisy and cronyism. For at least a year senior House Republicans knew or should have known that Foley had inappropriate communications with House pages. They did nothing -- and the only possible explanation is that they were afraid of political damage. Indeed, they allowed Foley to remain co-chairman of the House caucus on missing and exploited children until the day his revolting messages were disclosed.

The Democrats will benefit from the GOP meltdown to the extent that they offer the country a genuine alternative: In place of scandal, reform; in place of partisanship, cooperation; in place of arrogance, accountability.

9th Circuit Judge Protests Proposal For New Breakaway Circuit (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, October 6, 2006

The long-simmering debate over splitting the nation's largest federal appellate court heated up last month when one 9th Circuit judge complained that a new breakaway circuit would have no Hispanic judges.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is currently considering S. 1845, a bill that would split the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, with California, Hawaii and Guam in a new, shrunken 9th Circuit. A new 12th Circuit would be composed of Arizona, Nevada, Oregon, Washington state, Idaho, Montana and Alaska.

"I'm a Republican and an appointee of President Bush, and it dawned on me that the resulting 12th Circuit would be without a single Hispanic judge. Nobody is focused on this," said Judge Carlos T. Bea of San Francisco.

Bea joined the court in 2003. He was raised in Spain and is one of six Hispanic judges among the 9th Circuit's 49 active and senior judges.

In general, Republican lawmakers have pushed the split efforts while Democratic legislators generally oppose the move. A majority of the circuit's judges oppose a split, according to Chief Judge Mary Schroeder.

Arizona, with a population that is 25 percent Hispanic, and Nevada, with a 20 percent Hispanic population, would join the Pacific Northwest states, but without Hispanic judges, Bea said.

The circuit's Hispanic judges, Arthur Alarcon, Ferdinand Fernandez, Kim Wardlaw (whose mother is from Mexico), Richard Paez, Consuelo Callahan and Bea, all California-based judges, would remain on the split 9th Circuit.

Diarmuid O'Scannlain, a Portland, Ore.-based 9th Circuit judge who has backed a circuit split since the mid-1990s, declined to comment on Bea's concern.

O'Scannlain, who testified on Sept. 20 before the Senate Judiciary Committee in support of the split, said his concern is with effective judicial administration. He believes the circuit has become too large to manage. The restructuring of the court should not be based on Supreme Court "batting averages and public perception of any of our decisions.

"I am quite confident the circuit will be split someday ... but I have no idea when that may be," he said.

Bea said his concern "is important to the Hispanic bar and the Hispanic community." He said Hispanics "like to be represented the same as blacks. It is a sign you are accepted in the community. People I talk to are upset ... they want to see Hispanics achieve and be recognized."

TIED TO IMMIGRATION?

"We see this as tied to the immigration debate," said James Reyna, president of the Hispanic National Bar Association and an international trade partner at Williams & Mullen in Washington, D.C.

"The bill as it is now written would take the most integrated and diverse circuit, with good representation of Hispanics, and split it with a new 12th Circuit with no Hispanics," he said. "The concentration of Hispanics has a direct adverse impact on the Hispanic community.

Reyna said the split would also impose a larger caseload on the remaining judges in a new California-centered 9th Circuit because it would retain 80 percent of the caseload, more than 500 cases per judge, as opposed to 350 for the 12th Circuit.

Among the circuit's district courts, which would be divided along the same state lines, half the 5,700 immigration-related criminal offenses in 2005, such as illegal re-entry, come from Arizona and Nevada, while most of the rest came from Southern California. Among the 6,200 asylum and other immigration appeals to the 9th Circuit so far in fiscal year 2006, more than 5,000 arise in California alone, according to circuit statistics.

Bush Making Education Bill A Priority (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, The Associated Press

AP, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said Thursday that renewing the No Child Left Behind law will be a priority for him next year but acknowledged the law isn't working as well for parents as it should.

The law requires schools that get federal poverty aid and fall short of their yearly progress goals for two straight years to offer transfers to students. After three years of failure, schools must offer low-income parents a choice of tutors.

Bush acknowledged, however, that those promises to parents aren't working as they should.

For example, many schools report their test scores late. So many parents don't find out that their children have a right to transfer until a new school year has begun.

"It kind of looks like people are afraid to put out results for some reason," Bush said in a speech at the Woodridge Elementary and Middle Campus, a thriving charter school in a run-down neighborhood five miles from the White House. "And so we'll work with Congress to clarify the law and to strengthen the law to make sure our parents get timely information and useful information."

Of more than 2.2 million children eligible for tutoring, only 19 percen't of them got it in 2004-05, according to auditors at the congressional Government Accountability Office.

Even fewer kids take advantage of the option to transfer to another school _ about 1 or 2 percent of those eligible, according to national estimates.

It is unsurprising that Bush would tout the No Child Left Behind law, considered the centerpiece of his first-term domestic agenda. As a matter of timing, though, making the law's renewal a priority could be significant.

The law is scheduled to be reauthorized by Congress next year, but some education observers have speculated it may be bumped until as late as 2009, after the next presidential election.

The sooner the better _ that's the view among dozens of education groups that are seeking changes in the law, such as how kids are tested and how schools are graded.

Bush outlined a series of ways in which the law could be improved, such as by expanding testing in high schools, an idea he has pitched to Congress for two years. He also said he wants the federal government to pay for 28,000 low income students across the country to transfer to private schools, an initiative he has in the current budget request at a cost of $100 million.

His comments come after Education Secretary Margaret Spellings recently told reporters that that law is "like Ivory soap: It's 99.9 percent pure or something." Spellings later said she was referring to the core principles of the law and is willing to consider improvements to the law.

The law was passed with support of some leading Democrats who now say Bush has not provided enough funding to carry out the goals. Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., said he welcomes the opportunity to "get these essential reforms back on track."

"This administration and the Republican Congress have turned the No Child Left Behind Act into a political slogan rather than the solemn oath it was intended to be to our nation's students, parents, and teachers," Kennedy said.

Bush Pitches Incentive Pay For Teachers (WP)

By Theola Labbé

President Bush visited a high-performing charter school in Northeast Washington yesterday to call for changes to the No Child Left Behind education law that he said would help teachers raise student performance and give more choice to parents whose children attend failing schools.

Bush said Friendship-Woodridge Elementary and Middle School, which serves 550 students, meets the high academic standards that are demanded by the federal education law. The law, scheduled to be reauthorized by Congress next year, has been hotly debated. Critics charge that it focuses too much on test-taking and does not provide enough funding to address the underlying social and academic factors that affect the quality of education.

"I know people say that we test too much, but how can you solve a problem until you measure?" Bush said in the school's gymnasium to an audience of schoolchildren and officials in suits. "Measuring is the gateway to success."

Against a backdrop of No Child Left Behind posters featuring smiling children waving American flags, Bush proposed that teachers who raise student scores or decide to teach in hard-to-serve urban or rural school districts be paid bonuses under a new incentive fund for teachers. High schools, which now graduate 75 percent of their freshmen on time, would offer more rigorous courses through a new Advanced Placement training program for 70,000 teachers, Bush said.

Students smiled and pointed at the buzz of activity in school hallways as security officers and explosives-sniffing dogs milled about during Bush's visit. Bush toured a "smart lab," a classroom where middle school students made music on an Apple computer and demonstrated robotic vehicles that started and stopped at the sound of a handclap. He encouraged students to study and asked about their college plans.

The charter school, which is publicly funded, opened in 1998 and serves students in pre-K and up to eighth grade. The school, in the 2900 block of Carlton Avenue NE, is 99 percent African American, and 81 percent of its students are considered low-income. Bush said he chose Friendship-Woodridge for a visit because it had met the academic benchmarks on standardized tests for the past three years.

On the latest test, the D.C. Comprehensive Assessment, Friendship-Woodridge was among just four of 37 charter schools under the authority of the D.C. Public Charter School Board to make the grade. Many parents place importance on the scores, but D.C. school leaders say the results do not fully reflect how much a student may have improved.

Ross Wiener, policy analyst at the Education Trust, a national nonprofit that advocates for public education, praised Bush's ideas on teacher training. But he said the speech was focused on schools that are doing well and offered little guidance on how to help struggling schools turn around.

"That's what's on a lot of people's minds right now," Wiener said in a telephone interview.

Student reviews of Bush's speech were overwhelmingly positive. The president won over even Shawntese Gunner, 10, of Northeast. She said before his speech that she liked him "just a little bit" and was surprised to hear that he was visiting her school. She said she's a fifth-grader in Mr. Lakis's class. Andrew Lakis said his class calls itself the "307 A-Team," a reference to the class's room number and to the idea that all students can make A grades.

Shawntese gave the president's speech an A. "He explained that no child should be left behind," she said. "I like him a lot now."

Bush Says He'll Strengthen Education Policy (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

Focusing on domestic issues for a couple of days, the president visits a school before tackling the economy today.

WASHINGTON — With his centerpiece education policy up for renewal, President Bush said Thursday that reauthorizing and strengthening the program was one of his top priorities for next year.

The law, known as "No Child Left Behind," which he signed one year after taking office, has divided educators, drawn sharp criticism recently from the Department of Education's inspector general, and prompted Democrats to complain that the administration has not put enough money into helping school districts meet its demands.

Bush, shifting his public focus away from the war in Iraq and the campaign against terrorism, is in the midst of two days of speaking out on domestic policy. Education was the theme Thursday, with a visit to the Education Department headquarters in Washington and then to a District of Columbia charter school. Today it's the economy, to be highlighted in a speech at a FedEx distribution facility.

But neither topic is a sure winner, even as he suggests they are reason to vote Republican in the upcoming elections.

In the first of six reports on No Child Left Behind, the Education Department's inspector general found the selection of reading curricula to be rife with conflict of interest — persons with financial stakes in reading programs are deciding which programs states can use.

In the report dated last month on the Reading First component of the program, the inspector general's office examined the panel chosen to assess the states' proposals for grants. It found that six of the 25 panelists had "significant professional connections" to a particular reading program.

Three of those six had links to the Reading Mastery program published by SRA/McGraw-Hill. Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez), said McGraw-Hill's chairman and previous chairman had between them contributed more than $23,000 to Bush and the Republican National Committee since 1999.

The president's remarks today on the economy will follow the announcement of monthly job figures and Allan B. Hubbard, chairman of the White House National Economic Council, forecast an upbeat tenor. He told reporters Thursday that despite the slowdown in housing prices, the still-high price of gasoline, and the ongoing problems of the Big 3 auto manufacturers, voters had reason to be optimistic about the economy.

Hubbard said the growth of the economy in the third and fourth quarters was likely to be in the 1% to 2% range, with growth for the year at 3%, which he presented as sustainable figures. "We feel very good about the economy," Hubbard said.

With Republicans struggling against the fallout of the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and the continuing political weight of the Iraq war, such events as the visit to the Woodridge Elementary and Middle School in a rundown section of the nation's capital give Bush an opportunity to focus on a domestic policy issue that's far from the political spotlight. It was his second visit to a school this week, following his stop at George W. Bush Elementary School in Stockton.

Even involving a program that was a top priority when he took office, Bush acknowledged room for improvement. The measure expires at the end of the 2007-2008 school year but can be extended automatically if no changes are made.

The president said that parents are not necessarily getting information about students' progress quickly enough to switch a child's enrollment to another school if they think a change is necessary.

"We've got to improve options," the president said. He said that in some cases, parents were not being notified about how a child was performing until a new school year had begun.

"That doesn't help," he said, adding: "It kind of looks like people are afraid to put out results for some reason."

He also suggested school districts were not taking advantage of federal help providing tutoring for students, or were using the money for other purposes.

No Bush Left Behind (BSWK)

By Keith Epstein

BusinessWeek, October 16, 2006

The President's brother Neil is making hay from school reform

Across the country, some teachers complain that President George W. Bush's makeover of public education promotes "teaching to the test." The President's younger brother Neil takes a different tack: He's selling to the test. The No Child Left Behind Act compels schools to prove students' mastery of certain facts by means of standardized exams. Pressure to perform has energized the $1.9 billion-a-year instructional software industry.

Now, after five years of development and backing by investors like Saudi Prince Alwaleed Bin Talal and onetime junk-bond king Michael R. Milken, Neil Bush aims to roll his high-tech teacher's helpers into classrooms nationwide. He calls them "curriculum on wheels," or COWs. The $3,800 purple plug-and-play computer/projectors display lively videos and cartoons: the XYZ Affair of the late 1790s as operetta, the 1828 Tariff of Abominations as horror flick. The device plays songs that are supposed to aid the memorization of the 22 rivers of Texas or other facts that might crop up in state tests of "essential knowledge."

Bush's Ignite! Inc. has sold 1,700 COWs since 2005, mainly in Texas, where Bush lives and his brother was once governor. In August, Houston's school board authorized expenditures of up to $200,000 for COWs. The company expects 2006 revenue of $5 million. Says Bush about the impact of his name: "I'm not saying it hasn't opened any doors. It may have helped with some sales." (In September, the U.S. Education Dept.'s inspector general accused the agency of improperly favoring at least five publishers, including The McGraw-Hill Companies, which owns BusinessWeek. A company spokesman says: "Our reading programs have been successful in advancing student achievement for decades; that's why educators hold them in such high regard.")

The stars haven't always aligned for Bush, but at times financial support has. A foundation linked to the controversial Reverend Sun Myung Moon has donated $1 million for a COWs research project in Washington (D.C.)-area schools. In 2004 a Shanghai chip company agreed to give Bush stock then valued at $2 million for showing up at board meetings. (Bush says he received one-fifth of the shares.) In 1988 a Colorado savings and loan failed while he served on its board, making him a prominent symbol of the S&L scandal. Neil calls himself "the most politically damaged of the [Bush] brothers."

While hardly the first brother to embarrass a President -- remember Billy Carter's Billy Beer or Roger Clinton's cocaine? -- Neil could be the first to seek profit from a hallmark Presidential crusade. And also that of a governor: Jeb makes school standards a centerpiece in Florida, too.

Neil says he never talks shop with his brothers. He attributes his interest in education to his struggles with dyslexia. His son, Pierce, also had difficulties in school, he says. "Not one of our investors has ever asked for any kind of special access -- a visa, a trip to the Lincoln Bedroom, an autographed picture, or anything."

Computer System Under Attack (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

Hackers operating through Chinese Internet servers have launched a debilitating attack on the computer system of a sensitive Commerce Department bureau, forcing it to replace hundreds of workstations and block employees from regular use of the Internet for more than a month, Commerce officials said yesterday.

The attack targeted the computers of the Bureau of Industry and Security, which is responsible for controlling U.S. exports of commodities, software and technology having both commercial and military uses. The bureau has stepped up its activity in regulating trade with China in recent years as the United States increased its exports of such dual-use items to the growing Chinese market.

This marked the second time in recent months that U.S. officials confirmed that a major attack traced to China had succeeded in penetrating government computers.

"Through established security procedures, BIS discovered a targeted effort to gain access to BIS user accounts," said Commerce Department spokesman Richard Mills. "We have no evidence that BIS data has been lost or compromised."

The significance of the attacks was underscored in a series of e-mails sent to BIS employees by acting Undersecretary of Commerce Mark Foulon since July, informing them of "a number of serious threats to the integrity of our systems and data." In an August e-mail, Foulon reported that the bureau had "identified several successful attempts to attack unattended BIS workstations during the overnight hours." Then, early last month, he wrote: "It has become clear that Internet access in itself is a vulnerability that we cannot mitigate. We have tried incremental steps and they have proven insufficient."

A source familiar with the security breach said the hackers had penetrated the computers with a "rootkit" program, a stealthy form of software that allows attackers to mask their presence and then gain privileged access to the computer system. The attacks were traced to Web sites registered on Chinese Internet service providers, Commerce officials said. "We determined they were owned by the Chinese," a senior Commerce official said. He did not say who in China was responsible or whether officials had even been able to identify the culprits. Although bureau employees were informed of the problem in July, commerce officials declined to say when the attacks were discovered and how long they had been going on. Only over time did bureau officials realize the extent of the damage from the breach.

"The more we learned, the more we did," the senior official said.

Since Sept. 1, the bureau has blocked employees from accessing the Internet from their own computers. Instead, several separate computers unconnected to the BIS computer network have been set up so employees can try to continue carrying out their duties.

Commerce officials have also decided they cannot salvage the workstations that employees had been using and instead will build an entirely new system for the bureau in the coming months with "clean hardware and clean software," the senior official said. Foulon told employees in late August that they hoped to replace all the bureau's workstations within three months.

The official acknowledged that some of the emergency measures have made it more difficult for the bureau to communicate with other government agencies and the public, including companies that turn to BIS for export licenses.

In July, the State Department confirmed that hackers in China had broken into its computers in Washington and overseas. Last year, U.S. officials reported that the Defense Department and other U.S. agencies were under relentless attack from unidentified computers in China.

China has long been a focus of high-level attention at BIS and was the destination for the largest number of licenses approved by the bureau in 2004, according to the bureau's most recent annual report. In weighing applications for licenses, bureau officials seek to protect U.S. national security interests without hamstringing legitimate commercial trade.

Commerce officials recently reported that they had taken significant steps to enhance computer security at the department, both by deploying new software and improving the management of the system.

These steps came after the General Accounting Office (since renamed the Government Accountability Office) issued a scathing report five years ago, which concluded that "significant and pervasive computer security weaknesses place Department of Commerce systems at risk." The report found that outsiders could gain unauthorized access to the computer system and access confidential data. "Intruders could disrupt the operations of systems that are critical to the mission of the department," the report found.

Justices Make Points By Questioning Lawyers (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, October 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076384

WASHINGTON — At the Supreme Court, oral arguments give the justices a chance to hear lawyers' best lines of reasoning. The hour-long sessions in the ornate courtroom also offer the justices a chance to make their own case — to each other.

Oral arguments, which began anew this week with the start of the 2006-07 term, provide one of the few times each week that all nine justices are together and presumably open to persuasion. As the justices fire questions at lawyers at the court's lectern, they also telegraph their views to one another.

It's a routine that is likely to become more intriguing this year on the divided court. Conservative Justice Samuel Alito begins his first full term after replacing the more moderate Sandra Day O'Connor, and Chief Justice John Roberts, who replaced the late William Rehnquist a year ago, continues to establish his presence.

"It's like a highly stylized Japanese theater," says Ted Olson, a former U.S. solicitor general who has argued frequently before the court. "The justices use questions to make points to their colleagues."

"Well, the answer would be because Congress is worried that people won't comply. That's why," Breyer said. "And there are millions of ways of harassing people. They start issuing a complaint. … You freeze them out."

Liberal Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg then asked about a hypothetical worker whose work hours were changed after she filed a discrimination complaint, forcing the worker to choose between her job and caring for her disabled child. Scalia was not satisfied with the lawyer's response and offered his own.

"I mean, to be sure, that's a possibility," the lawyer said when Scalia was done. "That's a possible answer."

(In the end, Scalia — who initially had seemed skeptical of a worker's discrimination claim in the case — joined an 8-1 ruling that enhanced workers' ability to bring claims for a range of actions by employers. Alito was the lone dissenter.)

In many oral arguments, lawyers "need to be speaking with not only the justice who has asked the question, but the one to whom the question is actually addressed," says Walter Dellinger, a former U.S. solicitor general, which is the government's top lawyer before the high court.

Roberts and Alito are relatively new to the court, so the justices also use oral arguments to get a sense of their colleagues' positions.

"They seemed to be listening more" when Roberts and Alito came on the bench last term, says Thomas Goldstein, a lawyer who argues frequently before the Supreme Court.

Goldstein notes that until the 2005-06 term, the court had gone 11 years without a change in membership, and the justices seemed to instinctively know each other's general approach, as well as what the court's overall view was likely to be.

During the 1970s and 1980s, oral arguments were not as spirited. A lawyer could talk on and on without getting a question or comment from the bench.

The court's veterans then, including William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, Harry Blackmun and Lewis Powell, had few queries, says lawyer Beth Brinkmann, a former Blackmun clerk who is in private practice and argues before the court.

Today, with the exception of the typically silent Clarence Thomas, who is perhaps the court's most conservative member, the justices each ask many questions and make known their concerns about a case.

The appointment of the voluble Scalia in 1986 marked a change in the court's open sessions. During his first days on the bench, Scalia asked so many questions that Powell, according to biographer John Jeffries, leaned over to Marshall and whispered, "Do you think he knows that the rest of us are here?"

As other justices were appointed, the bench grew livelier.

During the same period, Rehnquist, who was chief justice from 1986 to 2005 and was known for running efficient sessions, limited the discussion among justices in their private conferences. So oral arguments became a way for justices to lay the groundwork for arguments they would be making on paper later.

Cases ultimately are resolved through a series of memos and draft opinions that circulate among the justices. It's a written conversation, played out over weeks and sometimes months between the justices' preliminary private vote in the case and the public announcement of a ruling.

David Frederick, a Washington lawyer who argued four cases before the court last term, says he considers oral arguments a kind of "three-way" conversation, among a justice, the lawyer at the lectern and a potentially persuadable justice. With the Roberts court, he says, "it is at a slightly lower tone, because my sense is that the justices have more of a chance to flesh out their arguments in conference."

That does not stop justices from trying to make their case through lawyers who appear before the court. During one of his first sessions, Roberts — who often argued before the court as a lawyer for the government and then in private practice — tried to get a lawyer to alter her arguments in a dispute over public employees' speech rights. "I would have thought you might have argued that it's speech paid for by the government … so there's no First Amendment issue at all," Roberts said.

In the same case, Roberts posed a hypothetical question that involved "a memo from a law clerk that says, 'Justice So-and-So's jurisprudence is wacky.' "

Democrats Hold Edge In Election Interest (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 51% of Democrats express highest possible level of interest in the elections, compared with 43% of Republicans. Democratic edge on that harbinger of motivation to vote is up slightly from 51%-46% edge in early September.

A month before Election Day, timing of Foley turmoil is "as bad as it can be" for Bush's party, says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts the Journal/NBC poll with Republican counterpart Bill McInturff. Republicans hope cash and voter-turnout advantages will neutralize Democratic enthusiasm.

Poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

Senior citizens back Democrats to control Congress by 48%-43% -- smaller than party's overall edge among all voters.

The Energy Department plans to lower forecast next week from earlier fourth-quarter projection of $2.58 per gallon; economists expect drop in inflation as well. Though labor-market report could show weakness, falling pump prices reduce sting of Democratic attacks on economy.

Proportion of electorate calling gas prices a top voting issue plummets to 11% from 23% a month ago. Only 12% credit the president for lower prices, suggesting few share suggestions by Bush adversaries that White House has engineered price declines to help Republican candidates.

Among independents, just 29% express high confidence that Democratic Party policies will keep America safe from terrorism, matching 29% who have little or no confidence. A 47% plurality of independents lack confidence in Republicans on Social Security and Medicare; Democrats hope to elevate those issues in campaign dialogue.

Two-thirds of the electorate, including 47% of Republicans, say they would be more likely to vote for a Democratic candidate who backs a minimum-wage increase. Six in 10 independents would be more likely to support a Democrat calling for "phased withdrawal" from Iraq.

By 47%-26%, voters are more likely to back a Republican who supports a Mexican border fence.

ANONYMOUS: State Department will award more than 20 grants of as much as $1.5 million for Iran-related democracy and human-rights work, most of it outside Iran. Since U.S. fears Iranian meddling, "don't expect a lot of transparency" on who gets awards, a State official says.

MORE FLAK: Former White House official David Kuo will publish a book this month slamming administration's commitment to "faith-based" programs. A person familiar with book's content says it will characterize centerpiece of Bush's compassionate conservatism as "big talk, little action."

BULL MARKET? Six in 10 say rising stock market hasn't affected their view of the economy. Retirees and Midwesterners applaud Wall Street's climb the most, with a third of each group reporting greater confidence.

FALLEN STAR: Rep. Foley's exit sets back Republican effort to build political and fund-raising ties to Hollywood. He worked with lobbying group dubbed "entertaining Republicans" that courted studio heads with an argument that the party is stronger than Democrats on protecting intellectual property.

"It's a massive task," says spokeswoman for the Senate Intelligence chairman. Among three sections not yet finished, one compares administration statements with underlying intelligence, and another looks at Pentagon's "Office of Special Plans."

By 52%-28%, conservatives say Iraq war is helping U.S. win antiterror fight, while 72% of liberals and 48% of moderates say it's hurting. Women say it's hurting instead of helping by 48%-27%; men are more evenly divided.

Majorities in all regions and income groups say Iraq is in civil war.

MINOR MEMOS: Southerners and Midwesterners narrowly approve of new law on terror tribunals, while Westerners and Northeasterners disapprove....Just 40% of voters hold favorable view of President Bush, but 66% feel warm toward the first lady.

Anti-Bush Protesters Hold Loop March (CHIT)

By Brendan McCarthy And Emma Graves Fitzsimmons

Chicago Tribune, October 6, 2006

Many of the protesters marching through downtown Thursday against the Bush administration were veteran activists, but the demonstration was a first for Gina Latinovich.

"I've been feeling hopeless about the war and global warming, and I realized I couldn't wait anymore," said Latinovich, 49. "We're actually the silent majority. Maybe this is the turning point."

Police estimated that about 1,500 people attended Chicago's march from Grant Park to Federal Plaza Thursday afternoon during a day of national protests in more than 100 cities called "World Can't Wait—Drive Out the Bush Regime."

Although the protesters had a shared distaste for the Bush administration, the name of the march held a different meaning for each one. Latinovich said it meant criminal investigations into Bush policies such as the Iraq war, wiretapping and the use of torture. For others, it meant everything from impeachment to the Democrats winning November congressional elections.

Rebecca Miller, a freshman at Columbia College, missed her afternoon cultural anthropology class to attend the rally because she said she feared the Iraq war was only breeding more terrorism. She said she hoped young people would vote to push the Republicans out of Congress to put a check on the president.

But Miller was one of many protesters disappointed with the turnout, which had "more police than protesters," she said. Police were prepared for a march of more than 10,000 people, the figure protest organizers had expected. Several protesters theorized that turnout was low because the people who shared their views weren't willing to leave school or work in the middle of the day.

More than 100 state, county and city police officers, some wearing riot gear, lined the 3½-block parade route along Jackson Boulevard. There were no problems with protesters or street closures, officials said.

The march turned out to be much shorter than planned because the group's permit application for a 2-mile route through downtown along North Michigan Avenue was denied by city officials two weeks ago.

In a last-minute effort, organizers appealed the city's decision in federal court Thursday morning. Just hours before the march began, U.S. Magistrate Judge Nan Nolan denied the group's request for a temporary restraining order against the city. She said the request for a restraining order came too late—that it would be unfeasible at the 11th hour to reroute CTA buses and make alternate plans for emergency vehicles.

Protesters started gathering shortly before noon in Grant Park at Jackson and Columbus Drives. Speakers including actors, poets and political activists addressed the crowd on subjects ranging from the response to Hurricane Katrina to the Bush administration's policies in Iraq.

Tribal drummers performed, participants carried protest signs reading "Out of Iraq" and "No War in Iran," and one man wore a mask of Bush, devil horns and a cape. The march arrived around 3 p.m. at Federal Plaza, where speeches and performances continued into the evening.

Thyandrea Adams, 29, who arrived at the protest with two busloads of people from the Cabrini-Green housing complex, said she shut down her moving business for the day to attend the march. Adams, who said she wants the president impeached, said her biggest issue is how funding for the Iraq war is keeping money from poor neighborhoods like hers.

"I told them not to come into work today," Adams said of her 15 employees. "This is a day that's important. It was worth it to show support from our community."

Hundreds Protest 'Bush Regime' (SEAPI)

By Mike Barber

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 6, 2006

One was Linda Boyd, a Clyde Hill mom and housewife. Another was Linda Strader, a West Seattle real estate agent. Patricia Thompson, a Seattle legal assistant, turned out with her law firm.

They were among several hundred protesters who rallied all day in Seattle against President Bush on Thursday, one of about 200 coordinated demonstrations nationwide organized by World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime. The day began at the University of Washington, moved to 11th Avenue and Olive Way on Capitol Hill and eventually to an all-night rally in front of the federal building downtown.

Police arrested three protesters at the Capitol Hill rally and booked them into the King County Jail for obstructing and resisting arrest, including one for investigation of assault, Seattle police spokeswoman Deborah Brown said.

Police, who also guarded protesters' safety, arrested a fourth person possessing an illegal fixed blade knife.

As the protest moved downtown, police arrested a fifth person near 12th and Olive who was carrying a rifle wrapped in a blanket.

"We don't know what his intentions were," Brown said.

Asked what motivated them to protest, nearly everyone in attendance cited a litany of reasoned, passionate concerns -- the conduct of the war in Iraq, domestic spying, erosion of civil liberties and the botched federal response to Hurricane Katrina. They said Bush's recent signing of a bill authorizing tough detainee interrogation amounts to legalizing torture.

"I'm probably the only Realtor out here," Strader, 53, said of the first demonstration she has attended in her life. "I just decided today to put my convictions where my mouth is."

Having grown up an "Army brat," Strader said she has sympathy for troops she thinks are being misused by being ordered to fight in Iraq. She also said she is "mad and scared that someone could come into my home due to my convictions," referring to her fears of domestic spying and that the Constitution has been eroded during the Bush administration.

"It makes me so emotional. I feel very frustrated, and I love my country," Strader said.

Boyd, in her late 40s, said: "What has galvanized me is the erosion of our Constitution -- of the 10 amendments in the Bill of Rights, seven have been eroded. As a housewife and mom, I felt I could no longer sit by and see our government destroyed."

Boyd ticked off a list of concerns, calling the war in Iraq illegal and for Bush's impeachment.

"Torture is not an American value," she said, referring to abuses of Iraqi prisoners in the war on terrorism. "President Bush's disdain for the law is intolerable."

Patricia Thompson, 50, of Seattle, a legal assistant whose law firm turned out for the protest, said she had been joined earlier in the day by her 82-year-old father, a World War II veteran of the 10th Mountain Division. The demonstration "was a good thing for my father to come watch," Thompson said.

"He is horrified at the mess they made of Iraq. Weapons of mass destruction was a snow job. We never finished in Afghanistan. It's an absolute shambles of incompetency and profiteering," Thompson said.

One of the younger demonstrators, meanwhile, who gave her name only as Jackie, said she attended because: "I'm one person wanting to be with many. We can do a lot by being together."

Administration Foes Step Out Statewide (SEATIMES)

By Tan Vinh

The Seattle Times, October 6, 2006

Scores of anti-war activists, environmentalists and high-school students marched from the University of Washington campus to Capitol Hill and then to downtown Seattle Thursday, berating President Bush for everything from his management of the Iraq war to the handling of Hurricane Katrina.

Across the state, more than 250 related demonstrations were held, including rallies in Bellingham, Everett, Tacoma, Olympia, Wenatchee and Spokane, said organizers of the National Day of Mass Resistance. They said protests also were held as far away as Switzerland and Nepal.

In Seattle, police arrested three protesters for investigation of obstruction, resisting arrest and assault in connection with "some kind of altercation with officers at the scene," said police spokeswoman Debra Brown. Officers said one man carried a rifle wrapped in a blanket to a rally at Cal Anderson Park on Capitol Hill.

Overall, authorities called the rallies peaceful. Demonstrators did cause traffic congestion around 4 p.m. at the Federal Building in downtown Seattle, where the protest was to end at midnight with a sit-in.

In Seattle, protesters bashed Bush for his policies on the environment, abortion and in Iraq and Afghanistan, and criticized his administration for its hard stance against Iran and North Korea.

Conspiracy theorists also were on hand, accusing the administration of dynamiting levees in New Orleans and being complicit in the Sept. 11 attacks.

The rallies were organized by activists calling themselves The World Can't Wait, which called on students to walk out of class to join the protest. Dozens of high-school students, saying they were from Seattle, Woodinville and Vashon Island, joined in, holding "Impeach Bush" banners and "Drive out the Bush regime!" signs.

Event spokeswoman Maggie Lawless acknowledged principals and parents might be upset that some students cut classes but added, "It's a bigger sacrifice to not take a stand."

In Olympia, where a small group of protesters gathered on the Capitol lawn, Kenn Dzaman, 47, wore a "Got Fascism?" T-shirt and called Bush a "lunatic." Dzaman worries what will happen to the world if more people don't speak up.

"If you do not get off your couch and put on your walking shoes, there's something wrong," said Dzaman. "People need to wake up and start telling how they really feel."

Big Government Gets Bigger (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The federal government keeps getting bigger.

The Republican Party's oft-stated affinity for smaller government has not applied during the Bush administration. According to a recent study, not only is the number of federal civil servants on the rise, but so are the numbers of employees working for government-funded contractors and for organizations that receive government grants.

Roll all of those together -- and mix in the numbers of postal workers and military personnel on the federal payroll -- and the "true size" of the federal government stands at 14.6 million employees, said Paul C. Light, the study's author and a government professor at New York University.

That compares with 12.1 million employees in 2002, said Light, who has tracked the growth of government for years and has data for as far back as 1990. The latest increase is almost entirely due to contractors, whose ranks swelled by 2.5 million since 2002, Light wrote in his 10-page research brief.

"This time, almost all of the growth can be attributed from the war on terrorism, which boosted Defense spending for both goods and services systems and covered the continued cost of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq," he wrote.

"The rest of the hidden workforce held steady at roughly 2.9 million grantees, while civil service employment inched up and postal employment fell."

Light calls the 10.5 million federal contractors and grantees the government's "hidden workforce" because politicians tend not to mention them when discussing the size of the federal bureaucracy. Yet such workers absorbed nearly $400 billion in federal contracting funds and $100 billion in federal grants in 2005. They often performed vital work such as researching new vaccines, running federal computer systems and making body armor, weapons and meals for the military.

The number of civil servants is increasing, too, up 54,000 since 2002 to 1.9 million workers. That is still fewer than the 2.2 million civil servants on the federal payroll in 1990, at the end of the Cold War.

Light acknowledges that his numbers of contractors and grantee employees are estimates from federal procurement and grant data, and are harder to nail down than the number of civil servants. But the trend is clear, he said.

Politicians who focus on the size of the civil service and fail to acknowledge the hidden workforce "encourage the public into believing that it truly can get more for less," Light said. And the heavy reliance on such workers, while sometimes necessary, makes it more difficult to figure out who is accountable when things go wrong, he said.

"The federal government often uses contractors and grantees to provide talent it cannot recruit, specialized services it cannot produce, competition it cannot generate among its own organizations, and equipment that it cannot and should not build itself," Light wrote.

"[I]t hardly matters who produces the goods and services as long as the federal government is honest with the public about the true cost of delivering on the promises it makes."

Tax Tidal Wave (WSJ)

Congress keeps breaking the Beltway Book of World Records for spending money, but the government will soon report that the federal budget deficit for the just-completed 2006 fiscal year fell to about $260 billion.

What's the secret of this deficit success that you aren't reading much about this election year? It isn't spending restraint. The federal budget expanded to $2.7 trillion last year, a 9% increase, or three times the inflation rate. Over the past six years the federal budget has increased by 49.2%.

The main cause of the deficit decline -- 90% of it, says White House budget director Rob Portman -- is a tidal wave of tax revenue. Tax collections have increased by $521 billion in the last two fiscal years, the largest two-year revenue increase -- even after adjusting for inflation -- in American history. If you're surprised to hear that, it's probably because inside Washington this is treated as the only secret no one wants to print. On the few occasions when the media pay attention to the rise in tax collections, they scratch their heads and wonder where this "surprising" and "unexpected windfall" came from.

One place it has come from are corporations, whose tax collections have climbed by 76% over the past two years thanks to greater profitability. Personal income tax payments are up by 30.3% since 2004 too, despite the fact that the highest tax rate is down to 35% from 39.6%. The IRS tax-return data just released last month indicates that a near-record 37% of those income tax payments are received from the top 1% of earners -- "the rich," who are derided regularly in Washington for not paying their "fair share."

More good news is that dividend-tax payments appear to be up as well, even though the tax rate was lowered to 15% from as high as 39.6%. A National Bureau of Economic Research study found that "after a continuous decline in dividend payments over more than two decades, total regular dividends have grown by nearly 20%" and that this reversal happened at "precisely the point at which the lower tax rate was proposed and subsequently applied retroactively." There hasn't been a purer validation of the Laffer Curve since Ronald Reagan rode off into the sunset.

As for the budget deficit, at $260 billion it is now about 2% of our $13 trillion economy, well below the 2.7% average of the last 40 years. Most states and localities are also afloat in tax collections, and including their revenue surpluses brings the total U.S. public sector borrowing down to roughly 1.5% of GDP. Not too shabby given that we're waging a war on terrorism and Congress spent $50 billion last year on Hurricane Katrina clean-up.

Anyway, we thought our taxpaying readers might like to know how much you've all been contributing to the falling deficit -- the best-kept secret in Washington.

Falling Into The Doughnut Hole (NYT)

Millions of elderly Americans enrolled in the new Medicare prescription drug program are approaching the notorious "doughnut hole," a gap in coverage that will force them to pay for their medicines out of pocket until they qualify for catastrophic coverage. Many of the heaviest users of prescription medications have already fallen into the hole — an unwelcome surprise for the many who do not pay much attention to the fine print of their policies.

The hole makes little sense from a medical or insurance perspective. Rather, it is the inevitable result of designing a program with political rather than programmatic aims in mind. And the danger is that some who are ailing, suddenly faced with higher drug bills than they expected, will forgo needed medications and get sicker.

The Medicare drug program was designed to serve three overlapping purposes. The two most important features are designed to help the elderly in greatest need. One subsidizes medication for low-income people. The other provides catastrophic coverage that pays the vast bulk of the bills for the heaviest users of prescription drugs, after they have paid $3,600 of their own money for their medications. Those elements alone justify the program and are the reason we endorsed it from the beginning.

But at the same time, Congress insisted that the program provide benefits to all eligible Americans by covering their initial drug purchases (except for deductibles and co-payments) up to a specified limit, at which point they fall into the "doughnut hole" until reaching the threshold for catastrophic coverage. In a perfect world, all elderly Americans should share in the benefits of the prescription drug plan. But given the fiscal realities in Washington, trying to include everyone was irresponsible.

The decision to offer shallow initial coverage to all beneficiaries was largely an effort to please the millions of middle-class elderly voters who had been led to expect they would benefit from the drug plan. But with nowhere near enough money in deficit-ridden Washington to pay for all this, the doughnut hole emerged as the only way to combine politics with some modicum of cost control.

A more rational approach would certainly have been to begin with complete coverage for the needy and spread that benefit to higher income levels as the money becomes available. As it stands now, reputable surveys suggest that at least three million Americans will fall into the hole by year's end.

Those who can afford to may want to pay an additional premium for a Medicare drug plan that provides coverage for the gap, although the plan frequently covers only generic drugs. The plan offerings for next year will include more options to buy coverage to fill the gap. The good news is that contrary to some analysts' expectations, the number of available plans are going to expand rather than shrink. The bad news for Medicare recipients who have become confused by the wide range of options is that beneficiaries in all but two states will be able to choose from among more than 50 free-standing drug plans for next year.

Despite the irritation over the doughnut hole and some serious start-up problems, the new program seems in general to have found its stride. It is delivering benefits at lower cost than initially projected and ranks high in surveys of consumer satisfaction. The average number of drugs covered by insurers next year will increase by 13 percent, to 4,390. And the average premium for those who remain in their current plan will remain at roughly the same level, about $24 a month. But those already enrolled in a plan would be wise to check for any changes when full details of next year's offerings are posted. In some cases, premiums are rising and drugs previously on the formularies have been dropped.

Dow Hits 3rd Straight Record Close (AP)

By Ellen Simon

AP, October 5, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - Wall Street rose modestly Thursday, nudging the Dow Jones industrial average to its third straight record high close as investors welcomed upbeat retail sales and jobless claims figures.

The Dow closed at 11,866.69, surpassing the record of 11,850.61 set Wednesday. The blue chip index traded up to 11,870.06, which stands as its trading high.

Rising oil prices didn't smother investors' good mood.

"Considering the distance we've come over the last three months and certainly the last three days, it's interesting we could have a data point like oil's climb and not have the market backup much," said Arthur Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies & Co. "It's certainly a scenario where the longer term prospects for the market are looking more positive."

Full ImageStocks pulled back briefly after Charles Plosser, the newly installed president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Philadelphia, signaled that further Fed interest rate hikes may be in the best interests of the economy's long-term performance.

The Dow rose 16.08, or 0.14 percent. The blue chips have gained 196.34 over the past three sessions; on Tuesday, the index shattered closing and trading highs that had stood since Jan. 24, 2000, toward the end of the dot-com boom.

Broader stock indicators were also higher Thursday. The S&P 500 index rose 3.00, or 0.22 percent, to 1,353.22, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 15.39, or 0.67 percent, to 2,306.34.

Bonds fell as stocks wavered, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note at 4.61 percent, up from 4.56 percent Thursday. The U.S. dollar was mostly higher against other major currencies. Gold prices rose.

The day's economic news was stronger than expected, with retailers such as Target Corp. (TGT), Nordstrom Inc. (JWN) and Limited Brands Inc. (LTD) reporting their same-store sales in September surpassed analysts forecasts. Also, the number of new unemployment claims dropped to its lowest level in 10 weeks.

Some traders have questioned the depth of the rally, saying technical markers such as the ratio of advancers to decliners are weaker than they've hoped. And while the Dow has recovered, the S&P 500 still remains more than 11 percent off its all-time high.

Other traders say the market's biggest fears - high energy prices and additional rate hikes by the Federal Reserve - are behind it, leaving room for a greater run-up in stock prices.

Hugh Johnson, chairman and chief investment officer of Johnson Illington Advisors, said he sees this as a stock market in the more advanced stages of a recovery that has been driven, in large part, by declining energy prices.

In company news, Wyeth fell 28 cents to $50.90 after a Philadelphia jury awarded a woman $1.5 million after finding that the drug company's hormone replacement drug was a factor in her breast cancer. This is the second such case against the company to go to trial; Wyeth won the first.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. (WMT) dropped $1.14 to $48.41 after the world's largest retailer reported disappointing September sales. Rival discounter Target Corp. rose $1.05 to $58.68 after it reported a solid sales gain for the month and beat analyst estimates.

Nordstrom Inc. rose 25 cents to $45.44 and Limited Brands Inc. dropped 12 cents to $27.87.

Marriott International Inc. (MAR), the world's largest hotel company by revenue, said its third-quarter earnings weakened, falling 5.4 percent. But its 33 cents per share net income beat estimates of 30 cents and the stock rose $2.52 to $40.85.

DOJ_NMG_0076392

Class A Shares of Berkshire Hathaway Inc. (BRKA), Warren Buffett's investment company, crossed $100,000 a share for the first time Thursday, before retreating slightly. The shares closed up $1,301.00 at $99,000.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies rose 9.61, or 1.31 percent, to 743.08.

Consolidated volume on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.73 billion shares, compared with 2.99 billion Wednesday.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average surged, rising 2.28 percent as investors welcomed Thursday's advance on Wall Street. Britain's FTSE 100 rose 0.64 percent, Germany's DAX index gained 0.48 percent, and France's CAC-40 increased 0.61 percent.

Dow Rises To A Third Straight Record, Shaking Off Oil's Effect In Final Hour (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rallied modestly to a third straight record, despite a rise in oil prices that kept stocks underwater for much of the day.

The Dow industrials gained 16.08 points, or 0.1%, to 11866.69, up 10.7% so far for 2006. At its intraday low soon after midday, the industrial average was off nearly 30 points; it broke into positive territory for good in the final hour of trading. Caterpillar was the strongest of the blue-chip average's 30 components, as the equipment maker's shares jumped more than 4% on upbeat comments by Merrill Lynch about its prospects overseas.

Other major stock indexes are below their records, but are ascending nonetheless. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained three points, or 0.2%, to end at 1353.22, a fresh 5½-year high and now up 8.4% so far this year. And the technology-stock-focused Nasdaq Composite Index rose 15.39, or 0.7%, to 2306.34, its highest close in five months and now up 4.6% on the year.

Treasurys eased, and the dollar was mixed.

Several retailers, including Target, Kohl's and J.C. Penney, announced better-than-expected September same-store sales, or sales at stores open at least a year.

Many investors were more curious to see job data due out today from the Labor Department. Such government releases have been closely watched lately for confirmation that a slowing economy won't result in steep employment drops or painful effects that might cut into corporate profits.

Traders bid up crude-oil prices yesterday on expectations that the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries soon will cut its production by a million barrels a day, a little less than 4% of the cartel's current output, to stem crude's slide from highs earlier this year of more than $75 a barrel. (Related article on page A2.)

Crude futures for November delivery gained 62 cents, or 1%, to $60.03 a barrel. But oil remains off 1.7% this year on the New York Mercantile Exchange, and down 22% from the Nymex record of $77.03 a barrel reached in July.

Some analysts remain skeptical that OPEC members will go through with the production cut, given that oil prices are still high in historic terms. In the past, the cartel's members have sometimes cheated on OPEC's stated production targets in order to book additional revenue.

"I've seen this movie before, and I don't have to stick around for the ending," said energy analyst Fadel Gheit, of brokerage firm Oppenheimer & Co., estimating that the cartel's members can sell oil profitably at any price higher than $45 a barrel. He added: "There's no way OPEC will actually cut production with oil at $60."

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms, including a five-year high for stocks in Europe. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 2.42 points, or 1.1%, to 222.37.

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.79 billion shares, as 2,220 issues rose and 1,070 fell.

Bond prices fell. The 10-year Treasury note dropped 13/32 point, or $4.06 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.61%. The 30-year bond declined 24/32 to yield 4.764%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 117.66 yen, compared with 117.88. The euro declined against the dollar to $1.2694, compared with $1.2713.

The War Against Wages (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

Should we be cheering over the fact that the Dow Jones Industrial Average has finally set a new record? No. The Dow is doing well largely because American employers are waging a successful war against wages. Economic growth since early 2000, when the Dow reached its previous peak, hasn't been exceptional. But after-tax corporate profits have more than doubled, because workers' productivity is up, but their wages aren't — and because companies have dealt with rising health insurance premiums by denying insurance to ever more workers.

If you want to see how the war against wages is being fought, and what it's doing to working Americans and their families, consider the latest news from Wal-Mart.

Wal-Mart already has a well-deserved reputation for paying low wages and offering few benefits to its employees; last year, an internal Wal-Mart memo conceded that 46 percent of its workers' children were either on Medicaid or lacked health insurance. Nonetheless, the memo expressed concern that wages and benefits were rising, in part "because we pay an associate more in salary and benefits as his or her tenure increases."

The problem from the company's point of view, then, is that its workers are too loyal; it wants cheap labor that doesn't hang around too long, but not enough workers quit before acquiring the right to higher wages and benefits. Among the policy changes the memo suggested to deal with this problem was a shift to hiring more part-time workers, which "will lower Wal-Mart's health care enrollment."

And the strategy is being put into effect. "Investment analysts and store managers," reports The New York Times, "say Wal-Mart executives have told them the company wants to transform its work force to 40 percent part-time from 20 percent." Another leaked Wal-Mart memo describes a plan to impose wage caps, so that long-term employees won't get raises. And the company is taking other steps to keep workers from staying too long: in some stores, according to workers, "managers have suddenly barred older employees with back or leg problems from sitting on stools."

It's a brutal strategy. Once upon a time a company that treated its workers this badly would have made itself a prime target for union organizers. But Wal-Mart doesn't have to worry about that, because it knows that these days the people who are supposed to enforce labor laws are on the side of the employers, not the workers.

Since 1935, U.S. workers considering whether to join a union have been protected by the National Labor Relations Act, which bars employers from firing workers for engaging in union activities. For a long time the law was effective: workers were reasonably well protected against employer intimidation, and the union movement flourished.

In the 1970's, however, employers began a successful campaign to roll back unions. This campaign depended on routine violation of labor law: experts estimate that by 1980 employers were illegally firing at least one out of every 20 workers who voted for a union. But employers rarely faced serious consequences for their lawbreaking, thanks to America's political shift to the right. And now that the shift to the right has gone even further, political appointees are seeking to remove whatever protection for workers' rights that the labor relations law still provides.

The Republican majority on the National Labor Relations Board, which is responsible for enforcing the law, has just declared that millions of workers who thought they had the right to join unions don't. You see, the act grants that right only to workers who aren't supervisors. And the board, ruling on a case involving nurses, has declared that millions of workers who occasionally give other workers instructions can now be considered supervisors.

As the dissent from the Democrats on the board makes clear, the majority bent over backward, violating the spirit of the law, to reduce workers' bargaining power.

So what's keeping paychecks down? Major employers like Wal-Mart have decided that their interests are best served by treating workers as a disposable commodity, paid as little as possible and encouraged to leave after a year or two. And these employers don't worry that angry workers will respond to their war on wages by forming unions, because they know that government officials, who are supposed to protect workers' rights, will do everything they can to come down on the side of the wage-cutters.

Jobless Claims At Lowest Level Since July (WSJ)

By Rebecca Christie

WASHINGTON -- The number of new applicants for unemployment insurance fell last week to the lowest level since July, suggesting some recent improvement in the U.S. job market.

Initial jobless claims dropped 17,000 to a seasonally adjusted 302,000 in the week ended Sept. 30, the Labor Department said Thursday. New claims for the week ended Sept. 23 were revised upward to 319,000 from a previously reported 316,000. Last week's claims were at the lowest level since July 22, when 299,000 new claims were reported.

The latest drop in claims was bigger than expected. The median estimate of economists in a Dow Jones Newswires survey expected that jobless claims would be down 1,000 last week. This week, however, investors are more focused on the monthly employment report, due Friday. Economists expect the U.S. added 125,000 new jobs last month, about the same as in August.

The four-week moving average of new claims fell to 313,500 last week from a revised level of 316,250 in the previous week.

The Federal Reserve last month left interest rates unchanged at 5.25%, citing an apparent slowing in economic growth. But the Fed said core inflation readings have been elevated and price pressures could be sustained in part by high "resource utilization," a reference in part to tight jobs markets.

Thursday's report shows the number of workers drawing unemployment benefits for more than a week rose in the week ended Sept. 23, the latest week for which such data are available. These continuing jobless claims rose 15,000 to 2,448,000.

In the week ended Sept. 23, the jobless rate for workers with unemployment insurance was 1.9%, unchanged from the previous week. During the same week, a total of 17 states and territories reported an increase in unadjusted claims, while 36 reported a decrease.

Michigan reported the biggest increase, citing layoffs in the automobile industry. Kentucky reported the biggest decline in new claims but didn't comment on the cause. North Carolina also reported a drop in new claims, citing fewer layoffs in the construction, service, lumber, textile and apparel industries.

Brisk Apparel Sales Give A Lift To Many Retailers (WSJ)

By Stephanie Kang And James Covert

Many of the nation's retailers rang up strong apparel sales last month, helped by chillier-than-average weather, late back-to-school spending and a drop in gasoline prices.

High-end department stores and teen-specialty shops reaped the biggest gains, while Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and other discount chains turned in poor to lackluster performances overall in comparison with strong year-earlier sales figures.

An index of 57 major U.S. retailers compiled by the International Council of Shopping Centers showed same-store sales -- or sales at stores open at least a year -- rose 3.8% in September. That was shy of the year-earlier increase of 4%, as well as the trade group's forecast for a 4% gain.

Cool September weather helped accelerate sales of back-to-school merchandise. But that brisk buying may take a toll on this month's sales, and some analysts remain cautious about the coming holiday season. Those analysts point to the cooling U.S. housing market, which could damp consumers' spending. On the positive side, the jobs market appears strong, and the recent decline in oil prices is expected to curb heating bills and gasoline prices this fall.

Michael Niemira, chief economist at the International Council of Shopping Centers, said that, excluding Wal-Mart, same-store sales jumped 6% in September. "Wal-Mart and the discount segment holds back the overall picture," he said. "Overall, it's a steady and consistent performance from the rest of the industry."

Wal-Mart, based in Bentonville, Ark., said September same-store sales rose 1.3%. That fell short of Wall Street's forecast for a 2.2% increase, according to Thomson Financial. The chain's overall September sales rose 12% to $31.21 billion. Wal-Mart said clothing sales during the month were disappointing, but added that it expects better results this winter.

"Our apparel sales did not meet our expectations for the month," said Wal-Mart Chief Financial Officer Tom Schoewe, in a statement. "We're pleased, however, to see early response to seasonal merchandise for fall and the holidays. We are optimistic about holiday-related merchandise like toys and electronics." The company said it expects a same-store sales gain of 2% to 4% this month.

Department stores, particularly those that sell luxury goods, shined last month, as consumers flocked in to buy fall fashions like cigarette pants. Last year sales of fall apparel were hurt by one of the warmest Septembers on record. Mr. Niemira said same-store sales at luxury retailers rose 11% in September, the strongest performance since March 2004.

Seattle-based Nordstrom Inc. racked up a 13% same-store sales gain last month, double the consensus forecast of analysts polled by Thomson Financial. Same-store sales at Saks Inc., Birmingham, Ala., rose 10%, topping the 3.9% analysts were predicting. Federated Department Stores Inc., the Cincinnati-based operator of Macy's stores, also beat expectations, posting a same-store sales increase of 6.2%.

By contrast, big discount chains selling staples performed poorly in the face of tough comparisons with a year earlier, when sales surged from Gulf Coast consumers stocking up in preparation for hurricanes. Same-store sales at Costco Wholesale Corp., rose 4%, just missing analysts' forecasts.

However, discounter Target Corp., Minneapolis, said that favorable weather helped to lift its same-store sales by 6.7%, beating the 5% rise forecast by analysts.

Teen retailer Abercrombie & Fitch Co., New Albany, Ohio, and lower-priced rival American Eagle Outfitters Inc., Warrendale, Pa., benefited from late back-to-school shopping, as many students waited to see what peers wore to school before buying their fall wardrobes. The chains' same-store sales rose 10% and 19%, respectively. Same-store sales at Gap Inc., the San Francisco parent of Gap, Banana Republic and Old Navy, also were better than expected, falling 3%, less than the expected 3.9% decline.

Economists watch monthly same-store sales as an indicator of consumer spending, but some large retailers, such as Home Depot Inc., Sears Holdings Corp. and Best Buy Co., don't report sales on a monthly basis. The figures also exclude many online purchases and other spending.

Retail Sales Strong As Gas Prices Fall (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

Department stores yesterday reported booming sales for September, up 8.4 percent from September 2005 at stores open at least a year, a figure known as same-store sales.

Department stores are doing better than retailers overall. In a survey by the International Council of Shopping Centers of 57 retail chains, sales were up 3.8 percent last month from September 2005.

Retail chain-store sales growth in general has held up well this year, even as rising gasoline prices and interest rates restrained consumer spending on homes, cars and trucks, said Michael P. Niemira, the council's chief economist.

"Consumer spending has been relatively steady" at retail chain stores, said Niemira, who attributed that stability primarily to income growth, which has more influence on consumer spending at retail chains than fluctuating gasoline prices.

Still, the recent decline in oil prices, from more than $77 a barrel in mid-July to around $60 a barrel, has boosted consumer buying power and reduced the risks that economic growth might slow too much, said Nigel Gault, chief U.S. economist at Global

Insight Inc., a financial forecasting firm. Falling oil prices "made a soft landing for the economy look a safer bet," he said, referring to a scenario in which the economy cools just enough to lower inflation without sliding into a recession.

The retailers' results, after reports that vehicle sales rebounded in September, supported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's statement Wednesday that the economy remains strong aside from the slumping housing market.

Enjoying that strength last month were such high-end retailers as Nordstrom Inc., which reported a 13.4 percent gain in same-store sales, and Saks Inc. with a 10 percent increase.

Other stores with strong same-store sales were J.C. Penney Co., Target Corp., Limited Brands Inc. and Federated Department Stores Inc., which reported results only for its Macy's and Bloomingdale's chains. The department-store increase of 8.4 percent for September was more than triple the August increase of 2.7 percent.

Several retailers that cater to lower-income customers posted much weaker results. Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the nation's biggest retailer, reported a relatively feeble 1.3 percent gain in sales at its Wal-Mart and Sam's Club stores open since last year. The company attributed some of the softness to the comparison with its results in September 2005, which were boosted by buying related to Hurricane Katrina in late August.

Gasoline prices affect retailers differently. Wholesalers that sell gasoline benefited as prices climbed above $3 a gallon in early August, but then they were hurt as prices fell to an average $2.31 a gallon nationwide earlier this week. BJ's Wholesale Club Inc., for example, reported a 0.9 percent decline in same-store sales in September.

A 10 percent increase in gasoline prices tends to reduce chain-store sales overall by about 0.4 percent over a year, Niemira has calculated. A similar drop in prices has the reverse effect.

But sales by retailers that cater to lower-income shoppers are more affected than average by changing gasoline prices, while there is little or no effect on high-end store sales, Niemira said. At Wal-Mart, for example, a 10 percent increase in gasoline prices cuts its sales by 0.9 percent.

Wal-Mart has blamed much of its disappointing sales this year on surging gasoline prices. But the company hasn't seen much of a bounce from falling prices.

"Where's the consumer slowdown? At Wal-Mart," Niemira said.

Oil Prices Jump After Opec Cuts Output (FT)

By Chris Flood

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

Crude oil rallied on Thursday after officials from the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries said the cartel had informally agreed to cut output by at least 1m barrels a day.

ICE November Brent rose 91 cents to $60.13 a barrel after having sunk to $57.70 a barrel in the previous session, its lowest level this year.

A move by Opec to cut production for the first time since 2004 has been widely anticipated by the market after Nigeria and Venezuela announced they would reduce output recently.

All Opec countries are expected to take part in production cuts, with Saudi Arabia, the world's top exporter, reducing its output by 300,000 barrels a day.

The announcement drew a negative reaction from Sam Bodman, the US energy secretary who said that the global market still needed Opec's supplies.

The cartel has been moved to action as US stocks of crude oil stand well above their five year average, prompting concerns that prices would decline further if markets remained oversupplied.

"It's a clear signal that Opec wants to defend the $60 level and will provide good fundamental support for prices," said Kevin Norrish of Barclays Capital.

Concerns over disruptions to supplies from Nigeria also provided support for prices yersterday. Nigerian militants claimed they killed 17 soldiers in two separate gun battles on Wednesday and threatened further attacks on strategic oil facilities.

The recovery for crude helped US natural gas prices strengthen. Nymex November Henry Hub rose almost 3 cents to $6.265 per million British thermal units after US weekly inventories data showed a 73bn cubic feet increase in stocks, in-line with market expectations. Stocks currently stand at more than 3.3 trillion cubic feet and on-track to surpass the record of 3.5 trillion by November 1.

Wheat prices reached a fresh 10-year high in Chicago, trading 14 cents higher at $4.79 a bushel on concerns about low stock levels and Brazil's move to become the latest grower to reduce its harvest forecast.

French wheat prices jumped to a 2½ year high, rising €3 to €152 a tonne after Ukraine imposed export licences which may slow export growth.

Copper rose 3.8 per cent to $7,300 a tonne supported by a decline of 2,550 tonnes in London Metal Exchange stocks, helping the price recover most of the sharp fall in the previous session.

Nickel gained 2.9 per cent at $28.900 a tonne while zinc increased 4 per cent to $3,435 a tonne a tonne after LME stocks fell 1,625 tonnes. Aluminium rose 2.9 per cent to $2,547.5.

OPEC Encounters Hurdles In Effort To Trim Output (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

OPEC's president is scrambling to broker an agreement among the cartel's members to cut oil output in an attempt to shore up tumbling crude prices, according to people familiar with the matter. But contentious issues need to be resolved before ministers of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries reach an agreement.

Still, OPEC's attempt to orchestrate an output reduction is raising alarm bells in major consuming countries.

Crude prices have dropped 22% since hitting an all-time nominal peak in mid-July, but they remain more than twice as expensive as three years ago. By talking about tightening the spigot now, OPEC -- which supplies more than a third of the world's daily oil needs -- is signaling that it will try to prevent prices from falling further, even if demand for oil slackens as the world economy slows.

Oil-futures prices went on a roller-coaster ride on the New York Mercantile Exchange yesterday. Crude oil for November delivery settled at $60.03 a barrel, up 62 cents, or 1%. (See related article1.)

After hours of confusion about whether OPEC had already cut a deal, Edmund Daukoru, the Nigerian oil minister, who is also OPEC's president, indicated that the cartel still had a ways to go. "We are toying with the idea of an emergency meeting" that would seek an elusive consensus, he told reporters.

Earlier reports by several news organizations had said OPEC had reached an agreement to cut output by a million barrels a day, or a little less than 4% of the cartel's current production of some 27.5 million barrels a day. But Mr. Daukoru dismissed these claims. Instead, he said, the cartel is hashing out contentious details.

"We agree that something needs to be done," Mr. Daukoru said, referring to output cuts. But "we will have to agree on how much, how soon and how we distribute [the reduction] among member countries."

Under the plan being mooted by some in OPEC, the cartel would slash its oil output by as much as one million barrels a day from current production levels, and each member would cut their output by a similar percentage.

But some members, especially those whose production is lagging, are resisting. There is no agreement on when such a cut should be made. Critically, not everyone agrees on how the cuts should be shared, which has been a major stumbling point in past negotiations about market shares.

The reports that OPEC was seeking to withhold oil from markets ahead of the peak winter heating season alarmed major consumers, who were beginning to breathe a sigh of relief as oil prices swooned in recent weeks.

In the U.S., the world's largest oil market, a spokesman for Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said the American energy czar had urged some OPEC ministers to keep crude markets well supplied. "... At $60 a barrel, it's still among the historically high prices for crude," the spokesman said. In Paris, Jean-Claude Trichet, president of the European Central Bank, told reporters that an OPEC decision to cut output might damage the global economy by artificially raising energy prices.

Despite the risk of a backlash, OPEC officials privately say the cartel is even more fearful of a price rout. They say that swelling commercial inventories of oil, and rising oil production in countries that don't belong to the cartel, could lead to an uncontrollable slide in oil prices in the months to come.

"We are not trying to set a floor at $60" a barrel, said one senior OPEC official. This official also asserted that OPEC was nearing an agreement on output cuts.

Even if OPEC can't reach a deal right away, it has other options. To quickly support prices, OPEC could fudge the issue of market share by not announcing output allocations for each member country. Under that scenario, the cartel could announce a big cut, then work out the shares later.

In any event, many industry officials expect that the bulk of the cuts will have to come from the strongest producers, those that have spare oil-pumping capacity: Saudi Arabia and neighbors such as Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates.

OPEC officials said Saudi Arabia, the cartel's largest exporter, was willing to reduce output in line with its current share of about a third of the total produced by 10 member countries, leaving out Iraq. But countries like Venezuela, Iran and Indonesia are loath to give up their shares, even if they are unused. Complicating this issue are special cases, such as Nigeria's low production levels amid domestic unrest.

All Eyes On OPEC's Actions (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

Oil prices jumped early yesterday on news reports that the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, which supplies about 40 percent of the world's oil, was preparing to cut output to bolster sagging prices. But prices closed virtually unchanged at $60.03 a barrel because it remained unclear how big the cuts would be and whether they would ever take effect.

Early yesterday, Dow Jones Newswires cited an unnamed "OPEC governor and a senior delegate" as saying that the organization had agreed to cut production by 1 million barrels a day.

But OPEC President Edmund Daukoru was quoted by Bloomberg News Service as denying that a formal agreement had been forged. "The consensus that we can all agree on is that the market is very soft," Daukoru said. "It's more or less a free fall."

An oil trader in Europe who had talked to oil officials in three key OPEC countries said that if the cartel cut output, the reduction is unlikely to exceed 400,000 barrels a day -- 75,000 barrels a day from Nigeria, 75,000 to 100,000 barrels a day from Venezuela, 150,000 barrels a day from Saudi Arabia, and between 50,000 and 100,000 barrels a day from Iran.

As is usually the case with OPEC when prices are falling, countries are torn between the desire to pump more versus propping up prices. Many members have pressing needs. Nigeria has already shut down about a third of its output because of insurgent activity. High oil revenue has helped bolster the influence of Venezuela's president, Hugo Chavez. And the windfall for Iran has helped it aid Hezbollah in Lebanon and raise wages at home.

Gas Prices Dropping More Slowly (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Many drivers who are hoping for sub-$2-a-gallon gasoline in the near future will likely be disappointed.

The price at the pump, which until recently was rapidly plunging, has been falling at a slower rate. Such a slowdown suggests retail gasoline prices will likely still be above $2 a gallon in most of the USA at the end of October, say energy analysts from Wachovia, Oil Price Information Service (OPIS), Cameron Hanover and others.

The nationwide average price for a gallon of regular gasoline was $2.290 Thursday, down a half-cent from the day before and 44 cents below a month ago, according to motor club AAA. The U.S. average gasoline price is down nearly 25% from the peak of $3.036 two months ago.

But the nationwide average price isn't likely to drop much further for two main reasons:

Oil prices rose Thursday amid reports that OPEC was preparing to cut production to stem falling prices, although the organization of oil producers has not announced any official cutbacks. The price of oil trading for November delivery rose 62 cents to $60.03 a barrel.

•Refineries. Some refineries typically reduce production in the fall for maintenance. With gas prices lower, refineries may scale back even more than usual, Moody's Economy.com economist Rakesh Shankar says, reducing gas supplies and propping up prices.

Still, some consumers may see gas prices below $2 a gallon. OPIS analyst Tom Kloza says there is "great diversity" in prices across the USA. "If you were traveling from Maine to New Orleans, you could almost plan your trip with stops where you could get gas below $2," Kloza says.

Poll Says Democrats Favored To Win House, Maybe Senate (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

Democratic candidates enjoy an advantage "in almost every campaign" and now stand a better than even chance of winning a House majority, the bipartisan Battleground Poll released yesterday concluded.

The poll's conclusions closely resemble dismal predictions of a nearly certain net loss of at least 15 and as many as 30 House seats for the GOP that other top-rated Republican campaign pollsters and strategists confided earlier this week to The Washington Times.

Democrats also now show an increased probability of taking the Senate, according to the Battleground survey by Democrat pollster Celinda Lake and Republican Ed Goeas.

"As the national trend gets worse, that is a problem for a lot of our top endangered incumbents. As Republican voters are less motivated than Democratic voters, it does make it look like we could potentially lose the Senate as well," Mr. Nienaber said.

He cited Republican Sens. Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania as three particularly threatened incumbents. Democrats need to a net gain of six seats to take the Senate.

He said an expected depressed turnout of social conservatives will have the "greatest impact on who controls the Senate."

Mr. Nienaber said the Northeast is the GOP's worst region for the November elections. It was 37 percent Republican and 36 percent Democrat in February on the congressional generic ballot but now is only 33 percent of voters saying they will vote for the Republican and 57 percent saying they will go for the Democrat.

The Sept. 24-27 Battleground Poll of 1,000 likely voters was conducted before the scandal surrounding Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, began making headlines.

"The political environment is certainly a hindrance for Republicans in almost every campaign, and voters are much more resistant to hearing the Republicans' side of the story," Mr. Goeas said in a written analysis.

In 2000, Mr. Bush had been leading most polls before it was reported that he had hidden his youthful drunken-driving arrest. Miss Lake and Mr. Nienaber yesterday agreed that revelation cost Mr. Bush at least 4 million votes. The expectation now is that the Foley scandal -- in which the former congressman is accused of making sexually explicit comments to teenage congressional pages -- may similarly depress the GOP's religious conservative turnout this year.

The so-called "security moms" -- who worry about terrorism at home and gave Mr. Bush's party the advantage in the 2002 and 2004 elections -- "are not voting terrorism this time," said Miss Lake. "They give the administration a nine-point advantage on terrorism but give Democrats a 15-point advantage on the problems that matter most to them -- education, health care and the economy."

The Associated Press reported that an AP-Ipsos poll released yesterday, "found that about half of likely voters say recent disclosures of corruption and scandal in Congress will be very or extremely important" in their decisions when they cast their votes next month.

Brian Nienaber And Celinda Lake (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, October 6, 2006

Often pollsters with different backgrounds look at the same data and come to different conclusions.

But that was not what happened when representatives from the Battleground Poll briefed reporters Thursday morning at a Monitor sponsored breakfast. Pollsters from both parties saw trouble ahead for Republicans in the 2006 elections.

What makes the Battleground Poll different from many others is its bipartisan nature. The poll, sponsored by George Washington University, is conducted jointly by the Tarrance Group, a Republican firm, and by Lake Research Partners, a company that serves Democratic clients.

When Tarrance Group vice president Brian Nienaber was asked about Republican prospects for retaining control of Congress, he said, "The trend here is negative ... if this continues and election day was tomorrow, I think control of both houses of Congress would be in jeopardy, not only the House but the Senate."

"It is a better day to be a Democrat than a Republican," said Celinda Lake, president of Lake Research Partners. "The most important number to watch is Bush's job approval number," she said. "In this poll he had popped up a little bit. He had gotten to 45 percent. In the most recent public polls in the last couple of days he is back down to 40 percent, 39 percent ... if his job approval is 38 or 39 percent ... it looks like we are guaranteed to take back the House. If his job approval is 44-45 percent, [a Democratic victory] becomes in jeopardy."

The latest version of the 15-year-old Battleground Poll was conducted September 24-27 among 1,000 registered voters and has a margin of error of 3.1 percent. Given the survey's timing, it does not capture voter reaction to the House page scandal. But the scandal's effects will not be good for Republicans, both pollsters agreed.

"The three issues on which Republicans polled a clear advantage are terrorism, safeguarding America from terrorism, keeping taxes low, and protecting moral values. I think moral values is not going to be part of our tool kit anymore," Nienaber said wryly.

"I think the turnout game is a big piece of this," Lake said. She was referring to the expectation that Christian conservatives, who are a key part of the Republican party's base, may not vote in the midterm election given their disappointment with Republican Congressional leaders.

Lake also noted that time Republicans spend dealing with the scandal, "is two weeks when the president can't get his message through except on the Woodward book and it is two weeks when the Republicans can't get their message through. It feeds the desire for change in Washington and checks and balances."

Race For Senate Control Tightens (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats are within striking distance of winning control of the Senate in the Nov. 7 elections, USA TODAY/Gallup Polls in six key states show as the campaigns head into their final month.

The number of Republican-held seats with competitive Democratic challengers has expanded to include Virginia and Tennessee, where Democrat Harold Ford Jr. now holds a 5-percentage-point lead over Republican Bob Corker among likely voters.

In Missouri, GOP Sen. Jim Talent narrowly trails Democrat Claire McCaskill, and in Rhode Island, Sen. Lincoln Chafee faces a double-digit deficit against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse. The surveys, taken Sept. 27 to Oct. 1, have error margins of +/-5 percentage points for the likely-voter samples.

The landscape has improved for Democrats since the USA TODAY/Gallup state polls taken just before Labor Day. “You'd have to say they have at least a 50-50 shot at winning control,” says political scientist Alan Abramowitz of Emory University. “That's certainly better than anybody expected a few weeks ago.”

Democrats must gain six seats to win control.

Reports of more deadly violence in Iraq and the scandal involving a GOP lawmaker and congressional pages are factors, says Charlie Cook of the non-partisan Cook Political Report: “Clearly, we've seen momentum shift away from the Republicans and toward the Democrats.”

President Bush is a liability in the six states polled. In mostly Democratic Rhode Island, likely voters say by more than 3-to-1 that they are more likely to back a candidate who opposes Bush than one who supports him. Even in Republican-leaning Virginia, voters by 3-2 favor a candidate who would challenge Bush.

But in Maryland, another Democratic seat targeted by the GOP, Ben Cardin leads Republican Michael Steele by a wide 15 points. Among other findings:

Democrats also are hopeful of ousting GOP incumbents in Ohio, Montana and Pennsylvania. Fewer than half of the 33 Senate seats on the ballot are considered competitive.

In the new polls, voters in all six states combined who said they would vote largely out of party loyalty supported Democrats by 2-1 — a sign that Democratic partisans are more energized than Republican ones.

GOP's Hold On Evangelicals Weakening (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

ANOKA, Minn. -- Lynn Sunde, an evangelical Christian, is considering what for her is a radical step. Come November, she may vote for a Democrat for Congress.

Sunde, 35, manages a coffee shop and attends a nondenominational Bible church. "You're never going to agree with one party on everything, so for me the key has always been the religion issues -- abortion, the marriage amendment" to ban same-sex unions, she said.

That means she consistently votes Republican. But, she said, she is starting to worry about the course of the Iraq war, and she finds the Internet messages from then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to teenage boys "pretty sickening." When she goes into the voting booth this time, she said, "I'm going to think twice. . . . I'm not going to vote party line as much as to vote issues."

Even a small shift in the loyalty of conservative Christian voters such as Sunde could spell trouble for the GOP this fall. In 2004, white evangelical or born-again Christians made up a quarter of the electorate, and 78 percent of them voted Republican, according to exit polls. But some pollsters believe that evangelical support for the GOP peaked two years ago and that what has been called the "God gap" in politics is shrinking.

A nationwide poll of 1,500 registered voters released yesterday by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center found that 57 percent of white evangelicals are inclined to vote for Republican congressional candidates in the midterm elections, a 21-point drop in support among this critical part of the GOP base.

Even before the Foley scandal, the portion of white evangelicals with a "favorable" impression of the Republican Party had fallen sharply this year, from 63 percent to 54 percent, according to Pew polls.

In the latest survey, taken in the last 10 days of September and the first four days of October, the percentage of evangelicals who think that Republicans govern "in a more honest and ethical way" than Democrats has plunged to 42 percent, from 55 percent at the start of the year.

Here in Minnesota's conservative 6th Congressional District, the loosening of the GOP's hold on religious voters is helping Patty Wetterling, an antiwar Democrat, run an unexpectedly close race against Republican state Sen. Michele M. Bachmann, who has made opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage her signature issues.

This week, Wetterling became the first Democrat in the country to air a television advertisement about the Foley scandal.

"It shocks the conscience. Congressional leaders have admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman . . . ," the commercial said, adding that Wetterling is "demanding a criminal investigation and the immediate expulsion of any congressman involved in this crime and coverup."

Wetterling is best known as an advocate for missing children. Her 11-year-old son, Jacob, was abducted in 1989 and never found. The uproar over Foley's sexual correspondence with teenage employees of Congress has played into her political strength.

"This is something we all watched with churches years ago, where they didn't do anything. Congress has no excuse -- they know better," she said in a telephone interview.

The incumbent, Rep. Mark Kennedy (R), is vacating his seat to run for the Senate. The national GOP has spared no effort to bolster Bachmann. President Bush, Vice President Cheney, political strategist Karl Rove, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez all have been out to campaign for her.

Unlike some Republican candidates across the country, Bachmann is not running away from Bush. She says she is "thrilled" to be associated with him.

But the president's ratings have slipped even within his most loyal constituency. Since the start of his second term, Bush's favorability rating has dropped from 52 percent to 42 percent among all adults, and from 71 percent to 60 percent among white evangelical Protestants, according to Washington Post-ABC News polls.

"I think he's too set in his way to listen to what's really going on in Iraq," Sunde said. She noted that her rising concern about the war "possibly could" lead her to cross party lines and vote for Wetterling.

She is not alone in Anoka, Garrison Keillor's hometown and a place that, like the imaginary Lake Wobegon, defies stereotypes about religious conservatives.

"If you're pro-life and mad about the war, where do you go? That's the Bachmann-Wetterling race in a nutshell," said state Rep. Jim Abeler, 52, a Republican who represents part of the 6th district.

Jim Bernstein, 56, a Democrat who served as Minnesota's commerce commissioner under then-Gov. Jesse Ventura, agreed: "There are a lot of people here who say, 'I'm pro-life, but I'm also concerned about health care, about education, about jobs.' "

Across the country, many Democratic candidates are wooing religious voters by talking about their faith. Wetterling is not among them. Her campaign manager calls her "a very spiritual woman," but says: "We have her all over the district now, so much so that she's not able to attend church."

Bachmann, on the other hand, attends an evangelical megachurch and is known for her unsuccessful effort to put a state constitutional amendment against same-sex marriage on the November ballot. If same-sex marriage spreads, she has warned, "public schools would have to teach that homosexuality and same-sex marriages are normal, natural and that maybe children should try them."

Christopher P. Gilbert, a political scientist at Gustavus Adolphus College in central Minnesota, said there "haven't been a lot of candidates in Minnesota who closely associate themselves with the Christian right, but Bachmann has. She's the real deal when it comes to religion in politics."

Nationally, the Republicans' once formidable hold on churchgoing voters has begun to slip. Among those who say they attend church more than once a week, the GOP still holds a commanding lead. The main shift is among weekly churchgoers, about a quarter of all voters. Two years ago, they favored the GOP by a double-digit margin. But in the new Pew survey, 44 percent leaned toward Republicans and 43 percent toward Democrats, a statistical dead heat.

The slippage is particularly striking among evangelicals. According to Pew data, the portion of white evangelical Protestants who identify themselves as Republicans rose steadily from 2000 to 2004 but leveled off this year at about half. The percentage who support keeping troops in Iraq has dropped to 55 percent, from 68 percent in early September.

"The allegiance of evangelicals has been more in flux over the past 12 months, suggesting that the considerations going into their votes are changing," said Scott Keeter, Pew's director of survey research.

In addition to the war and congressional scandals, those considerations may include a broader definition of religious issues. Some influential ministers, such as the Rev. Rick Warren, author of the bestselling "The Purpose-Driven Life," are urging evangelicals to fight poverty, safeguard the environment and oppose torture on biblical grounds.

To the extent that evangelicals now view these issues as "matters of conscience" alongside abortion and same-sex marriage, they could shift some votes into the Democratic column, said Ron Sider, head of the group Evangelicals for Social Action.

Another factor in evangelicals' changing loyalties may be the efforts of Democrats to reach out to them. In Michigan, evangelical pastors helped write the preamble to the state party's new platform. "Democrats in this state are seeking the Common Good -- the best life for each person of this state. The orphan. The family. The sick. The healthy. The wealthy. The poor. The citizen. The stranger. The first. The last," it says.

But before Democrats take credit for the shift, they might ponder one of the findings in a recent survey of 2,500 voters by the Center for American Values, a project of the left-leaning People for the American Way Foundation: Republicans have lost more support (14 percentage points) than Democrats have picked up (4 points) among frequent churchgoers.

That rings true to Michael Cromartie, an expert on evangelicals at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, a Washington think tank. "Erosion for evangelicals doesn't necessarily lead to Democratic voting. It leads to nonvoting," he said.

Republican strategists are hoping the drop will prove temporary.

"There is a dip in support for the GOP among religious conservatives, no question," said Leonard Leo, head of Catholic Outreach at the Republican National Committee.

"People of faith were disaffected over the summer, but I think they'll come back," he added. "It's like any other election season -- people get frustrated that they haven't achieved everything they want. But as you get close to the election, you begin to look at the alternatives and realize that staying home is going to make things worse rather than better."

Iraq Still Issue Number One For US Voters (AFP-Y)

By Stephanie Griffith

AFP, October 5, 2006

Iraq remains the top issue for US voters ahead of next month's crucial midterm elections according to a national poll, which also found Americans surprisingly unmoved by the congressional sex scandal currently dominating Washington.

"Iraq has become the central issue of the midterm elections," said researchers with the Pew Research Center, in a statement that accompanied the survey.

"There is more dismay about how the US military effort in Iraq is going than at any point since the war began more than three years ago," the statement read.

"The war is the dominant concern among the majority of voters who say they will be thinking about national issues, rather than local issues, when they cast their ballot for Congress this fall."

The comprehensive poll of 1,800 respondents sampled voter opinions on a broad range of top issues, from immigration, to the war in Iraq, to the falling price of energy.

The poll found found that 58 percent of the US public believes the US military effort in Iraq is not going well, 47 percent say the war is hurting, not helping, the fight against terrorism.

The survey also found Americans remarkably unaffected by the scandal over the handling of lurid sexual messages sent by former Republican lawmaker Mark Foley to teenage pages in Congress -- at least with respect to next month's legislative and gubernatorial balloting.

The Pew Center found that Democrats had a 51 percent to 38 percent advantage over Republicans before last week's scandal broke, and 50 percent to 37 percent edge after.

Among voters who said national issues were of paramount importance for them, about half -- 51 percent -- cited the deteriorating situation in Iraq as the most important concern. Terrorism came in second place at 37 percent while 35 of respondents cited the economy.

Another important recent development -- the drop in the price of gasoline -- also appeared not to have impacted voter feelings greatly. The survey showed that while most respondents were aware of the recent fall in gas prices, they were also likely to complain about a faltering US economy.

The poll put US President George W. Bush's job approval rating at 37 percent, with 63 percent of respondents saying they are dissatisfied with the way things are going in the country.

As with earlier Pew surveys, an unusually high percentage of voters -- 39 percent -- envision their ballot as a vote "against" Bush rather than for him.

The survey found the current climate to be particularly treacherous for incumbents, with 27 percent of voters saying they do not want to see their own representative win reelection in the fall, down from 32 percent in June.

But anti-incumbent feeling seemed less pronounced than in the historic 1994 midterm elections, when voters ousted Democrats from the leadership of the House of Representatives, the Pew researchers noted.

The survey, conducted from September 21 to October 4, had a sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

AP, October 5, 2006

GLADWYNE, Pa. - Former President George H.W. Bush said Thursday that a Democratic takeover of Congress would be a "ghastly thing for our country."

"This is more than party versus party, it is the idea that if we have some of these wild Democrats in charge of these committees it will be a ghastly thing for our country," Bush said.

Democrats would need to gain six seats in the Senate and 15 in the House in the Nov. 7 general election to gain control of each chamber. Bush cited the effect of a Democratic takeover on GOP members of Congress, including Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., as well as on the president.

"I would hate to think what Sen. Arlen's life would be like, what Rick's life would be like, and my son's life would be like if we lose control of the Congress," Bush said.

The Democrats, he said, "just have a very different view ... and they'd be pushing all kinds of crazy legislation."

The fundraiser raised about $270,000 for Santorum, who has trailed Democrat Bob Casey, the state treasurer, in polls. Casey received fundraising assistance Thursday from former President Bill Clinton. The event was closed to the press.

The two former presidents were in Philadelphia Thursday to receive the Liberty Medal for work on behalf of victims of Hurricane Katrina and the South Asian tsunami.

Rumble In Rhode Island (NSWK)

By Lee Hudson Teslik

Newsweek, October 6, 2006

In the increasingly binary world of American politics, Rhode Island has earned its nonconformist reputation. The state has more voters registered as “unaffiliated” than either Republican or Democrat. One of their senators, Lincoln Chafee, was the only Republican to vote against the Iraq war, opposed Samuel Alito’s nomination for the Supreme Court and refused to vote for President Bush in 2004 (he voted for the president's father as a write-in vote). But now, after eking out a primary victory last month with strong support from the national Republican Party, Chafee trails Democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse by about two points, according to the latest polls.

In a state whose symbol is “The Independent Man,” a Whitehouse victory could spell a political sea change. Whitehouse, who was formerly the state's attorney general, has campaigned on an aggressively national platform, saying not just Rhode Island's future but “the structure of power in Washington” is at stake. Opponents have criticized Whitehouse for telling people to vote for the Democratic Party without presenting any specific platform of his own. Chafee, for his part, has touted his independent voting record—with limited success—and analysts have said a Chafee loss could signal the decline of the distinctly northeastern brand of Rockefeller Republicanism.

As part of NEWSWEEK’s ongoing Face Off series, Lee Hudson Teslik interviewed both candidates. Excerpts:

Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee

NEWSWEEK: In the past you've taken some heat from your own party, essentially for not being "Republican enough." You voted against Alito, against the Iraq war—even against the president himself in 2004.

And the tax cuts, right. Given all this, was it surprising to have the Republican Party come out so strongly for you in your primary?

No, I'll take help from anybody who offers it. That was a tough primary, and I've worked hard at having good relations with my party, despite having differences on some issues.

Were you contacting them or did they reach out to you?

Well I just think that due to the relationships that I've worked on over the last six years, they wanted to help. They realize that I've voted my conscience, but they respect that.

Rhode Island isn't a particularly Red State. Does it worry you that support from leaders of the Republican Party could hurt you?

Well my message to the Rhode Island voters is that I excel at working with everybody. I work with Democrats, conservatives, liberals and independents, and that pays off for Rhode Island.

But there are three times as many Democrats as Republicans in the state. You don't think people could react negatively when they see the national Republican leadership so strongly in your camp?

Yes, Rhode Island is arguably the most Democratic state in the country, so I understand what you're saying. On the same token, I vote my conscience and I'm able to develop good relations with everybody and deliver for Rhode Island when it counts.

There are Democrats in the Senate with more conservative voting records than you. Ben Nelson of Nebraska is an example. Why do you consider yourself a Republican?

Well we northeastern Republicans are what I call the original Republican Party. Fiscal responsibility, that used to be a Republican issue. Certainly caring for the environment, that is a Republican issue. Supporting personal liberties, and the freedom of people to make very personal decisions on their own—I think that's traditional Republicanism; an aversion to foreign entanglements, that too. And we've been successful in the northeast at electing Republican governors, when you think about it. New York has had a long string; George Pataki has had a long run; the mayors of heavily Democratic New York City, first Mayor Giuliani, now Mayor Bloomberg; Connecticut has had a string of Republican governors, Massachusetts, even Vermont has had a Republican governor. So in the northeast, our brand of Republicanism is maybe different from the change that has swept the [national] party.

Given this shift, is there a future for these northeastern Republicans—some people call them Rockefeller Republicans. Are they dying out?

Well I think this election is going to be important to make a stand, to say we want people governing from the middle. Certainly my candidacy is one that's in the spotlight on that.

People have said that Sheldon Whitehouse, your opponent, is telling people to vote for a party, not a man. Do you think that's a legitimate criticism?

I think eventually Rhode Island voters are going to want something more from the candidates than just to vote for a party. He has no other message. I call it the Peggy Lee campaign: "Is that all there is?"

Rhode Island has more voters registered as "unaffiliated" than Republicans or Democrats—more than 350,000 of them. Why are there so many?

That's another thing that has changed with the times. People here don't register with parties as much as they used to. Before coming to the Senate, I was mayor of my city, and the board of canvassers office was right near the mayor's office, and I'd check in every once in a while to see how people were registering. It was overwhelmingly, as we call them in Rhode Island, "unaffiliated." They like the freedom to make their votes on primary day in the Republican primary or the Democratic primary. In the old days, these people were much more aligned with parties. I know when my dad [Sen. John Chafee] served in politics, in the '60s, the party endorsements were so influential in the outcome of elections, and that's just not the case now.

Have you ever considered billing yourself as an Independent?

No, you have to caucus here in the Senate with one party. And so once you make that decision, you run under that label. And in Rhode Island, Republicans are seen as the party of reformers.

Democratic Challenger Sheldon Whitehouse

NEWSWEEK: Senator Chafee's father, John Chafee, was a Rhode Island senator before him, and the family has very prominent roots in the state. In a way you're running not just against Lincoln Chafee, but the family name and all the weight it carries in Rhode Island. Has that been frustrating for you?

Sheldon Whitehouse: I think it's an asset for Senator Chafee, and it's one that I'm very familiar with, as our families have been very friendly over the years. I knew his father extremely well. But in this particular race, I think that the voters in Rhode Island are so concerned and upset about the direction in Washington, that the question that will be in their minds in the voting booths won't be, "Is Senator Chafee a nice guy, and was his father a good guy before him?" but rather, "Is our country going in the right direction?" And clearly the answer to that question is no.

You have said many times that your race could be a key to Democrats regaining control of the Senate. Some critics have said that you've put this goal over anything specific to Sheldon Whitehouse. In other words, that you're telling people to vote for a party and not a man. Do you think that's unfair?

It's inaccurate if you actually look at how my campaign has developed. We've put out very clear policies on fixing the prescription-drug plan that is harming so many seniors. We've come out with a very specific new energy strategy. We've spoken extensively about the need for health-care reform and the role I would like to play in health-care reform. We've put forward a specific plan for shoring up Social Security. We've really been out there strong on the issues.

Senator Chafee has the most liberal voting record of any Republican in the Senate. Indeed, there are some Democrats who have more conservative records. Shouldn't those conservative Democrats be more of a concern to you than someone like Lincoln Chafee?

The game plan that Democrats will pursue in Washington is radically different from the failed course that the Bush administration has pursued. Whether individual senators might not be totally on board with every element of that game plan, that's really the ultimate determination here. Who sets the agenda, and what direction it takes us. And there's a colossal difference between what Democratic leadership would do, and what Republican leadership has shown us.

Senator Chafee voted against Samuel Alito for Supreme Court, he was the only Republican to not vote for the Iraq war—in 2004 he didn't even vote for Bush for re-election. Is it at all disingenuous to pin him too closely politically to President Bush?

Not a bit, because the key factor is that he votes to put the Republican leadership in charge that drives that agenda. He may have voted against Iraq, but we are in Iraq notwithstanding. He may have voted against Alito, but we have Alito on the Supreme Court notwithstanding. The ultimate decision is who's driving. Democratic leadership will lead us in a much better direction.

I think we need to announce as soon as we can that that's what we plan to do. Then it's a matter of troop safety, and getting them out as rapidly as makes practical sense, again with troop safety in mind. I think that creates a very significant diplomatic opportunity once the insurgency sees that we're not there to occupy their country, once the factions see that time is short and they're really going to have to get serious about making the decisions they have to make about their own country, and third that the international community sees that in fact we are on our way out, and it invests them in a whole different way in participating in a resolution of the Iraqi conflict. But I think the immediate thing that needs to happen to put all those things in motion is a clear and unequivocal decision that we are going to start withdrawing our troops as rapidly and sensibly as troop safety will permit.

What happens if when we're ready to go, to use a hackneyed expression, the mission isn't complete; if things are still going haywire over there. Should we still pull out?

Well the question you have to ask is: "Is the present strategy likely to lead to a better result?" My answer to that is no. Recently we've seen that confirmed by some of the internal reports that have been developed by analysts within the administration. I think we are on a path that leads toward a disaster over there, and it is pure stubbornness that keeps the administration from changing to a more effective policy.

You have a personal connection to these diplomatic issues—your father was a Foreign Service officer. Where were you when you were growing up?

Cambodia, South Africa, Congo, although they were shooting at each other then so the family stayed home, Guinea on the west coast of Africa, the United Nations, Vietnam, Laos and Thailand.

It was interesting. I'll tell you one thing that stands out from my time in Vietnam. You could see intact in Saigon essentially all the infrastructure that we're trying to build now in Iraq. Political infrastructure, utility infrastructure, public safety and military infrastructure: it all was there when I was living there with him in 1973. It wasn't too long later, less than two years I believe, that we had pulled out. All that infrastructure intact, and yet this happened. I think it's the kind of thing that should have given this administration a lot more pause before it ventured on its misguided war in Iraq.

Let me ask you about the war on terror. There hasn't been a major attack since 9/11, and some people say we've disrupted the financial networks of terrorist organizations. How do you think we've done on this front?

No president following 9/11 would not engage in trying to fight the elements that want to produce terror acts in the United States of America and elsewhere. But I think a lot of the judgments that have been made—in terms of failing to fund border, container and port security; in terms of putting so many resources into the Iraq war and taking them away from Afghanistan, which was a front where we seemed to be winning—I think there clearly was a better way. We've now really compromised our military capability and the asset of our standing in the world without really improving our standing in the war on terror.

So how do we move forward?

Extracting ourselves from Iraq will help. Shoring up the effort in Afghanistan will help. And focusing really hard on the terror cells, a lot of which requires working behind the scenes with other nations. But this requires better relations than we've been able to maintain, and a more thoughtful and aggressive diplomacy.

Times Get Tougher For Ohio's Republicans (FT)

By Holly Yeager

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

Standing in front of the fire department in Zanesville, a small Ohio town near the middle of the state, Republican Mike DeWine is doing his best to persuade voters to elect him to a third term in the US Senate.

Legislation he worked on has brought $100m (€79m, £53m) to fire departments in the state, Mr DeWine says.

A few minutes later he shifts the topic to national security, holding up a sheet of paper that he says contains evidence of his opponent's past votes to cut intelligence spending.

But Mr DeWine, clad in a white shirt and tie, is having a hard time getting his message across. Only a handful of people - active Republicans in the community - had been alerted to his visit. The whistle of a passing train makes it hard to hear some of what he says.

He takes questions from the two reporters on hand - about congressman Mark Foley's exchange of suggestive messages with a young page and the need for more jobs in the region - and then mingles with the firefighters, one of whom complains about all the negative adverts this campaign season.

Recent opinion polls show him in a virtual tie with Sherrod Brown, the liberal Democratic congressman - a surprise to many in the state.

But the polls are clear evidence that the series of scandals that have engulfed Ohio Republicans at home and in Washington, including congressman Bob Ney's guilty plea in a scandal involving the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, have made a difficult political year even more troublesome for them.

The state, long a bellwether in presidential politics, is ground zero for the November 7 mid-term elections: the outcome of Mr DeWine's race and several other closely watched House contests are likely to determine which party wins control of Congress.

Perhaps most worrying for Republican activists is the poor performance to date of Ken Blackwell, the conservative Republican who hopes to take over from Robert Taft, the unpopular Republican governor who pleaded guilty to ethics charges.

Mr Blackwell gained national attention in 2004 when, as Ohio secretary of state, he drew criticism for the long lines and other troubles that some voters faced.

Recent opinion polls show him trailing Ted Strickland, his Democratic opponent, by more than 15 percentage points, and party officials fear that having such a weak candidate at the top of the ticket could help to put several top jobs in the hands of Democrats.

Democrats sense the opportunity. "We need change at the Statehouse, at the governor's house, and we need change in the United States Congress," said Mary Jo Kilroy, the Democratic candidate for Congress, at a campaign rally this week at Ohio State University. Some of the biggest cheers during her speech came for the school's top-ranked football team.

The other big cheers came when John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, declared: "We need to get those troops out of Iraq".

Ms Kilroy frequently complains that Deborah Pryce, the seven-term House member she hopes to unseat, has been a "rubber stamp" for President George W. Bush and his Iraq policy.

The close contest in this district around Columbus, the state capital, has also caught the Republicans off guard.

Ms Pryce, a member of the Republican leadership team, was forced this week to answer questions about how Mr Foley's messages were handled, and, like Mr DeWine, she says the political climate is "a tough one".

But, she says, "the earth won't stand still" - she is hoping to return soon to a debate of issues such as the "war on terror", the economy and immigration.

With just a month until election day, Ms Pryce and her fellow Republicans have their work cut out if they are to boost the enthusiasm of voters.

Robert Sicuro, a retired attorney who has voted for her in the past, says he probably will support Ms Pryce again, but only grudgingly.

"I don't think she's the most effective person in the world," he says, adding that he worries more about Ms Kilroy's support for tax increases as a county commissioner.

Mr Sicuro is "not too happy" with Mr DeWine either. But he also expects to vote for him again, calling Mr Brown "too far left for my taste" and complaining that Democrats "don't really have a plan" for Iraq.

But Bonita Hall, an office worker who is eating her lunch on a bench on the capitol grounds, says that although she calls herself a Republican, she does not think she will be able to support the party's candidates this time around.

"Right now, they seem like the good 'ole boys, a club that protects one another no matter what they do," she says. "Maybe we need some new ideas."

A Senate Race's Ads Absurdum (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

SEATTLE -- Here in Washington state we don't care for partisanship and negativity, which leaves our candidates with not much to talk about. "Look," says Republican Senate candidate Mike McGavick, "if the Republican Party came to me and said, 'Mike, we want you to vote against the families of your state,' I'd tell them to go jump. I'll choose the people of our state every time."

Wow. This must be one of those "hard choices" McGavick, a former insurance executive, says he is prepared to make if he is sent to the Senate. He does not supply any other examples. My idea of a hard choice would be having to choose between the short-term interests of the people -- yes, even the families -- of your state and the long-term interests of the nation. Through the fog of generalities, McGavick appears to see things differently.

A news release entitled "Mike Takes a Tough Line on Federal Spending Reforms" is mostly about federal grants to the University of Washington. But he supports this spending, of course, and deplores the cuts that have been made in it, which he attributes to "budget mismanagement." He made this point in a day spent campaigning with Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, who was here in his capacity as a Hispanic and not as anyone who might bear responsibility for the federal budget.

If you knew nothing about Mike McGavick except what is in his TV commercials and on his Web site, you would conclude either that he is a moron or that he thinks you are a moron. Democratic incumbent Maria Cantwell's ads aren't so wonderful either. They're mainly about all the federal money and other favors she's brought to the state. But if any of this is part of the "pork barrel . . . wasteful, out-of-control spending" that upsets McGavick, he doesn't say so.

And of course there is a subtext to each of the inanities in McGavick's commercials. They have all been focus-grouped and market-tested. For example, in one news release expressing his "disappointment" (I bet) that Cantwell had voted against some tax cut, McGavick says, "This isn't really about Senator Cantwell." It's about "partisan nonsense." Cantwell is (the headline mentions) "Following Party Over State's Interests."

Now ask yourself: Why would she do that? Why would she put her party's interests over those of her constituents? Who cares enough about either party to actually put their own political futures in peril? Answer: no one. Taken literally, the charge is absurd. But it's not meant to be taken literally. It is just part of the miasma of themes and images that political professionals create around candidates. Cantwell is popular, partisanship is not. So blame partisanship and not Cantwell. Be for "families." Be for "change." Be against "Washington, D.C." and "lobbyists."

The media do a better and better job each election cycle at pointing out and analyzing these campaign constructs. But by doing so, in a way, they legitimize it all. By raising up the subtext, they diminish the importance of the text. Don't be naive: You're not supposed to take this stuff literally. Politicians are trying to push your buttons. They aren't trying to communicate with you.

In a radio spot this week called "Not Paying Attention," McGavick says, "Folks in Washington, D.C., you know they must not think we are paying attention" to "some of the things they are getting away with." In a rare particular, he blames "automatic pay raises" for creating bad incentives for members of Congress. "We've got to have change," he says, "but the only way to do that is to change who represents us."

Maria Cantwell hit it big in the dot-com boom and is a very rich woman. She has spent tens of millions of dollars on her election and reelection campaigns. Whatever her flaws, she cannot possibly care about a pay raise. Taken literally, the notion that any national politician assumes that the voters and media and opposition party are "not paying attention" is equally ridiculous. So what is her motivation? What is McGavick's, for that matter? (He's rich, too, having struck gold in just a few years in the insurance business.)

In an age when senators have almost no power to affect the actual course of events, and when most of them don't seem to have any particular notion of what they would do with that power if they had it -- McGavick certainly doesn't -- why anyone bothers to be a senator is a fascinating question. Is Cantwell devoting her life to betraying the families of Washington just for the fun of it?

McGavick has no explanation, except to say that "this stuff is nuts," that it is "partisan nonsense" and so on. But Maria Cantwell is not nuts. "Nuts" is not a plausible explanation. And without any specifics or a plausible explanation, McGavick's complaints are exceptionally empty.

Knowing virtually nothing about McGavick, I saw one of his 30-second spots last week and took an instant, personal and possibly unfair dislike to him. And I wonder why everyone doesn't have the same reaction to these patronizing, insulting commercials. Maybe some do -- McGavick is going to lose, apparently -- but more must be turned on than are turned off, because McGavick is not nuts either.

Dems Aim To Gain Majority Of Governorships (USAT)

USA Today, October 6, 2006

Thirty-six states will elect governors in November, and Democrats hope to gain a majority of the USA's governorships for the first time since 1994. Republicans now hold 28 seats nationwide, Democrats 22. More GOP-held seats are up this fall: 22 vs. 14 now held by Democrats. Taxes, charter schools, gas prices and embryonic stem cell research are among the issues defining the contests.

Big state takeovers:

Democrats are confident of winning back governorships in two of the USA's biggest states. In New York, Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has a yawning lead in statewide polls over Republican John Faso, former state Assembly minority leader. In Ohio, Democratic congressman Ted Strickland leads Republican Secretary of State Ken Blackwell by double digits in statewide polls.

Minorities:

Three African-Americans have major-party nominations for governor. They are Democrat Deval Patrick in Massachusetts and Republicans Ken Blackwell in Ohio and former Pittsburgh Steeler Lynn Swann in Pennsylvania. The only African-American who has been elected governor in the USA is Virginia's Doug Wilder, in 1989. In New Mexico, Gov. Bill Richardson, who is Hispanic, is running for a second term.

Women:

A record five female incumbent governors are running for new terms, in Arizona, Connecticut, Hawaii, Kansas and Michigan. Three are Democrats, two Republicans. Five other female candidates have major-party nominations and are in competitive contests: Democrats in Alabama and Nevada and Republicans in Alaska, Illinois and Massachusetts.

Scandals:

The Jack Abramoff lobbying investigation that has affected some congressional races isn't a factor for governors, but local scandals have scarred some contests. In Ohio, the Republican establishment is entangled in charges of improprieties in handling state pension funds. That has complicated the campaign of GOP gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell. Among Democrats, Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich and Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle have had to deal with allegations of wrongdoing in their administrations. Both races are considered competitive.

Stepping down:

One Democratic and eight Republican governors are stepping down. Five of them didn't have a choice: governors in Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Nevada and Ohio faced term limits.

Stepping up?

At least four governors who are stepping down are testing the waters for the 2008 presidential race. They are Democrat Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Republicans Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, George Pataki of New York and Mitt Romney of Massachusetts.

Alaska:

Gov. Frank Murkowski ran a dismal third in the GOP primary. Republicans hope former Wasilla mayor Sarah Palin can hold the seat. Democrat Tony Knowles, a former two-term governor, is trying to regain it.

Michigan:

Gov. Jennifer Granholm, a rising star in the Democratic Party, is in an unexpected tossup against Republican Dick DeVos. The Amway heir is spending millions of his personal fortune on ads that hammer Granholm over the state's economic woes.

Arkansas:

Democrats hope to regain the governorship that launched Bill Clinton in national politics. Democratic Attorney General Michael Beebe faces Republican Asa Hutchinson, a former House member and Homeland Security Department official.

California:

A year ago, Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger seemed imperiled as governor of the nation's largest state. He has rebounded, though he isn't considered a safe bet yet. State Treasurer Phil Angelides is the Democratic challenger.

Massachusetts:

Whoever wins will break new ground. Democrat Deval Patrick would be the first African-American governor in the Bay State; Republican Kerry Healey would be the first woman elected governor. Republicans have held the governorship in this Democratic stronghold for 16 years.

Florida:

Presidential brother Jeb Bush is barred by term limits from running again. After lively primaries in both parties, Republicans nominated state Attorney General Charlie Crist, Democrats Rep. Jim Davis. Both are political moderates from the Tampa Bay area.

Subsidies Keep Airlines Flying To Small Towns (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

DOJ_NMG_0076411

PUEBLO, Colo. — Hoping for an empty seat beside you on your next flight? No problem — just schedule a trip to someplace like Kingman, Ariz.; Brookings, S.D.; or Pueblo.

They are among more than 100 locales around the country that receive federally subsidized airline service, and the average number of passengers on each flight is about three.

Most of these flights on 19-seat prop planes have plenty of elbow room — a rare luxury in this age of jampacked commercial jets. Some major airlines have cut their fleets about 20 percent since 2001 and have abandoned unprofitable routes, meaning planes are flying fuller than at any time since World War II.

The more tranquil cabins come courtesy of the Essential Air Service, put in place when the airline industry was deregulated in 1978. The idea was to help travelers in smaller cities adjust to the new competitive era of air travel. The intention was for the service to go away after 10 years, but it was renewed for a second decade — and then made permanent.

Over time, though, the program has come to seem mostly expensive and, to its critics, unessential.

After all, travelers adjusted very well after deregulation, and started driving the extra distance to busier regional airports nearby that offered increasingly cheap and plentiful jet service. That left the program with mostly empty planes, making them more costly to fly. Add in higher maintenance and fuel costs, and spending has more than quadrupled since 1996, to $110 million.

That, of course, is not a lot in the federal scheme of things. But the program is a good case study of how poorly the government sometimes keeps pace with the free market and consumer tastes, and how entrenched interests, even in the face of some creative map-drawing, can keep such a program aloft in the face of efforts to ground it.

Mike Boyd, a consultant to airports, said truly remote routes — those in Alaska, northern Maine, parts of the Western states — should be retained. But he said that most routes should be eliminated.

"The Essential Air Service program is one of those well-meaning federal programs that often results in money wasted on trying to recreate those wonderful days of the 1950's," Mr. Boyd said in a recent note to clients. "Somebody needs to tell Congress that Ozzie and Harriet are gone."

From Lewistown, Mont., Jerry Moline, the airport manager, is used to driving 110 miles to shop at the Wal-Mart in Great Falls. Likewise, most of his neighbors drive 125 miles to the airport in Billings, which has jet service, rather than fly there on the subsidized 19-seaters. The Lewistown flights attracted fewer than three people a day in 2005; each passenger's one-way ticket was subsidized with $472.78 paid by taxpayers.

The emptier the subsidized flights, it seems, the more cherished the program became. Members of Congress regularly pressured the Transportation Department to continue subsidies to towns they represented. A lobbying group sprang up solely to fight to preserve and expand the program.

To qualify for Essential Air Service, towns must have had scheduled commercial air service in October 1978 when deregulation occurred; be at least 70 miles from a large or medium hub airport; and be able to attract service from a regional airline with a one-way per passenger subsidy of no more than $200.

For towns more than 210 miles from a large or medium hub, however, there is no cap on the subsidy per passenger.

After Sept. 11, 2001, airlines withdrew from some smaller unsubsidized markets and more cities needed subsidies to maintain service. That pinched the Essential Air Service budget.

Over the next several years, the Transportation Department tried to weed out some locales.

The agency took a harder look at its map and decided that Brookings, S.D., was less than 210 miles from the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport; that Alamogordo, N.M., was similarly close to Albuquerque's airport; and that Lancaster, Pa., was less than 70 miles from Philadelphia's airport.

At those distances, Lancaster did not qualify for any subsidy and the two other markets qualified only for $200 or less per passenger, far less than needed to sustain service.

The towns made tempting targets. Flights from Brookings, which is less than an hour's drive from jet service at Sioux Falls, were attracting about three passengers a day. Alamogordo drew four or five a day. Both required big subsidies. And Lancaster is not that far from competitive airports, with Southwest Airlines bringing low fares to Philadelphia and Baltimore.

The towns and a lobbyist, Maurice Parker, president of Regional Aviation Partners — it is financed by the Mesa Air Group, which flies subsidized routes — swung into action. The termination notices persuaded Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, and others in Congress to pass legislation that required the Transportation Department to measure the distances along the most commonly traveled routes. It also gave the governor of each state the final word on the matter.

"Lancaster is 66 miles from the Philadelphia International Airport if you travel along Route 30, which is the old Lincoln Highway, where there is a traffic light every other block," Senator Specter said in introducing the legislation in June 2003. He added that "any rational person" would take Interstate 222 to the Pennsylvania Turnpike, a faster route, at about 80 miles. Similar arguments were made for Alamogordo and for Brookings.

The termination efforts were dropped. And all three markets retained subsidized service. Transportation Department officials declined to comment. Michael W. Reynolds, an acting assistant secretary, in testimony before a Senate subcommittee last month, said towns had come to view the program as "an absolute entitlement."

Regional airlines in the program are paid a subsidy that, combined with fares they expect to collect from passengers, will allow for a profit. Fares vary widely. A recent one-way ticket from Pueblo to Denver, bought a few days before the flight, was $124.50.

Kerry Caruselle, a tax preparer for Army employees, was ready for the unexpected when she flew a Great Lakes 19-seater prop plane from Denver to her home in Pueblo last week. On her last flight on that route, a bumpy turboprop trip about a decade ago, she said, "My kids were in middle school and they both threw up."

Last week's 30-minute flight was smooth, yet Ms. Caruselle was the only passenger. "Just me," she said. There was also a pilot and a co-pilot but no flight attendant.

Colorado Springs Airport, offering nonstop jet service to 14 major cities, is about 40 miles away. Denver's huge hub is within about 110 miles. In fiscal 2005 Pueblo's two daily subsidized flights to Denver drew a combined five passengers a day.

"That may be generous," confided Jerry Brienza, manager of the Pueblo Memorial Airport. "We were close to three a day last year." The government calculated the one-way subsidy at $255.06 a passenger.

Traffic has picked up to about eight a day in 2006, Mr. Brienza said.

Excluding Alaska, where many air routes are subsidized, the Transportation Department paid out about $74 for each one-way passenger in the program in fiscal 2005. That is more than Amtrak's famously large per passenger subsidy, which is $19 to $52, depending on how it is calculated.

The Bush administration now wants to cut funding to $50 million. So, the Transportation Department is proposing changes to reduce the program costs. Towns more than 100 miles away from a large or medium hub would have to chip in on the subsidy. Towns closer than 100 miles would get a partial subsidy — for bus service to a hub.

But a perennial favorite with much of Congress, Essential Air Service seems unlikely to face cuts. Spending panels in each house of Congress favor a slight increase in funding for fiscal 2007, to $117 million. Many in Congress regard the program as a good way to connect remote towns to the air service system.

Probably the biggest beneficiary in recent years has been the Raytheon Company. It manufactured the 19-seat Beech 1900 prop planes that fly most of the subsidized routes. Tighter safety rules enacted in the mid-1990's made operating those more expensive. And the rapid spread of regional jets preferred by passengers forced Raytheon to halt production of the 1900 in 2002.

Having financed the acquisition of most of the 1900's by regional carriers and others, Raytheon faced huge losses. It in essence still owned 511 of the planes valued at $1.6 billion. It wrote the value of those planes down by $693 million in 2001. Since then, it has slowly been selling the planes in overseas markets, but is still stuck with 218 of them as of June 25 of this year, valued at $435 million.

Without the subsidies, most of the roughly 100 1900's remaining today in the United States could be idled, said Jonathan Ornstein, chief executive of Mesa Air, which once operated 122 of the planes and has cut its fleet to 20.

"We don't make money in the program; we do it because we have the equipment" and owe more than $1 million on each of the planes, Mr. Ornstein said. Mesa, with annual revenue of more than $1 billion, mostly operates jets now. "No one I'm aware of has figured out how to operate the 1900 outside the Essential Air Service program."

D.C. Charity Specializes In Donations Of The Intangible (WT)

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

For many, philanthropists are the rich and famous people who donate millions to projects.

But Greater DC Cares, a District-based nonprofit, is assigning a new definition to the word "philanthropy" by allowing donations of professional skills through pro bono consulting to hundreds of new nonprofits in the region.

Spokeswoman Dee Ellison said accountants, Web designers and college professors with communications expertise have viable skills that could help new nonprofits get started.

"People generally think of philanthropy as dollars," Ms. Ellison said. But "skilled volunteers [are] just as valuable as the dollars because they help increase the capacity of the nonprofits that serve our community. And the end result is we make the community stronger and healthier."

Founded in 1989, Greater DC Cares has 16,000 volunteers working with more than 400 nonprofits. Officials estimate that volunteers provide more than 60,000 hours of service annually in the region.

Under the pro bono consulting program, about 200 professionals are working with new nonprofits on about 30 projects, in which they help to develop Web sites, craft mission statements, create budgets, write grants and market their organizations.

The group also works with several large corporations, such as America Online, whose employees offer their professional services to build Web sites and laboratories for schools.

Noel Tieszen is a former teacher who last year founded Interstages Inc., an afterschool program that provides low-income middle school girls in the District's Ward 7 with lessons in music, history and self-esteem. The group also provides one-on-one academic help.

Ms. Tieszen called the consultation she received from a Greater DC Cares accountant, grant writer and publicist "fantastic."

"As a startup, this was a one-woman show," she said. "I know how to balance my checkbook, but you can't run a business that way. Greater DC Cares has been a great resource in helping us make our dollars go further, and it also helps me free up time to develop relationships with the students and do fundraising."

Today, about 10 Winston Educational Center girls gather each afternoon at the Hillcrest Recreation Center in Southeast for piano and voice lessons by volunteers attracted with the help of DC Cares' marketing consultant.

The grant writer is helping Ms. Tieszen develop proposals that will allow her to take the girls on field trips, buy musical instruments and school supplies, and hire more employees to help expand the program.

The girls in the class, who at a recent meeting played a game in which they named positive female role models of color, said Interstages has taught them problem-solving skills, about womanhood and respect for others.

"I learned to always be on time," said Shakiera Williams, 12. And "if you don't like somebody, it's best to write it down on a piece of paper [and talk it out]. Before, I just handled it by fighting."

Shauntice McCorkle, 12, an aspiring singer, agreed.

"They ask us what our goals are," she said.

Donny Tiengtum, director of programs at Greater DC Cares, said the group's goal is to stretch the funds of nonprofits in the region by including at least one or two pro bono volunteers.

"It would be intriguing to see if we could get any department of a nonprofit -- marketing, technical, financial -- to be completely run by a team of pro bono consultants, not having to spend [lots of] dollars on staffers in that regard," he said.

Evangelicals Fear The Loss Of Their Teenagers (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

DOJ_NMG_0076414

Despite their packed megachurches, their political clout and their increasing visibility on the national stage, evangelical Christian leaders are warning one another that their teenagers are abandoning the faith in droves.

At an unusual series of leadership meetings in 44 cities this fall, more than 6,000 pastors are hearing dire forecasts from some of the biggest names in the conservative evangelical movement.

Their alarm has been stoked by a highly suspect claim that if current trends continue, only 4 percent of teenagers will be "Bible-believing Christians" as adults. That would be a sharp decline compared with 35 percent of the current generation of baby boomers, and before that, 65 percent of the World War II generation.

While some critics say the statistics are greatly exaggerated (one evangelical magazine for youth ministers dubbed it "the 4 percent panic attack"), there is widespread consensus among evangelical leaders that they risk losing their teenagers.

"I'm looking at the data," said Ron Luce, who organized the meetings and founded Teen Mania, a 20-year-old youth ministry, "and we've become post-Christian America, like post-Christian Europe. We've been working as hard as we know how to work — everyone in youth ministry is working hard — but we're losing."

The board of the National Association of Evangelicals, an umbrella group representing 60 denominations and dozens of ministries, passed a resolution this year deploring "the epidemic of young people leaving the evangelical church."

Among the leaders speaking at the meetings are Ted Haggard, president of the evangelical association; the Rev. Jerry Falwell; and nationally known preachers like Jack Hayford and Tommy Barnett.

Genuine alarm can be heard from Christian teenagers and youth pastors, who say they cannot compete against a pervasive culture of cynicism about religion, and the casual "hooking up" approach to sex so pervasive on MTV, on Web sites for teenagers and in hip-hop, rap and rock music. Divorced parents and dysfunctional families also lead some teenagers to avoid church entirely or to drift away.

Over and over in interviews, evangelical teenagers said they felt like a tiny, beleaguered minority in their schools and neighborhoods. They said they often felt alone in their struggles to live by their "Biblical values" by avoiding casual sex, risqué music and videos, Internet pornography, alcohol and drugs.

When Eric Soto, 18, transferred from a small charter school to a large public high school in Chicago, he said he was disappointed to find that an extracurricular Bible study attracted only five to eight students. "When we brought food, we thought we could get a better turnout," he said. They got 12.

Ms. Dunford spoke late last month as she and her small church youth group were about to join more than 3,400 teenagers in a sports arena at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst for a Christian youth extravaganza and rock concert called Acquire the Fire.

"A lot of my friends are self-proclaimed agnostics or atheists," said Ms. Dunford, who wears a bracelet with a heart-shaped charm engraved with "tlw," for "true love waits," to remind herself of her pledge not to have premarital sex.

She said her friends were more prone to use profanity and party than she was, and added: "It's scary sometimes. You get made fun of."

To break the isolation and bolster the teenagers' commitment to a conservative lifestyle, Mr. Luce has been organizing these stadium extravaganzas for 15 years. The event in Amherst was the first of 40 that Teen Mania is putting on between now and May, on a breakneck schedule that resembles a road trip for a major touring band. The "roadies" are 700 teenagers who have interned for a year at Teen Mania's "Honor Academy" in Garden Valley, Tex.

More than two million teenagers have attended in the last 15 years, said Mr. Luce, a 45-year-old, mop-headed father of three with a master's degree from the Graduate School of Business Administration at Harvard and the star power of an aging rock guitarist.

"That's more than Paul McCartney has pulled in," Mr. Luce asserted, before bounding onstage for the opening pyrotechnics and a prayer.

For the next two days, the teenagers in the arena pogoed to Christian bands, pledged to lead their friends to Christ and sang an anthem with the chorus, "We won't be silent." Hundreds streamed down the aisles for the altar call and knelt in front of the stage, some weeping openly as they prayed to give their lives to God.

The next morning, Mr. Luce led the crowd in an exercise in which they wrote on scraps of paper all the negative cultural influences, brand names, products and television shows that they planned to excise from their lives. Again they streamed down the aisles, this time to throw away the "cultural garbage."

Trash cans filled with folded pieces of paper on which the teenagers had scribbled things like Ryan Seacrest, Louis Vuitton, "Gilmore Girls," "Days of Our Lives," Iron Maiden, Harry Potter, "need for a boyfriend" and "my perfect teeth obsession." One had written in tiny letters: "fornication."

"Lord Jesus," Mr. Luce prayed into the microphone as the teenagers dropped their notes into the trash, "I strip off the identity of the world, and this morning I clothe myself with Christ, with his lifestyle. That's what I want to be known for."

Evangelical adults, like believers of every faith, fret about losing the next generation, said the Rev. David W. Key, director of Baptist Studies at the Candler School of Theology of Emory University, in Atlanta.

"The uniqueness of the evangelical situation is the fact that during the 80's and 90's you had the Reagan revolution that was growing the evangelical churches," Mr. Key said.

Today, he said, the culture trivializes religion and normalizes secularism and liberal sexual mores.

The phenomenon may not be that young evangelicals are abandoning their faith, but that they are abandoning the institutional church, said Lauren Sandler, author of "Righteous: Dispatches from the Evangelical Youth Movement" (Viking, 2006). Ms. Sandler, who calls herself a secular liberal, said she found the movement frighteningly robust.

"This generation is not about church," said Ms. Sandler, an editor at Salon.com. "They always say, 'We take our faith outside the four walls.' For a lot of young evangelicals, church is a rock festival, or a skate park or hanging out in someone's basement."

Contradicting the sense of isolation expressed by some evangelical teenagers, Ms. Sandler said, "I met plenty of kids who told me over and over that if you're not Christian in your high school, you're not cool — kids with Mohawks, with indie rock bands who feel peer pressure to be Christian."

The reality is, when it comes to organizing youth, evangelical Christians are the envy of Roman Catholics, mainline Protestants and Jews, said Christian Smith, a professor of sociology at the University of Notre Dame, who specializes in the study of American evangelicals and surveyed teens for his book "Soul Searching: the Religious and Spiritual lives of American Teenagers" (Oxford, 2005).

Mr. Smith said he was skeptical about the 4 percent statistic. He said the figure was from a footnote in a book and was inconsistent with research he had conducted and reviewed, which has found that evangelical teenagers are more likely to remain involved with their faith than are mainline Protestants, Catholics, Jews and teenagers of almost every other religion.

"A lot of the goals I'm very supportive of," Mr. Smith said of the new evangelical youth campaign, "but it just kills me that it's framed in such apocalyptic terms that couldn't possibly hold up under half a second of scrutiny. It's just self-defeating."

The 4 percent is cited in the book "The Bridger Generation" by Thom S. Rainer, a Southern Baptist and a former professor of ministry. Mr. Rainer said in an interview that it came from a poll he had commissioned, and that while he thought the methodology was reliable, the poll was 10 years old.

"I would have to, with integrity, say there has been no significant follow-up to see if the numbers are still valid," Mr. Rainer said.

Mr. Luce seems weary of criticism that his message is overly alarmist. He said that a current poll by the well-known evangelical pollster George Barna found that 5 percent of teenagers were Bible-believing Christians. Some criticize Mr. Barna's methodology, however, for defining "Bible-believing" so narrowly that it excludes most people who consider themselves Christians.

Mr. Luce responded: "If the 4 percent is true, or even the 5 percent, it's an indictment of youth ministry. So certainly they're going to want different data."

Outside the arena in Amherst, the teenagers at Mr. Luce's Acquire the Fire extravaganza mobbed the tables hawking T-shirts and CD's stamped: "Branded by God." Mr. Luce's strategy is to replace MTV's wares with those of an alternative Christian culture, so teenagers will link their identity to Christ and not to the latest flesh-baring pop star.

Apparently, the strategy can show results. In Chicago, Eric Soto said he returned from a stadium event in Detroit in the spring to find that other teenagers in the hallways were also wearing "Acquire the Fire" T-shirts.

"You were there? You're a Christian?" he said the young people would say to one another. "The fire doesn't die once you leave the stadium. But it's a challenge to keep it burning."

Big Ideas And No Boundaries (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

My rabbi told this joke on Yom Kippur: At the front of the lunch line at a parochial school was a bowl of apples with a sign that read: "Take only one. God is watching." At the end of the lunch line, after the entrees, was a bowl of cookies, where a student had put up a sign: "Take all you want. God is watching the apples."

Somehow that joke reminds me of the debate about free trade in America today. Right now, with the Republicans in charge, free trade is secure. Yet, while everyone is watching the front of the line, out back in the country, an erosion of support for free trade is under way. The "Doha" trade talks have stalled, because of opposition by U.S. farmers, and the White House's "fast-track" authority to negotiate free trade agreements expires soon. With protectionist-leaning Democrats likely to take the House or Senate, any new free-trade accords will probably be stalled.

I hope Democrats won't go this route. I've always believed in free trade, accompanied by better pension and health care safety nets. But I'm not a free trader anymore. I'm now a radical free trader. Why? Because in this new era of globalization, so many people now have the communication and innovation tools to compete, connect and collaborate from anywhere. As a result, business rule No. 1 today is: Whatever can be done will be done by someone, somewhere. The only question is whether it will be done by you or to you. In such a world, the way our society flourishes is by being as educated, open and flexible as possible, so more of our people can do whatever can be done first. It matters that Google was invented here.

"That society which has the least resistance to the uninterrupted flow of ideas, diversity, concepts and competitive signals wins," says Nandan Nilekani, C.E.O. of the Indian tech giant Infosys. "And the society that has the efficiencies to translate whatever can be done quickly — from idea to market — also wins."

The old left thinks free trade is something that benefits only multinationals. In fact, it is now critical for small businesses and individuals, who can now act multinationally. They are the ones who create good jobs.

Last week, I was in Nebraska, where I met Doug Palmer. He and his partner, Pat Boeshart, make insulated concrete forms for buildings. The traditional way to insulate concrete with foam is to make the foam and then truck it around the country to building sites to be attached to concrete. Mr. Palmer's company, Lite-Form, found a Korean machine that, when combined with devices added by his firm, can make the foam and concrete together on site, saving big dollars in trucking. Today, Mr. Palmer's South Sioux City company imports these machines from Korea, attaches its devices and exports them to Kuwait. His company has an Arabic brochure that tells Kuwaitis how to use the device. The brochure was produced by a local ad agency owned by the Winnebago Indian tribe of Nebraska. The agency was started by the tribe's economic development corporation. Midwest Indians publishing Arabic brochures for Nebraskans importing from Koreans for customers in Kuwait ...

"Protectionism scares me," said Mr. Palmer, who has 28 employees. "If we put up a moat and keep doing what we're doing, thinking we're the smartest in the world, we're going to die. We have to have that flexibility to barter and trade."

A few days later, in Silicon Valley, I met Arijit Sengupta, a young Indian-American educated at Stanford, whose company, "BeyondCore," developed a software algorithm able to detect and reduce errors in outsourced back-office work. When I met Mr. Sengupta, he handed me a card with his logo, which, he explained, was designed by a graphic artist he found online in Romania. His database and Web server are freeware, and he has outsourced his marketing, sales support and patent filings to Indian firms. When I asked, "Where's your office?" he held up his BlackBerry, which takes calls forwarded from numbers in India, Boston and Palo Alto. He and his seven workers already have one Fortune 500 client.

"When I started this company I never had to think about geography," he said. "All I had to think about was: Where was the best resource to get something done. ... What you need are the big ideas. That is the tough thing to come up with."

The way you keep good jobs in this country is not by building big walls, but by attracting people with big ideas — and then giving them the freedom to do whatever can be done with anyone, anywhere, anytime.

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

OF THE PACKAGE OF MEASURES, from 1A to 1E, that the Legislature placed on the November ballot, Proposition 1A is the odd man out. All the others are multibillion-dollar bond issues intended to shore up the state's crumbling infrastructure; 1A is a tweak to the Legislature's budgeting authority and a "fix" to a similar initiative from four years ago. It would tie Sacramento's hands and ensure that future fiscal emergencies cut more deeply into vital state services. Californians should vote no on Proposition 1A.

The measure is the latest of many misguided efforts to dedicate state revenue toward a specific use — in this case, transportation. This is almost never a good idea. Such earmarks restrict the government's flexibility and leave the Legislature unable to react when the money is needed for something else.

At issue is the gasoline sales tax. There are several different taxes on gasoline — the federal government takes 18.4 cents a gallon; the state charges another 18 cents in excise tax and then adds 6% in sales tax to the total purchase price. The 18-cent excise tax is a straightforward user fee, rightly charging drivers for the cost of building and maintaining roads and public transit. The sales tax is a different matter.

Until 2002, it was treated much like the sales tax on any other product — most of the revenue raised went into the general fund. Then voters passed Proposition 42, which dedicated the funds to transportation while allowing legislators the safety valve of dipping into the till with a two-thirds vote and approval from the governor. This turned out to be a low hurdle; the Legislature, citing revenue shortfalls, raided the gas sales tax twice in the last three years.

Proposition 1A makes that more difficult. It specifies that any gas sales tax money shifted out of the transportation fund has to be repaid, with interest, within three years, and that such raids be allowed only twice in a decade. It also specifies that the money already taken has to be paid back by 2016.

The underlying problem is that California's spending on transportation infrastructure isn't keeping up with demand. The 18-cent gas excise tax hasn't been raised in more than a decade, hasn't kept up with inflation and hasn't been supplemented adequately by general budget funds. The legislative analyst's office estimates that between the 1998-99 fiscal year and today, inflation-adjusted gas tax revenues declined 8% while the number of vehicle miles traveled in the state rose 16%. This will only worsen over time as vehicles get more fuel efficient.

Proposition 1A does nothing to solve this. Instead of taking sensible steps, such as gradually raising the gas excise tax, indexing it to inflation or mustering the legislative will to direct more money to transportation, Proposition 1A simply puts a straitjacket on the Legislature. Voters should reject it.

U.S. Weighs Sanctions Against North Korea (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

WASHINGTON, Oct. 5 — The Bush administration is developing an extensive list of possible new sanctions against North Korea in the event that it carries through with its threat to conduct a nuclear test, senior officials said Thursday.

The measures under consideration include renewing efforts that have been unsuccessful in the past — persuading South Korea and China to cut off energy supplies and trade — and potentially confrontational steps that include intercepting and inspecting sea shipments into and out of the country.

Many of the sanctions have been considered before, as part of a long-running argument within the Bush administration over the best way to deal with North Korea. After a series of emergency meetings, including one on Tuesday at the White House, officials on each side of that debate said a nuclear test would end the argument about whether the United States should emphasize rewards or penalties.

"If the test happens, all the arguments are over," said one senior official in the midst of the debate. "We'll end up going to full-scale sanctions; the only debate is what 'full-scale' means."

On Wednesday night, Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asia and Pacific affairs and a leading proponent of making new creative diplomatic offers to the North, announced that "we are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea."

Administration officials concede that the United States has been living with a nuclear North Korea for years. But the fact that North Korea has not yet tested its weapons has created enough diplomatic ambiguity that President Bush has not had to confront how he would enforce his own declaration in 2003 that he would never tolerate a nuclear-armed North Korea.

American intelligence agencies have long declared that North Korea has produced the fuel for nuclear weapons, but in recent days, their briefings have also included an assessment based on the expectation that the North is likely to make good on its threat to conduct an underground test.

The briefings include the important caveat that such assessments are based more on an evaluation of the political environment and North Korean strategy than on physical evidence that a test is imminent. The briefings were described by several government officials, who said they did not forecast a specific timetable.

The question of sanctions is an enormously delicate one, which officials will not discuss on the record because the issue is still under debate. The officials who did discuss them, however, came from both camps in the administration, and they appeared unified in sending North Korea a warning that a test would galvanize Washington into actions that some administration hawks have proposed for years.

Mr. Bush, several officials said, planned to call the president of China, Hu Jintao, in coming days to urge him to send an emissary to North Korea to deliver a sharp warning about the consequences of a test. They said Mr. Bush was also planning to call other leaders in the region.

Frederick Jones, a National Security Council spokesman, would only say, "Our objective is to try to use our influence, and the influence of others, to convince the North Koreans that they should not test a nuclear device."

But American officials are clearly concerned that the appeal to Beijing will not prove sufficient. "The last time the Chinese did this after the missile tests" that North Korea launched in early July, "their delegation was left cooling their heels for days," one senior official said. Others cautioned that China always shied away from the ultimate sanction, cutting off the North's oil, for fear that it could set off an economic or political collapse that would result in chaos along the border.

So for now the United States is seeking to win agreement on a "president's statement" from the United Nations Security Council warning North Korea against a test. But the threatened test comes as the administration is already trying to persuade the Security Council to make good on its threat to impose sanctions against Iran for defying a call for it to suspend uranium enrichment. That situation is the subject of a meeting in London on Friday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will attend.

Some American officials are concerned that adding North Korea to the list of countries the United States wants punished could complicate those efforts and fracture a fragile coalition. But the under secretary of state for political affairs, R. Nicholas Burns, said in a telephone interview on Thursday that he did not believe the Council was growing either weary or leery of threatening sanctions.

"You haven't heard a single country support the North Koreans this week," Mr. Burns said. "And we have made it very clear that should they test, we will work for a Chapter VII resolution at the Council," a reference to the section of the United Nations Charter that declares a country's act to be a threat to peace and security, and can pave the way for retaliation.

The potential sanctions against North Korea are described in a series of classified options papers that have been circulating among senior administration officials.

The proposed sanctions, which are graduated, could begin with a significant tightening on economic transactions — a process that began last year with action against a small bank in Macao that is widely believed to have handled transactions for President Kim Jong-il and other leaders, and that American investigators say was involved in money laundering.

A more escalated measure would involve inspection of all shipping, using a provision of a Security Council resolution passed after the July missile tests that allows nations to block missile or missile-related transactions.

But the reality is that North Korea receives most of its goods over the Chinese and Russian borders. Kurt Campbell, a former Defense Department official who specializes in Asia and is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said, "Without leveraging the Chinese to put firm pressure on, very little can be accomplished by the U.S. through sanctions."

North Korea Urged To Cancel Nuclear Test (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 6, 2006

Security Council experts reached agreement late Thursday on a statement urging North Korea to cancel its planned nuclear test and return immediately to talks on scrapping its nuclear weapons program, but the text needs final approval from council members.

Japan's U.N. Ambassador Kenzo Oshima said a statement "most likely" would be approved and read out on Friday morning after capitals give final approval.

"There are some changes, new inputs from members, but basically the original draft that we presented for discussion — the thrust of it is maintained," he said.

The original Japanese draft expresses "deep concern" over North Korea's announcement Tuesday that it would conduct a nuclear test and urges the North not to carry it out.

It warns Pyongyang that a nuclear test would bring international condemnation, "jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond," and lead to further unspecified council action.

The Japanese draft also urges North Korea to return immediately to six-party talks on its nuclear program and work toward implementation of a September 2005 agreement in which the North pledged to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees. The six-party talks involve the two Koreas, the United States, China, Japan and Russia.

North Korea has boycotted the six-nation talks for a year, angered by American financial restrictions imposed over the North's alleged illegal activities such as money laundering and counterfeiting.

Oshima said still to be settled is whether the council will issue the text as a presidential statement or a press statement. Presidential statements become part of the council's official record, but press statements do not, though they reflect the council's unanimous thinking.

While all council members view the possibility of a North Korea test with alarm, there were different views on how to approach Pyongyang's announcement.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said the United States wanted "a strong response" from the Security Council, not just "a piece of paper." But China, Russia and Japan indicated they wanted a more moderate initial response.

S. Korea, Russia Try To Stop N. Korea (AP)

The president of South Korea reportedly ordered his government to send a "grave warning" to North Korea about the consequences of a nuclear test, and Russia said it was trying to dissuade Pyongyang from conducting it.

Amid the rising tensions, Japan's Kyodo News agency said a U.S. military plane capable of detecting radiation took off from southern Japan, believed to be part of U.S. efforts to monitor for signs of a North Korean test.

North Korea threatened Tuesday to conduct a nuclear test to prove it is a nuclear power. Pyongyang claims it has nuclear weapons and needs them to deter a U.S. attack, but hasn't performed any known test to verify that.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun huddled in Seoul with his top security adviser and ordered his government to send the "grave warning" to North Korea about the consequences of a test, Yonhap news agency reported.

Roh also ordered the government to draw up a "contingency plan" if the nuclear standoff with North Korea worsens, Yonhap reported, citing unidentified presidential staff. At the same time, he instructed his government to step up diplomatic efforts to forestall a North Korean test, the report said.

Calls to the presidential office went unanswered on the first day of a three-day holiday.

In Warsaw, Poland, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow was trying to dissuade North Korea from testing a nuclear weapon.

"We must do everything so that that doesn't happen," Lavrov said at a news conference. "We are working with the leadership of North Korea to stop steps that could negatively impact the situation."

The North's announcement also prompted outcry from China, the North's main ally. Beijing's ambassador to the United Nations urged Pyongyang Wednesday not to go ahead with a test, warning of "serious consequences."

Wang Guangya said at the U.N. that "no one is going to protect" North Korea, if it goes ahead with "bad behavior."

"I think if North Koreans do have the nuclear test, I think that they have to realize that they will face serious consequences," Wang said Wednesday.

The comment was China's most forceful public response yet to its ally's announcement Tuesday, and a break with Beijing's usual conciliatory strategy of avoiding warnings to or criticism of the North.

Beijing — the North's main source of food and fuel aid — had previously appealed for restraint but hasn't said what it might do if Pyongyang detonates a bomb.

The rebuke could spell trouble for North Korea, which faces a relatively united front against its nuclear aspirations, in sharp contrast to the fractured reaction to a series of North Korean missile tests in July. At that time, China accused Japan of overreacting in calling for sanctions.

Kyodo reported the U.S. military plane had taken off from southern Japan, and public broadcaster NHK carried video of what it said was a U.S. plane taking off from the U.S. air base at Kadena, Okinawa.

Col. Anne Morris of U.S. Forces Japan refused to confirm the Kyodo report, saying she was not authorized to talk specifically about ongoing operations, but she said U.S. forces were on alert for any moves by the North.

"Of course, everybody is being vigilant. But the U.S. position remains that we hope North Korea will allow the situation to be resolved diplomatically," she said.

Earlier Thursday, a pro-North Korean newspaper based in Japan warned that Pyongyang was not bluffing.

"The nuclear test statement was not empty language, but announced on the premise of action," the Choson Sinbo said. "Carrying out a nuclear test is an inevitable conclusion ... under a condition where (the country) declared possession of nuclear weapons in February last year."

The paper, run by an association of North Korean residents in Japan, is not part of the North's official media but is considered one of its propaganda tools. Its articles are believed to reflect the country's position.

It hedged its warning by saying the crisis can be overcome if the U.S. begins to take action toward denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula with "the same goal" of North Korea.

In his first reaction to the North's announcement, Roh called Wednesday for a "cool-headed and stern" response and ordered his government to let the North know what the consequences would be if it goes ahead with a test.

Associated Press writers Edith M. Lederer at the United Nations and Ryan Lucas in Warsaw, Poland, contributed to this report.

New UN Leader To Tackle N Korea (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

South Korean foreign minister Ban Ki-moon, who is set to be confirmed as the next United Nations secretary-general on Monday, said on Thursday he would use his UN mandate directly to tackle North Korea over its nuclear programme.

Amid the international uproar over Pyongyang's threat this week to conduct a nuclear test, Mr Ban told the Financial Times he would visit North Korea in a bid to convince the rogue state to join diplomatic negotiations rather than indulge in "negative activities".

"Secretary-general Kofi Annan has made a lot of contributions and taken initiatives by appointing a special envoy, but unfortunately during the last 10 years he has not been able to visit North Korea," Mr Ban said.

"As I have gained a much deeper understanding and experience into the inter-Korean relationship, including North Korea, I think I will be in a much better position to handle this issue as secretary-general," he said.

"As the South Korean foreign minister there may be some limitations, but as secretary-general of UN, I think I will be able to handle this with North Korean authorities and South Korean authorities to facilitate inter-Korean co-operation and the six-party process."

"If necessary, I will take my own initiatives to visit both North and South Korea and I will try to engage [Pyongyang] myself," he said.

Japan and South Korea warned of severe consequences should Pyongyang undertake a nuclear test. China also warned North Korea of "serious consequences" – Beijing's sharpest rebuke yet in response to Pyongyang's stated intentions.

Wang Guangya, China's ambassador to the UN, said "no one is going to protect" North Korea, if it went ahead with "bad behaviour".

Rumsfeld Ponders Nuke Test Ramifications (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 5, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Thursday if North Korea successfully tests a nuclear weapon, it will show weakness on the part of the international community.

"And that failure ... is something that the international community would have to register and ask itself how comfortable are we being that ineffective in this situation," Rumsfeld told reporters at the Pentagon during a visit by Croatian Defense Minister Berislav Roncevic.

His comments came as U.S. officials warned North Korea anew not to test a nuclear weapon.

"It isn't in their interest and it isn't in anyone's interest," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the top U.S. negotiator on the communist country's nuclear program, told AP Television. "We will not accept a nuclear state."

Rumsfeld also said that a successful North Korean test could prompt other countries to pursue nuclear weapons.

"Because of the ineffectiveness, and the lack of cohesion and the inability to marshal sufficient leverage to prevent North Korea from proceeding toward a nuclear program ... it will kind of lower the threshold, and other countries will step forward with it," Rumsfeld said.

He added that depending on whether the test is above or below ground, the United States has as good a capability of detecting it as any country. But he declined to say whether or not it would trigger any U.S. military action.

"I wouldn't be the person who would make a decision like that. That's a decision for the country, and a decision for president," Rumsfeld said.

The United States has sent a message of "deep concern" to the North through diplomatic channels at the United Nations in New York, Hill said Wednesday, adding that the North Koreans had received it and had not yet responded.

The North Korean announcement gave no date for any test, but U.S. intelligence agencies are keeping close watch over activity at possible test sites in the North, even while cautioning against reading too much into every movement.

The United States and North Korea have no diplomatic relations outside deadlocked six-nation nuclear talks and rarely communicate with each other so directly.

Hill would not discuss policy options, but he said senior U.S. diplomats, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, were in steady communication with their counterparts in Asia and Europe.

In the event of a nuclear test, Hill said, "We would have no choice but to act and act resolutely to make sure (North Korea) understood, and make sure every other country in the world understands, that this is a very bad mistake."

U.S. and international officials also said the U.N. Security Council would consider sanctions against the North if the test occurs.

A U.S. intelligence official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the highly sensitive situation with North Korea, said the United States is now seeing the movement of people, materials and vehicles and other activity around one possible test site. But, the official said, it could be similar to activity seen a couple of months ago. No test occurred then.

The United States has spy satellites and other eavesdropping equipment aimed at North Korea, including ground-based seismic sensors.

While North Korean leader Kim Jong Il may decide to hold the test, it cannot be ruled out that Tuesday's threat was saber-rattling, an effort to force a change in stalled nuclear negotiations or some other motivating factor.

North Korea And The Dominoes (NYT)

Here's a scenario to keep you up nights. North Korea tests a nuclear weapon, and Japan, South Korea and Taiwan start thinking they need one too. Meanwhile, over in the Middle East, Iran's neighbors start asking themselves why they should even wait for Tehran to go nuclear before starting their own programs.

Which is why the Bush administration, and other critical players, need to do a lot more to talk North Korea back from the nuclear ledge — and to keep it there.

It has been months since negotiators even sat down at a table. And the two countries with the most potential leverage — China and the United States — have found it easier to play down the urgency of the threat than to do what's needed to deal with Pyongyang's undeniable craziness.

In China's case, that means delivering an unambiguous warning to its longtime client that a nuclear test will be followed by an immediate and painful reduction in Chinese subsidies and aid. And President Bush will have to make his own unambiguous commitment that the United States will not try to overthrow the North Korean government — if it gives up its weapons program.

Experts still debate whether China got the North Koreans to the table by briefly cutting off oil deliveries — or doling out cash. There's no doubt China has the leverage. But China's autocrats are so enamored of any status quo — and so nervous about having to house and feed the North's refugees — that they have resisted using it. Instead, Chinese officials say that the North probably hasn't built a weapon, or if it has, wouldn't ever use it. That's what we call being in denial. It is a luxury Beijing can no longer indulge.

Mr. Bush cannot indulge his own ambivalence over whether it would be better to negotiate with Kim Jong-il or try to overthrow him. North Korea may have the most erratic, brutal and opaque leadership in the world. And it's impossible to know whether the "dear leader" would really trade away his weapons program for any price. But this White House has yet to test him. In the most recent whipsaw, Mr. Bush agreed to offer economic and security incentives to Pyongyang but then undercut the offer by imposing new sanctions on North Korean banks. Pyongyang has refused to come back to the table ever since.

While you're contemplating nuclear dominoes, here's another reason to stay up at night. In its search for cash, North Korea has become expert at selling pretty much anything to anyone: counterfeit dollars, bootlegged cigarettes, ballistic missiles. Can plutonium be far behind?

The dangers are very real. What's needed now is real pressure and real diplomacy to get the North out of the nuclear weapons business — preferably before a nuclear test shows potential buyers just how well its weapons work.

By Edith M. Lederer, The Associated Press

USA Today, October 6, 2006

LONDON — The United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia will confer here today to assess Iran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

They are expected to refer the nuclear case to the United Nations Security Council for talks next week on possible sanctions, Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry said Thursday. Russia's foreign minister, however, said he believes it is too soon to impose sanctions on Iran and that further diplomatic efforts are needed.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reiterated Thursday that his country would not be intimidated by sanctions threats. "Those who threaten Iran by sanctions and embargo should know that this nation lived under the hardest situation in the past 27 years and achieved nuclear technology. This nation will not be frightened by the threats," state-run TV quoted him as saying.

Iran insists its enrichment of uranium is for nuclear energy. The United States and many European nations believe Iran wants to produce nuclear weapons.

Britain's U.N. ambassador said he expects “the Iran dossier” to return to the Security Council “in the course of next week.” Jones Parry said Britain “will be discussing with its partners and with members of the council the basis for action by the council to adopt measures under Article 41 against Iran.”

Article 41 authorizes the Security Council to impose sanctions that do not involve the use of armed forces such as economic penalties, breaking diplomatic relations or banning air travel.

Iran was initially referred to the Security Council in February by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The U.N. nuclear watchdog said Iran's suspicious activities represented breaches of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. The Vienna-based agency also said it could not be sure Iran was not trying to make weapons.

The council gave Iran until Aug. 31 to suspend enrichment in return for incentives or face punishments under Article 41. The council has held off on any action because of talks between European foreign policy chief Javier Solana and Iran's negotiator Ali Larijani.

Solana conceded Wednesday that “endless hours” of talks with Larijani had made little progress and suggested the dispute could wind up at the U.N. soon. He stressed Thursday, however, that dialogue with Iran must continue even if the nuclear talks fail. “I think that even if we fail now, we should keep the doors open for dialogue with Iran,” Solana said in Rome.

Russia's Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow opposes sanctions against Iran. “Some members of the six nations already want to impose sanctions against Iran. We, however, think first we must continue multilateral actions,” he said.

World Powers To Discuss Sanctions Against Iran Over Nuclear Issue (WP)

By Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 5 -- Months of intense negotiations with Iran about its nuclear program have failed and the United States and its diplomatic partners will meet in London on Friday to discuss which punitive actions to include in a new U.N. resolution, U.S. and European officials said Thursday.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack announced in Baghdad that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and counterparts from Britain, France, Russia and China -- the four other permanent members of U.N. Security Council -- plus Germany will hold talks.

The United States wants to impose sanctions on Iran, but divisions are still deep among the six countries over whether to go that far and, if so, in what form. Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Thursday that his country does not back sanctions as a means to punish the Islamic republic for failing to comply with a U.N. resolution that requires it to suspend uranium enrichment. Iran maintains that the fuel program is part of a peaceful nuclear energy program, but U.S. officials and others worry that it could be subverted for making weapons.

"I believe that until diplomatic means are exhausted, sanctions would be too radical," Lavrov said at a news conference in Warsaw. "We have to do everything to persuade Iran to begin negotiations. . . . The issue needs to be resolved diplomatically."

European Union foreign affairs chief Javier Solana, who has taken the lead in recent last-ditch talks with Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, also said talks should not be closed off. "Even if we fail now, we should maintain the doors open to continue dialogue with Iran," he said Thursday in Rome.

China also has been reluctant to impose tough sanctions, while France has not been as adamant as the United States and Britain. "We've done the Solana effort and now we'll have to move to sanctions. That's the ministers' role," Rice said en route to Baghdad on Thursday.

The first stage of sanctions could include a travel ban on Iranian officials involved in the nuclear program and a ban on selling Iran so-called dual-use equipment that can be adopted for weapons. Tougher actions could follow if Iran continues to balk.

At the United Nations, Britain's ambassador, Emyr Jones Parry, said the Security Council is likely to discuss specific language for a resolution on Iran next week that would include nonmilitary sanctions under Chapter 7, Article 41 of the U.N. Charter.

U.S. officials remain optimistic that they can win agreement -- in large part because of Iran itself. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeated several times in recent weeks, including during a trip to the United Nations last month, that Iran would not give up its enrichment program because it is operating within the rules of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

During a visit to Spain, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said that Iran is "gaining time" and that the time had come "to look at the consequences of Iran's attitude." But Douste-Blazy also said the route to dialogue would remain open if Tehran suspends its nuclear program.

US Nuclear Specialists To Visit Egypt (AFP)

AFP, October 5, 2006

US nuclear experts are to offer technical advice to their counterparts in Egypt, which last month announced it was relaunching its civil nuclear program after a 20-year freeze, official media said.

The experts were to arrive in Egypt "soon to share their experience," according to US ambassador to Egypt Francis Ricciardone, quoted by the MENA news agency.

Ricciardone did not specify when the nuclear experts would arrive but said Washington was prepared to help Egypt relaunch its civil nuclear program.

Ricciardone said last month that "the United States encourages the peaceful use of nuclear power for civilian purposes throughout the world."

Egypt's nuclear program was frozen in 1986 following the accident at the Chernobyl power plant in what was then the Soviet Union.

Egypt signed in 1968 the international nuclear non-proliferation treaty and officially supports the elimination of nuclear weapons in the region.

The Egyptian government regularly criticizes Israel over its alleged atomic arsenal, whose existence Israel has never acknowledged though the Jewish state is widely believed to possess hundreds of nuclear warheads.

Israeli Bomblets Plague Lebanon (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 29 — Since the war between Israel and Hezbollah ended in August, nearly three people have been wounded or killed each day by cluster bombs Israel dropped in the waning days of the war, and officials now say it will take more than a year to clear the region of them.

United Nations officials estimate that southern Lebanon is littered with one million unexploded bomblets, far outnumbering the 650,000 people living in the region. They are stuck in the branches of olive trees and the broad leaves of banana trees. They are on rooftops, mixed in with rubble and littered across fields, farms, driveways, roads and outside schools.

As of Sept. 28, officials here said cluster bombs had severely wounded 109 people — and killed 18 others.

Muhammad Hassan Sultan, a slender brown-haired 12-year-old, became a postwar casualty when the shrapnel from a cluster bomb cut into his head and neck. He was from Sawane, a hillside village with a panoramic view of terraced olive farms and rolling hills. Muhammad was sitting on a hip-high wall, watching a bulldozer clear rubble, when the machine bumped into a tree.

A flash of a second later he was fatally injured when a cluster bomblet dropped from the branches. “I took Muhammad to the hospital in my car, but he was already dead,” said Yousef Ftouni, a resident of the village.

The entire village was littered with the bomblets, and as Mr. Ftouni recounted Muhammad’s death, the Lebanese Army worked its way through an olive grove, blowing up unexploded munitions in a painfully slow process of clearance.

Cluster bombs are legal if aimed at military targets and are very effective, military experts say. Nonetheless, Israel has been heavily criticized by United Nations officials, Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch for using cluster bombs, because they are difficult to focus exclusively on military targets. Israel was also criticized because it fired most of its cluster bombs in the last days of the war, when the United Nations Security Council was negotiating a resolution to end the conflict.

Officials calculate that if they are lucky, and money from international donors does not run out, it will take 15 months to clear the area. There are now about 300 Lebanese Army soldiers and 30 other clearance teams, each of up to 30 experts, working on the problem of unexploded bomblets.

The United Nations Mine Action Coordination Center in southern Lebanon recorded 745 locations across the south where unexploded bombs had been found. Of the million estimated to be scattered around, so far 4,500 have been disposed of, according to the center.

"Our priority at the moment is to clean houses, main roads and gardens so that the displaced people can return to their villages," said Col. Mohammad Fahmy, head of the national mine clearing office. "The next stage will be cleaning agricultural lands."

In Lebanon there are two explanations of why Israel unleashed cluster bombs at the end of the war: to inflict as much damage as possible on Hezbollah before withdrawing, or to litter the south with unexploded cluster bombs as a strategy to keep people from returning right away.

The United States has sold cluster bombs to Israel in the past and says it is investigating whether Israel's use of cluster bombs in its war with Hezbollah violated a secret agreement that restricted when they could be used.

The final days of the war — a conflict that began when Hezbollah launched rockets from Lebanon into northern Israel and sent militiamen across the border to capture Israeli soldiers — were marked by a huge Israeli offensive. Israel hoped its final push would, in part, help force the Security Council to adopt a tougher resolution on Hezbollah than appeared to be taking shape.

Israel has said it leafleted areas before bombing and provided Lebanon with maps of potential cluster bomb locations to help with the clearing process. United Nations officials in Lebanon say the maps are useless.

The Israeli newspaper Haaretz published an article on Sept. 12 anonymously quoting the head of a rocket unit in Lebanon who was critical of the decision to use cluster bombs. "What we did was insane and monstrous; we covered entire towns in cluster bombs," Haaretz quoted the commander as saying.

Repeated efforts to get Israeli officials to explain the rationale behind the use of the bombs have proved fruitless, with spokesmen referring all queries to short official statements arguing that everything done conformed with international law.

In Lebanon the problem of the unexploded munitions is magnified by the desire to return to villages and lives in a region that is effectively booby-trapped. People want to begin rebuilding and harvest their crops. In some cases they have tried to clear the bomblets themselves, and some people have begun charging a small fee to clear away bombs — a practice that officials have discouraged as dangerous.

But the people are desperate.

"If I lost the season for olives and the wheat, I have no money for the winter,"' said Rida Noureddine, 54, who farms a small patch of land on the main road in the village of Kherbet Salem. There was a small black object at the entrance to his farm, and he thought it was a cluster bomb.

"I feel as if someone has tied my arms, or is holding me by my neck, suffocating me because this land is my soul," he said.

The bomblets, about the size of a D battery, can be packed into bombs, missiles or artillery shells. When the delivery system detonates, the bomblets spread like buckshot across a large area, making them difficult to aim with precision. A fact sheet issued by the Mine Action Coordination Center says cluster bombs have an official failure rate of 15 percent.

That means that 15 percent of the bomblets remain as hazards. According to the fact sheet, the failure rate in this war is estimated to be around 40 percent. "We estimate there are one million," said Dalya Farran, the community liaison officer of the mine action center.

Ms. Farran has worked at the center for nearly three years. It was set up in 2000 to help deal with the mines and unexploded ordnance left behind after the Israeli occupation of southern Lebanon and from other wars.

After this war, Ms. Farran said, there are two types of cluster bomb fragments across the south. The most commonly found type is known as M42, a deceptively small device resembling a light socket.

She said a large percentage of the unexploded bomblets were made in America, while some were produced in Israel. Each one has a white tail dangling off the back, like the tail of a kite. As they fall to the ground, the tail spins and unscrews the firing pin.

When the device hits, the front end fires a huge slug while the casing blasts apart into a spray of deadly metal fragments. When they fail to detonate they cling to the ground, and with their white tails look deceptively like toys, so children are often those who are injured.

"This is what they are living with every day," said Simon Lovell, a supervisor with one of the clearance teams as he looked at five unexploded bomblets poking out of the soft, rocky soil of the Hussein family farm.

Across the street, Hussein Muhammad, 48, at home with his wife and four children, waited for the clearance team. His olive trees were heavy with fruit, but he could not tend to the harvest.

"I feel that the land has become my enemy," he said. "It represents a danger to my life and my kids' lives."

New Envoy Shares Olmert Views (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Sallai Meridor, Israel's newly appointed ambassador to the United States, is not known to be a close associate of his boss, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. But whatever they lack in a personal friendship may be offset by the understanding that comes from traveling a parallel ideological journey.

Both come from the same political lineage of prominent revisionist Zionist families who dreamed of a Jewish state stretching from the Mediterranean eastward beyond the Jordan River. In recent years, both have departed with that mind-set, moving to Israel's pragmatic center and acknowledging that holding on to all of the West Bank and Gaza Strip doesn't square with the concept of a Jewish state.

To be sure, when Mr. Meridor, the consensus nomination for ambassador by Mr. Olmert and Foreign Minister Tzippi Livni, arrives in Washington in the coming weeks, his top duty will be keeping Israel in step with U.S. policy on confronting Iran's drive to nuclear power, analysts said.

The media-shy ambassador-appointee is the most genuine reflection of Mr. Olmert because of his recognition of the need for a Palestinian state and territorial compromise after years of activism in the right-wing Likud Party.

Mr. Meridor's transformation is perhaps even more complete because of his three-decade residency in the West Bank settlement of Ma'aleh Adumim.

"The prime minister views Sallai as a figure who can transcend his pro-settler orientation by putting a premium on some of the broader issues that confront Israel," said David Makovsky, a fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "Judge him more by the positions he puts forward than where he lives."

After finishing a six-year tenure last year as head of the Jewish Agency -- the quasi-governmental agency that cultivates ties between Israel and the Jewish diaspora -- Mr. Meridor may hold his most valuable asset in the relationships forged with the United States rather than his geopolitical expertise.

The new Washington diplomat is less comfortable in the limelight than his father, who served in the first Israeli parliament, and an older brother, Dan, who was appointed as a minister in several Likud governments.

While on visits in the United States for the Jewish Agency, he was known to have preferred cabs to Lincoln Town Car limousines.

"As a human being he's shy and modest," said Michael Jankelowitz, the foreign press spokesman at the Jewish Agency.

"Everything he does is low-profile. Nothing he does is bombastic. He's not going to steal Olmert's thunder. Sallai is going to be behind the scene."

Straw Asks Muslim To Take Off Veils (WT)

By Katherine Haddon

DOJ_NMG_0076427

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

LONDON -- Former British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw triggered a dispute yesterday by revealing that he asks Muslim women to remove veils from their faces when they visit his constituency office to seek his help.

Mr. Straw, whose Blackburn, northwest England, constituency has a 22 percent ethnic minority population, said he had expected that his request would cause problems but has found that most women are "relieved" to comply.

"I thought a lot before raising this matter a year ago," he said.

Two years ago, Muslim schoolgirl Shabina Begum lost a High Court battle for the right to wear a long Islamic dress, which does not include a veil, to school in Luton, central England.

"I defend absolutely the right of any women to wear a headscarf," Mr. Straw wrote in his regular column in the Lancashire Evening Telegraph newspaper. "As for the full veil, wearing it breaks no laws."

However, he wrote that "the conversation would be of greater value if the lady took the covering from her face."

"Indeed, the value of a meeting, as opposed to a letter or phone call, is so that you can -- almost literally -- see what the other person means and not just hear what they say."

He said he now ensures he has a female member of staff with him during meetings in his office.

"I can't recall a single occasion when the lady concerned had refused to lift her veil; and most I ask seem relieved to have done so."

Massoud Shadjareh, chairman of the Islamic Human Rights Commission, said he was astonished that Mr. Straw does not realize his job "is to represent the interests of the constituency, not to selectively discriminate on the basis of religion."

Nasrullah Anwar, a spokesman for the Lancashire Council of Mosques, told Sky News that he was "shocked and dismayed" by the comments.

"You would think that someone in his position would be a little more sensitive," Mr. Anwar said.

Mr. Straw was appointed the leader of the House of Commons in May.

After Prime Minister Tony Blair, he is the politician most closely associated with Britain's decision to join the invasion of Iraq in 2003.

In March, when he was foreign secretary, Mr. Straw took Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to Blackburn, where they were greeted by a series of anti-war demonstrations.

Straw Draws Criticism From Muslim Groups (AP)

By Maria Hegstad

AP, October 6, 2006

Former British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Thursday he asks Muslim women visiting his office to remove their veils, drawing criticism from some Muslim groups.

Straw wrote in a column for the Lancashire Telegraph newspaper that he feels uncomfortable talking with someone whose face he cannot see, and described the veil as a "visible statement of separation and difference."

"I explain that this is a country built on freedoms. I defend absolutely the right of any women to wear a headscarf," Straw wrote.

But, he said, "The value of a meeting, as opposed to a letter or phone call, is so that you can — almost literally — see what the other person means, and not just hear what they say."

He said in the column he worries that what he described as an increasing number of British Muslim women wearing the veil would hinder ties with non-Muslims.

Scarves that cover the face are "bound to make better, positive relations between the two communities more difficult," he wrote.

Straw said none of his constituents had refused to remove her veil, and thought most seemed relieved to do so.

But a leader of the Islamic Human Rights Commission said Straw's position "put barriers" in the way of Muslim women at a time when they are encouraged to participate more in British society.

"We're really astonished that someone so senior and responsible as Mr. Straw would make such a statement," chairman Massoud Shadjareh said. "I'm sure many people go (to his office) with many different types of clothing and fashions. Why does he suddenly have a problem with this? It's outrageous."

But Daud Abdullah, of the Muslim Council of Britain, told Britain's Press Association news agency that he understood Straw's position.

"The veil does cause some discomfort to non-Muslims. One can understand this," he said.

Abdullah said Muslim scholars differ over whether it is obligatory for women to cover their faces, but agree that they should cover their hair, Press Association reported.

Backers To Lobby For Vote On India Deal (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

U.S. backers of a civilian nuclear deal with India say they plan a major lobbying push over the next month to ensure a final vote on the bill before Congress adjourns for the year, after the Senate failed to take up the measure before it left town last week.

Bush administration officials, calling the deal a centerpiece of a new strategic relationship with India, are hoping the Senate will vote on the enabling legislation for the pact early in the planned lame-duck session set to take place soon after the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

Sanjay Puri, executive director of the U.S. India Political Action Committee, said his group was "obviously disappointed" about the Senate's failure to act, but he added he was "cautiously optimistic" that the deal remained on track for passage this year.

"There's good support on both sides of the aisle," he said. "The issue now is just to get the bill on the calendar for a vote."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said Monday that the administration was "sorry" the Senate vote did not come off last week.

"We were really hoping it would be voted on," Mr. Burns said in an interview with reporters and editors at The Washington Times. He described the nuclear pact as key to the burgeoning relationship between Washington and New Delhi, strongly backed by President Bush.

The agreement struck by Mr. Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in July 2005 would end a U.S. ban on nuclear trade and cooperation with India, which has not signed the international treaty on nuclear nonproliferation. India, in turn, would open its nonmilitary nuclear sites to international inspection for the first time.

The House passed its version of the bill in July. Even if the Senate votes in the lame-duck session, lawmakers still must reconcile the differing House and Senate versions of the bill.

Failure to send the bill to the White House before the end of the year would mean the new Congress elected in November would have to start the process from the beginning next year.

Supporters such as Mr. Puri argue that the agreement could cement ties with an emerging South Asian economic and military power, while opening the way to billions of dollars in business for U.S. firms. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce also has lobbied energetically in support of the accord.

But opponents say the deal would blow a huge hole in efforts to contain nuclear weapons, spur a South Asian arms race and undermine U.S. efforts to rally support against the nuclear programs of Iran and other adversaries.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said last week that Senate Democrats had failed to agree to an expedited debate on the bill in the closing days of the regular session. But Capitol Hill staffers said part of the delay was due to reservations by Republican lawmakers over an unrelated provision added to the bill regarding U.S. obligations to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

The delay has drawn criticism in India, where opposition groups say the Singh government gave up too much to secure the deal with Washington.

Moscow Trumps West In Battle For Clout In Former Soviet States (WSJ)

By Marc Champion And Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

In the struggle over influence, energy and the spread of democracy in its former empire, Moscow has scored big gains and is taking off the gloves at a time when the West is increasingly preoccupied.

Russia imposed a trade and transport embargo to pressure the pro-Western government in neighboring Georgia this week akin to the U.S. embargo on Cuba, following a nasty espionage dispute between the former Soviet states. The move laid bare the Kremlin's determination to reassert itself in what Russians call their "near abroad."

Hosting Russian minorities and pipelines taking Siberian and Caspian Sea oil and gas to markets in the West, the former Soviet region has become the front line of conflict between an increasingly assertive Russia and the West. The Kremlin appears to have read the spy dispute as a sign that the West's willingness to intervene for Georgia is limited.

Just two years ago, it looked like Russia was losing its grip over what had been part of its empire for centuries. U.S. troops were based across energy-rich Central Asia, where Moscow was struggling to rebuild its influence. Pro-Western governments had swept to power in Georgia and Ukraine, emboldening the White House to talk about a wave of democratic change sweeping the region. Russian officials blamed the U.S. for orchestrating the revolutions and worried openly that Washington had similar plans to install a friendlier government in Moscow.

Since then, the most important of the uprisings, Ukraine's Orange revolution, has seen its leaders become mired in infighting, opening the way for the appointment of an openly pro-Russian prime minister in August. Last month, he said Ukraine was putting its NATO membership bid on hold. Central Asian governments that had sought to play the West off against Moscow have largely shifted into the Russian camp, ousting U.S. military bases and tightening security and other ties to Moscow. This year, Russia secured long-term contracts to purchase Central Asian gas, tightening its control over the supply to Europe.

The turning point in Central Asia came in May 2005, when Uzbekistan's government killed hundreds of protesters in Andijan. Criticized by the U.S., the Uzbek government turned to Moscow, which concurred that it had faced a terrorist threat. Uzbekistan then kicked U.S. troops out of a military base established to support the war in Afghanistan. This summer, it joined the Russian-led Collective Security Treaty Organization. Next door, Kyrgyzstan -- where the so-called Tulip Revolution toppled the government last year -- yesterday wound up joint military antiterrorist exercises with Russia. The U.S. still runs a military base in Kyrgyzstan, but the rent it pays increased sharply this year.

As Moscow has reasserted its influence in a region the Kremlin openly refers to as its backyard, the West's willingness to confront Russia over these issues has waned. Preoccupied with problems in Iraq, Washington also needs Russia's support on critical priorities such as moving to control Iran's nuclear program. Key European countries, many heavily dependent on Russian natural gas for energy, are reluctant to pick fights with Moscow.

Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili has emerged as the most-conspicuous exception to the Russian tide in the region. The U.S.-educated lawyer has stuck to his pro-Western policies and anti-Russian rhetoric, despite Moscow's steadily increasing pressure on his government. His commitment to pull Georgia out of Russia's orbit and into Western institutions such as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has made him a favorite in the White House. But at a time of rising assertiveness and national pride in Russia, it has also made him a figure of hate across the border.

"This is not about Russia's conflict with Georgia, but with the West in general. It's hard to strike at the West, but Georgia is in reach," Mr. Saakashvili said in an interview Wednesday.

Mr. Saakashvili says he believes that if push comes to shove, Western capitals will back him because "core Western values are at stake in Georgia."

But both U.S. and European officials have been trying to hold Mr. Saakashvili back from further actions that could provoke Moscow and precipitate a crisis, diplomats say.

"Europe's reliance on Russian energy has given the Kremlin the confidence to risk trying to restore its status in the post-Soviet space," says Dmitry Rogozin, an influential Russian nationalist lawmaker. "Putin knows that Europe won't want to have an argument with Russia over Georgia."

Moscow's determination to make a showcase of Georgia and demonstrate the cost of defiance to its neighbors came through clearly when Russia imposed sanctions even after Georgia returned the detained servicemen under Western pressure.

"They knew from the very first moment that we would hand the soldiers over," said Mr. Saakashvili. A Western diplomat familiar with the matter confirmed that Russia was informed last Friday the soldiers would be returned. Georgia, Mr. Saakashvili added, had arrested others Russians on spying charges before and quickly handed them over, though without going public. "It looks like for months they had been looking for an excuse to do something" to Georgia, he said.

When Mr. Bush called his Russian counterpart to talk about the latest diplomatic moves on Iran, Mr. Putin brought up the Georgia dispute. Washington had hoped that with the immediate cause of the tensions resolved, both sides would step back and find ways to ease their differences, according to American officials.

Mr. Putin, however, had a different message for Mr. Bush. A terse Kremlin statement after the meeting said he had underlined "the unacceptability and danger of any actions by third nations that could be interpreted by the Georgian leadership as an encouragement of its destructive policy."

Within hours Moscow was tightening the screws. It announced it was cutting off all flights, trains, shipping, roads and postal links to Georgia, which has a population of about 4.7 million. Since then, it has closed down Georgian-owned businesses, including a popular Moscow casino, and imposed restrictions on visas for Georgians. Parliament this week will consider a bill preventing Georgians making bank transfers to relatives back home. That could prove a powerful blow, because hundreds of thousands of Georgians rely on the transfers.

Russian officials have given no indication when they might ease the restrictions, insisting Georgia take a more deferential line. "Russia does not want to be provoked. Russia wants to be respected," deputy foreign minister Alexander Yakovenko said yesterday. "Russia wants the anti-Russian campaign to stop."

But the pressure could escalate much further. At a meeting with Russian parliamentary leaders in the Kremlin Wednesday, Mr. Putin discussed the possibility of Russia recognizing the independence of South Ossetia and Abkhazia, two areas of Georgia controlled by Russian-backed separatists since the early 1990s.

"I think we'll do it by the end of the year," said Sergei Baburin, a nationalist lawmaker who is deputy speaker of the Russian Parliament, and who took part in the Kremlin meeting. "If NATO wants Georgia at any price, then it can have it without Abkhazia and South Ossetia."

Some observers worry the confrontation could even lead to war, although both Georgian and Russian officials say that is highly unlikely and there are numerous pressures to deter it -- including U.S. influence over Mr. Saakashvili.

"There is a growing problem, with no real attempt at negotiations. The border is closed, there are trade embargoes, blockades. All this leads to war. There are clear military objectives on both sides," said Pavel Felgenhauer, a Moscow military analyst, naming the Russian objective as regime change, and the Georgian as retrieving Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

Mr. Felgenhauer described Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov's suggestion this week that Russia would accelerate the withdrawal of some troops still based in Georgia -- but outside the enclaves -- as a worrisome sign. "Those troops aren't assets, but liabilities, potential hostages. You want to get them out before any conflict," he said.

Mr. Saakashvili said he is now trying to avoid doing or saying anything that could be seen as a provocation of Russia, something he hasn't always succeeded with. He said he is focusing on local elections, which took place yesterday and could prove a referendum on his popularity. And he opened two big new hospitals, one of them a teaching facility in Tbilisi, the capital. The language of the curriculum is English; it used to be Russian.

New Indonesia Calamity, A Mud Bath, Is Man-Made (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner And Muktita Suhartono

KEDUNGBENDO, Indonesia, Oct. 5 — It started as a natural gas well. It has become geysers of mud and water, and in a country plagued by earthquakes, volcanoes and tsunamis another calamity in the making, though this one is largely man-made.

Eight villages are completely or partly submerged, with homes and more than 20 factories buried to the rooftops. Some 13,000 people have been evacuated. The four-lane highway west of here has been cut in two, as has the rail line, dealing a serious blow to the economy of this region in East Java, an area vital to the country's economy. The muck has already inundated an area covering one and a half square miles.

The mud is rising by the hour, and now spewing forth at the rate of about 170,000 cubic yards a day, or about enough to cover Central Park.

Foreign companies, environmental groups and political observers are now watching closely to see whether the government will hold the company that drilled the well accountable for the costs of the cleanup, which could easily reach $1 billion.

The company is part of a conglomerate controlled by Aburizal Bakrie, a cabinet member and billionaire who was a major contributor to the campaign of President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono.

The disaster occurred as the company, Lapindo Brantas, drilled thousands of feet to tap natural gas and used practices that geologists, mining engineers and Indonesian officials described as faulty.

But as the liabilities have escalated, Lapindo was sold — for $2 — last month to an offshore company, owned by the Bakrie Group, and many fear it will declare bankruptcy, allowing its owners to walk away.

Mr. Bakrie declined to be interviewed. A spokeswoman for Lapindo, Yunawati Teryana, said that it was too early to conclude that Lapindo had acted negligently. She noted that some geologists had said this was a natural disaster, a natural mud volcano, perhaps set off by seismic activity in the area.

Government officials and company engineers are not hopeful that they can contain the problem. In what Indonesian officials describe as the best of the worst options, the government plans to pump the mud into the Porong River, which flows into the sea 20 miles north of here.

"It will be the death of the ecosystem around that area," said Amien Widodo, an environmental geologist who teaches at the November 10 Institute of Technology in Surabaya. There is debate whether the mud is toxic. But the sheer volume alone will smother just about everything in its path, he said.

The area's commerce has already been devastated.

"We are angry because we were living comfortably in our own home and now we are forced to leave," Reni Matakupan said as she stood here looking across 200 yards of mud at her family's factory, DeBrima, which was filling with mud.

The problems began in late May when the company had reached about 9,000 feet, Mr. Widodo said. It continued to drill to this depth even though it had not installed what is known as a casing around the well to the levels required under Indonesian mining regulations, and good mining practices, he said.

The company experienced problems with the drilling that led to a loss of pressure in the well. That is when the mud started seeping in from the sides of the unprotected well bore, at a depth of about 6,000 feet.

The mud was stopped by cement plugs that the company had inserted into the well hole. The mud then sought other avenues of escape, eventually breaking through the earth, and creating mud volcanoes in several places that resemble the geysers of Yellowstone.

If the proper casing had been in place, the mud would not have entered the well, Mr. Widodo said, and would not have discovered these other avenues to the surface, a conclusion supported by mining engineers. Several Western and Indonesian mining engineers spoke about the matter, some offering graphs and mining details that have not been made public, but only on the condition that they not be identified, for fear of running afoul of Mr. Bakrie, the billionaire company owner.

So far there does not appear to be any government investigation into what set off the mud eruptions. After the first eruptions, in late May, the police in Sidoarjo, the district at the center of the disaster, began an investigation, but it appears to have languished. "I am not confident that anyone will ever be prosecuted," said H. Win Hendrarso, the regent for Sidoarjo, choosing his words carefully. In an interview in his high-ceilinged office, Mr. Hendrarso, who was elected a year ago, said he had no authority to investigate. Any investigations would have to be by the central government in Jakarta, he said. He added that he was not aware of any.

"I just want Lapindo to take responsibility," he said.

But Lapindo no longer exists, and the company to which it has been sold may not have any assets.

Last month, Lapindo's parent company announced that it was selling Lapindo for $2 to Lyte Ltd., a company that is registered in the offshore island of Jersey. The majority shareholder in the parent company is the Bakrie Group, and the Bakrie Group is also the sole owner of Lyte, according to public documents.

Lapindo's parent company, Energi Mega Persada, had said in an official securities filing that it was selling Lapindo because of the huge costs it faced in cleaning up after the mud flow, and it was better to use its assets for its other oil and gas projects.

An Energi spokesman, Herwin Hidayat, said the Bakrie Group remained committed to cleaning up the mud, through Lyte. He declined to say what assets Lyte had, if any. He said it was a "functioning company." He declined to give any examples of any business that it had done.

A concern now is whether Lyte, which has been renamed Bakrie Oil & Gas, will declare bankruptcy, which seems almost inevitable.

"That's what I'm afraid of," said Mr. Hendrarso, the senior elected executive official in Sidoarjo, the district that is at the center of the mud disaster. If the Bakrie Group does not pay, the Indonesia government will be left with the bill, government officials said.

Dutch Hospital Plans For Muslims Only (WT)

By David Rennie, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Plans for a Muslim-only hospital in the Netherlands have sparked a heated debate over its separate all-male and all-female wings, halal food and roster of duty imams.

A populist nationalist party described the plan for the clinic in south Rotterdam as "a step backwards to the Middle Ages."

The sexes will be segregated, with male patients treated by an exclusively male nursing and medical staff and similar arrangements for female patients.

The Netherlands' once proud multicultural model, which promoted tolerance of a rapidly growing immigrant population, has been questioned in recent years, especially after the slaying of filmmaker Theo van Gogh by an Islamist.

It is the brainchild of a health industry entrepreneur, Paul Sturkenboom, who plans to employ 45 doctors and 275 nurses. Staff will not have to be Muslims.

The plan has been attacked by the Rotterdam-based Leefbaar Rotterdam, or "Liveable Rotterdam" party, which controlled the local council until March.

Last month, the party unsuccessfully tried to have the hospital banned.

"If Mr. Wilders is saying in a xenophobic way that this will prohibit integration of Muslim Dutch citizens, we just point to the fact that 20 or 30 years ago, Jewish, Roman Catholic and Protestant Dutch people had their own schools, their own hospitals, their own trade unions and employers' organizations" he said.

"That autonomy helped those people integrate at their own speed into Dutch society. This compact hospital will give Muslims time to integrate at their own speed."

He said that 40 of the 100 hospitals in the Netherlands were run by Catholic or Protestant foundations.

Mr. van Gogh, a relative of the famous painter Vincent Van Gogh, was killed in November 2004 while bicycling to work in Amsterdam after a film on Muslim women he had produced angered Islamist militants.

Ayaan Hirsi Ali, a Somali-born Dutch politician known for her outspoken criticism of Islam, partnered with Mr. van Gogh on the film. She went into hiding after Mr. van Gogh's murder and returned to parliament several months later. She still lives under heavy guard and is working on a sequel to the film she made with Mr. van Gogh, on Islam's treatment of homosexuality.

Another Dutch anti-immigration politician lived in a maximum-security prison to protect himself from attack owing to his criticism of radical Islam.

Geert Wilders went into hiding after the van Gogh killing and the subsequent arrest of a group of suspected radical Islamists who are accused of plotting to kill him and other prominent politicians.

"It feels like being trapped and the word freedom has become a totally different concept for me," Mr. Wilders said in an interview in the Dutch parliament, where he returned to work in December 2004.

Mr. Wilders is seen as an heir to populist anti-immigration politician Pim Fortuyn, who was killed in Rotterdam by an animal rights activist.

Hong Kong Wrong (WSJ)

By Milton Friedman

It had to happen. Hong Kong's policy of "positive noninterventionism" was too good to last. It went against all the instincts of government officials, paid to spend other people's money and meddle in other people's affairs. That's why it was sadly unsurprising to see Hong Kong's current leader, Donald Tsang, last month declare the death of the policy on which the territory's prosperity was built.

The really amazing phenomenon is that, for half a century, his predecessors resisted the temptation to tax and meddle. Though a colony of socialist Britain, Hong Kong followed a laissez-faire capitalist policy, thanks largely to a British civil servant, John Cowperthwaite. Assigned to handle Hong Kong's financial affairs in 1945, he rose through the ranks to become the territory's financial secretary from 1961-71. Cowperthwaite, who died on Jan. 21 this year, was so famously laissez-faire that he refused to collect economic statistics for fear this would only give government officials an excuse for more meddling. His successor, Sir Philip Haddon-Cave, coined the term "positive noninterventionism" to describe Cowperthwaite's approach.

The results of his policy were remarkable. At the end of World War II, Hong Kong was a dirt-poor island with a per-capita income about one-quarter that of Britain's. By 1997, when sovereignty was transferred to China, its per-capita income was roughly equal to that of the departing colonial power, even though Britain had experienced sizable growth over the same period. That was a striking demonstration of the productivity of freedom, of what people can do when they are left free to pursue their own interests.

The success of laissez-faire in Hong Kong was a major factor in encouraging China and other countries to move away from centralized control toward greater reliance on private enterprise and the free market. As a result, they too have benefited from rapid economic growth. The ultimate fate of China depends, I believe, on whether it continues to move in Hong Kong's direction faster than Hong Kong moves in China's.

Mr. Tsang insists that he only wants the government to act "when there are obvious imperfections in the operation of the market mechanism." That ignores the reality that if there are any "obvious imperfections," the market will eliminate them long before Mr. Tsang gets around to it. Much more important are the "imperfections" -- obvious and not so obvious -- that will be introduced by overactive government.

A half-century of "positive noninterventionism" has made Hong Kong wealthy enough to absorb much abuse from ill-advised government intervention. Inertia alone should ensure that intervention remains limited. Despite the policy change, Hong Kong is likely to remain wealthy and prosperous for many years to come. But, although the territory may continue to grow, it will no longer be such a shining symbol of economic freedom.

Yet that doesn't detract from the scale of Cowperthwaite's achievement. Whatever happens to Hong Kong in the future, the experience of this past 50 years will continue to instruct and encourage friends of economic freedom. And it provides a lasting model of good economic policy for others who wish to bring similar prosperity to their people.

Sued In Singapore (WSJ)

Seems like old times. It's been a while since this newspaper or our sister publication, the Far Eastern Economic Review, has found itself in litigation in Singapore. Like virtually every other foreign publication that circulates there, we've had that dubious pleasure before, in actions brought by the government or by the city-state's famously litigious founding Prime Minister, now Minister Mentor, Lee Kuan Yew.

Review Publishing Co. and Editor Hugo Restall are now the subjects of defamation lawsuits brought by Mr. Lee and his dutiful son, Singapore Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong. Review Publishing is a Hong Kong-based subsidiary of Dow Jones & Co., which publishes The Wall Street Journal.

In addition to being sued, the Review is also banned in Singapore per an edict by the Ministry of Information, Communications and the Arts handed down last week. It is now a criminal offense to subscribe to the Review or import or reproduce it for distribution. Starting with the October issue, which goes on sale everywhere else in Asia today, the Review will no longer circulate in Singapore.

Anyone with a passing understanding of how Singapore operates will understand that these two events -- the Lees' libel suits and the Ministry of Information's ban -- are no coincidence. In any event, the idea that a journal of opinion published 10 times a year in Hong Kong with a Singapore circulation of approximately 1,000 is interfering in the country's domestic politics -- the underlying basis for the ban -- is absurd. So, too, is the Singapore government's apparent belief that the free flow of information is not essential for a first-world economy. * * *

The offending column in the July issue of the Review was an interview Mr. Restall conducted with that rara avis in Singapore, an opposition politician. Chee Soon Juan criticized the Lees in the article, which also briefly mentioned the 2004 scandal at the country's largest charity, the National Kidney Foundation. "The scandal was a gift for the opposition," Mr. Restall wrote, "which naturally raised questions about why the government didn't do a better job of supervising the highly secretive NKF."

Mr. Restall reported Mr. Chee's view that the elder Mr. Lee is the man behind Singapore's suppression of dissent. "If we had parliamentary debates where the opposition could pry and ask questions, I think he [Mr. Lee] is actually afraid of something like that," he said.

Mr. Restall went on to raise several questions that are in the public interest, specifically having to do with the non-transparency of government institutions: "The government controls huge pools of public money in the Central Provident Fund and the Government of Singapore Investment Corp., both of which are highly nontransparent. It also controls spending on the public housing most Singaporeans live in, and openly used the funds for refurbishing apartment blocks as a bribe for districts that vote for the ruling party. Singaporeans have no way of knowing whether officials are abusing their trust as [NKF Chief Executive] Mr. Durai did."

The Review's editor also noted that "Singaporean officials have a remarkable record of success in winning libel suits against their critics." And he asked, "Are libel suits deliberately used as a tool to suppress questioning voices?"

These passages are the crux of paragraphs that the Lees allege are defamatory. Briefly, the Minister Mentor's lawsuit contends that the words "in their natural and ordinary meaning" mean "that the Plaintiff is unfit for office because he is corrupt and has set out to sue and suppress those who would question him as he fears such questions would expose his corruption." Similarly, the Prime Minister's pleading interprets the Review's article "to mean that the Plaintiff is unfit for office because. . . [he] has retained Minister Mentor Lee Kuan Yew, who is corrupt. . . ."

Huh? If English weren't an official language of Singapore, we'd wonder if something went missing in translation. The meaning the Lees allege is preposterous, all the more so given Singapore's justifiable reputation for efficient, clean government.

We certainly don't believe -- nor do we think any reasonable reader of the Review would infer from the article -- that the Lees are personally corrupt.

Clearly, though, the Review article touched a defensive nerve. Last month a Singapore court ruled that Mr. Chee and his sister had defamed the Prime Minister and the Minister Mentor for linking the scandal at the National Kidney Foundation to the way the country is run. Three days later the World Bank issued its latest report on governance. "Singapore," the report says, "has one of the best rankings in the world on control of corruption, but it ranks in the middle of the pack on voice and accountability, below much poorer countries such as Brazil and Botswana."

Finally, let us turn our attention back to the publication ban and note another curious aspect of this case. The Lees' attorneys first wrote to the Review on July 13, indicating that their clients were contemplating bringing suit and demanding certain concessions, including damages. The Review has no assets in Singapore.

On August 3, the Ministry of Information announced changes in its interpretation and application of Singapore's Newspaper and Printing Presses Act, requiring the Review and four other international publications to appoint a local representative to accept service of legal process and to post a security deposit of S$200,000 ($126,000) that would be available to satisfy any legal judgments. The giveaway was that changes would be retrospective -- the money would go toward any damages obtained by the Ministers against the Review for the Chee interview.

How convenient. As the Review's counsel said in a letter to the Minister of Information on August 24, "the handling of this matter pointlessly exposes the Government of Singapore to the charge that it has acted in bad faith in altering the conditions regulating foreign publications because it will appear to have acted to benefit its two most powerful members." When the Review declined to comply with the retroactive regulations, it was banned.

As it happens, Singapore's Newspapers and Printing Presses Act does not cover the online version of the Review at www.feer.com1, where, the Review tells us, it will do its best to make its October issue available free of charge to Singaporeans. In addition -- and free to all readers -- the Review is posting the disputed article, the Lees' court pleadings and its correspondence with the Lees' attorneys and the Ministry of Information.

Among these documents is Appendix A to the Minister Mentor's lawsuit, which contains a list of defamation suits brought by the elder Mr. Lee and dating back to 1965. Socrates observed that old men are themselves, only more so, and we can only assume that Singapore will remain locked in its old ways until Mr. Lee passes from the scene.

Virtually every foreign publication that circulates in Singapore has faced the government's wrath at one time or another, starting with a contempt action against this newspaper in 1985, when Singapore's inferiority complex was perhaps more understandable. This is not the behavior of a prosperous, self-confident nation.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Government Objects To Federal Court Ruling To Release Posada (AP)

By Alicia A. Caldwell

AP, October 6, 2006

EL PASO, Texas - Anti-Castro Cuban militant Luis Posada Carriles, who was arrested in Miami, will remain in an El Paso detention center for now, despite a federal magistrate's ruling that he be set free pending his deportation, a spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs said Thursday.

Spokeswoman Leticia Zamarripa said the ICE decision to continue holding Posada was based on several factors, including Posada's potential flight risk, "danger to the community and also Posada's failure to show, to demonstrate that there is no significant likelihood of removal for the foreseeable future."

ICE officials informed Posada, a former CIA operative and U.S. soldier, of the interim decision Thursday morning, Zamarripa said.

Zamarripa said Posada, 78, was also told that the U.S. Department of Homeland Security "is considering, in consultation with the Department of State, whether his detention should be continued based on the ground that his release may have serious adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States."

Thursday's decision comes less than a month after U.S. Magistrate Judge Norbert Garney ruled that Posada should be set free while the federal government continues to look for a country to deport him to.

Posada, who has been jailed on an immigration violation since his May 2005 arrest, was ordered deported last year. But a federal immigration judge ruled last year that Posada, wanted in Venezuela and Cuba for the plotting of the Oct. 6, 1976, bombing of a Cuban jetliner, could not be sent to either country because of the fear that he could be tortured.

Justice Department lawyers also filed a 22-page objection to Garney's recommendation Thursday, saying that the magistrate "erred in both his factual and legal findings, as well as by accepting Posada's grossly insufficient assertion that there was no significant likelihood that he could be removed from the United States within the reasonable foreseeable future."

Ethan B. Kanter, the Justice Department lawyer in the case, also wrote that Posada had failed to exhaust a series of high-level foreign government contacts in several countries to help find a country that would accept him.

In an August hearing challenging his continued detention, a deportation officer said no country approached by the U.S. government will accept Posada, a Cuban-born naturalized citizen of Venezuela.

Canada, Guatemala, Mexico, Costa Rica and El Salvador have all rejected official requests.

A friend of Posada's said he also made contact with some of those countries, in an informal capacity, and was repeatedly denied help.

Kanter argued that Posada is a flight risk who is a danger to the community and national security.

"Luis Posada Carriles is an admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks," Justice Department spokeswoman Tasia Scolinos said Thursday in a statement. "The Department of Justice believes that Posada is a flight risk and that his release would be a danger to the community. The Department of Justice is committed to defending the Department of Homeland Security's decision to detain him under the Immigration and Nationality Act."

Posada's El Paso lawyer, Felipe D.J. Millan, said Posada's legal team would respond to the government's objection by Friday.

He said he expects a federal district judge in El Paso, who will decide if Garney's recommendation should be followed, to make a fair decision that will ultimately mean that Posada can return to Miami to live with his wife and children.

"We have the utmost faith in the federal judiciary," Millan said.

Posada has declared that he wants nothing more to do with violence against ailing Cuban President Fidel Castro. In a written statement released last month by his Miami lawyer, Posada said, "I consider that the Cuban government is in a very deteriorated condition, inexorably reaching its end, and I sincerely believe that nothing would help to go back to the past with sabotage campaigns and actions to precipitate its fall."

"It is now time to use other methods, political, diplomatic or otherwise that may accelerate the fall of the Castro regime and thus shall free my country," he added. The statement was written before Castro temporarily relinquished power to his brother in July as he recovered from abdominal surgery.

Posada has applied for U.S. citizenship. That status of that application was unclear Thursday.

US Opposes Release Of Anti-Castro Militant (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 6, 2006

The US government opposed releasing Luis Posada Carriles, an anti-Castro militant wanted by Venezuela in the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner that killed 73 people, court papers show.

A judge last month recommended that Posada Carriles, who is being held on immigration charges, be freed because no country was found to accept him, other than Cuba and Venezuela, both of which want to try him for a series of bombings.

The US Justice Department said in its filing Thursday that Posada Carriles, 78, should look harder for a country that will receive him, given his "uncommon ability to facilitate his own removal through high-level government connections in multiple Latin American countries."

"Posada identified an extraordinary range of foreign high profile contacts and prospects for removal that he only partially pursued," it said.

The court filing comes on the eve of the Cuban airline bombing's 30th anniversary.

Venezuela, of which Posada Carriles is a citizen, said the United States should extradite him to stand trial in the bombing.

But it has also failed to find another third country that would accept him.

The United States refused, saying he might then be handed over to Cuba, which also says he committed terrorist bombings and killed an Italian citizen in the process.

Posada Carriles has been in a Texas jail since May 2005 for entering the United States illegally.

Judge Approves Extradition To U.S. Of Alleged Al-Qaida Supporter (FINDLAW/AP)

By Katie Fretland, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 6, 2006

(AP) - LONDON-A British judge on Thursday approved the extradition of an American accused of supplying al-Qaida operatives with money and military equipment.

Syed Hashmi, 26, who lived in the New York borough of Queens before moving to Britain in 2003, will face trial in the United States if the Home Office gives final approval for the extradition.

It was not immediately clear if Hashmi would appeal the judge's ruling.

Hashmi was indicted in a New York federal court in May for allegedly providing military equipment to people who took it to members of Osama bin Laden's terrorist organization in 2004.

The military gear was "to be used by al-Qaida to fight against United States forces in Afghanistan," the indictment said, without elaborating on what the equipment was.

Hashmi has lived in Britain since 2003 although his student visa has expired. He was arrested in June as he boarded a plane bound for Pakistan at London's Heathrow Airport.

Washington announced Monday that the U.S. Senate unanimously approved a revised extradition treaty with Britain that critics say greatly reduces the level of evidence U.S. authorities must show to request the extradition of a British citizen.

"No person should be taken from the United Kingdom to face trial in another country without a British court being satisfied that there is evidence a person could be found guilty," said Gareth Crossman, policy director at London-based human rights group Liberty.

Hashmi's lawyer, Mark Summers, said the United States should not be involved in the case.

"The defendant was arrested here, he was here and, save in the most tenuous way, this case has absolutely nothing to do with the Americans," Summers said.

"Their interest in it is an interest in bringing terrorism suspects in general to book," he said.

Hashmi is believed to be associated with Mohammed Junaid Babar, a naturalized American from Pakistan who pleaded guilty in August 2004 to smuggling money and military supplies to a senior member of al-Qaida in Pakistan who was setting up a jihad training camp, American law enforcement officials have said.

Babar, from Queens, New York, had admitted to providing night-vision goggles, sleeping bags, waterproof socks and ponchos to an al-Qaida official in Waziristan, a Pakistani region near the Afghan border.

U.S. Judge Refuses To Dismiss Terror Finance Suit Vs French Bank (FINDLAW/AP)

By Tom Hays, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 6, 2006

(AP) - NEW YORK-For the second time in a week, a U.S. judge has refused to throw out a lawsuit accusing a European bank of knowingly providing financial services to charities allegedly controlled by a terrorist organization.

DOJ_NMG_0076441

The ruling on Thursday by U.S. District Judge Charles P. Sifton in Brooklyn denied a defense motion by a French bank, Credit Lyonnais, to dismiss the suit brought by families of Americans who were victims of terrorist bombings and shootings in Israel between 2001 and 2003. Nine of the victims were killed in the attacks, which included suicide bombings linked to Hamas.

Last week, Sifton denied a motion to dismiss a similar suit against a British bank, National Westminster Bank.

The French bank "should be put on notice by this decision, which again affirms the civil remedies available to American victims of terrorism," said Gary M. Osen, a lead attorney for the plaintiffs.

A call to the New York attorney for Credit Lyonnais, a subsidiary of Credit Agricole, was not immediately returned.

The suit - which was filed in February under the Anti-Terrorism Act and seeks unspecified damages - accuses Credit Lyonnais of improperly doing business with a French-based charity that has been designated a terrorist organization by the Israeli and U.S. governments. The plaintiffs allege the bank knew the charity was funneling millions of dollars to Hamas to finance terrorism.

In court papers, the bank claimed it suspected the charity, CBSP, might be involved in money laundering, but not terrorism. It cited investigations in France that cleared the group of any wrongdoing.

The judge said in his ruling that "it is reasonable to believe that when the bank noticed 'unusual activity' on CBSP's accounts in 2000, in the form of large transfers of money to the West Bank and Gaza strip during a highly publicized intifada, the bank would have investigated the organizations receiving the large transfers, including designations of terrorist organizations made by the government whose country was experiencing the terrorism."

The ruling, while preserving a claim that the bank knowingly provided material support to a foreign terrorist organization, dismissed another claim that it aided and abetted the murder and wounding of U.S. citizens. On the latter claim, the judge found that "maintenance of a bank account and the receipt of transfer of funds does not constitute substantial assistance."

New Lawsuits Challenge Congress's Detainee Act (CSM)

By Warren Richey

The Christian Science Monitor, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON

President Bush has yet to sign into law Congress's new terror-detainee legislation, but defense lawyers are already asking federal judges to strike down key parts of the measure as unconstitutional.

Two suits were filed this week in US District Court here. At issue: Whether the new antiterror legislation retroactively strips the courts of jurisdiction to hear detainee cases, and if so, would that amount to an unconstitutional suspension of the writ of habeas corpus.

"By filing when we did, we wanted to make sure that at least we preserved the retroactivity argument," says Michael Ratner of the New York-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which filed both suits.

The new legislation, passed a week ago Friday, bars judges from hearing detainee lawsuits. Instead, it sets up a much more limited appeals process for detainees who are seeking to challenge their designation as an enemy combatant or to challenge a war crimes conviction by a military commission.

One suit was filed on behalf of Majid Khan, one of the 14 so-called high value Al Qaeda suspects recently transferred from secret Central Intelligence Agency prisons to the terrorist detention camp at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba. The other was filed on behalf of 25 detainees being held among some 500 men at Bagram Air Force Base in Afghanistan.

The new suits join more than 400 other detainee cases filed on behalf of prisoners at Guantánamo currently pending before US district or appeals court judges in Washington. Lawyers in each of those cases are also expected to mount legal challenges to the Military Commissions Act.

All of the Guantánamo suits had been put on hold pending the US Supreme Court's ruling in the Hamdan case, which was announced last June. In that particular case, the high court struck down the Bush administration's military commission process as illegal and ruled that a December 2005 law, the Detainee Treatment Act, had not retroactively stripped the Supreme Court of authority to decide the Hamdan case.

While preserving its own jurisdiction in the Hamdan case, the high court did not make clear whether other courts retained jurisdiction to hear and decide existing detainee cases.

The Military Commissions Act seeks to eliminate any ambiguity on the issue. It says no court, justice, or judge shall have jurisdiction to consider a writ of habeas corpus or any other action by a non-US citizen detained by the US as an enemy combatant. The law says it applies "to all cases, without exception, pending on or after the date of enactment of this act."

If upheld, it would mean the elimination of hundreds of lawsuits.

Bush administration officials have long complained that the suits were becoming a major distraction in the war on terror. They argued that Al Qaeda suspects are no more entitled to litigate legal claims against the US in American courts than were German POWs in World War II.

Lawyers for the detainees say that many of those being held in US custody are innocent and are only seeking a fair opportunity to demonstrate their innocence before a neutral judge.

The Military Commissions Act doesn't just bar suits challenging an individual's detention. It also limits the ability to obtain an independent probe of alleged abusive treatment, including torture.

The two new lawsuits seek to challenge these procedures in different ways.

The Bagram Air Force Base suit tests the scope of a 2004 Supreme Court ruling that extended habeas protections to detainees at Guantánamo. Prior to that ruling, habeas suits filed by noncitizens were only permitted by those detained within US sovereign territory.

The Bagram suit argues that the 2004 ruling made habeas protections available any place in the world under US jurisdiction and control.

The issue is significant because the Military Commissions Act seeks to overturn the 2004 high court ruling by eliminating habeas protections for all non- citizen enemy combatants, regardless of their geographical location.

The Guantánamo suit filed on behalf of Mr. Khan is also aimed at testing the habeas-stripping provisions. The suit says that despite being held in secret CIA detention for 3-1/2 years, Khan, whose family lives in Baltimore, has never had a hearing before a neutral judge or military panel to determine the legality of his detention.

The lawsuit says that as a CIA prisoner Khan was subjected to torture and cruel, inhuman, or degrading treatment. He was coerced into making false and unreliable statements, the suit says. "Khan has not, nor has he ever been, an enemy alien, a lawful or unlawful belligerent, or a combatant of any kind," the suit says.

The US government has a different view of Khan. A declassified profile of Khan by American intelligence officials says he was an Al Qaeda operative selected by 9/11 mastermind Khalid Sheikh Mohammad to participate in a plan to blow up gas stations in the US and poison US water reservoirs. He was also considered for an Al Qaeda attempt to assassinate Pakistani President Musharraf, the profile says.

U.N. Rightly Imposed Sanctions On Terrorists (Letter) (WSJ)

By John R. Bolton

David Crawford's Oct. 2 Politics & Economics article "The Black Hole of a U.N. Blacklist" is short on fact and long on opinion; it should have appeared as an editorial. The U.N. Security Council has rightly imposed sanctions on hundreds of al Qaeda members and the Taliban. These sanctions have made it harder for terrorists to acquire weapons, move freely around the world, and finance their plots. Member states have frozen $150 million in terrorist assets, which Mr. Crawford fails to acknowledge.

Mr. Crawford's central argument is that terrorists are stripped of their assets without hearings or the right to appeal. He profiles three men under U.N. sanctions for supporting al Qaeda and highlights that none of them has been criminally convicted by a court. Obviously, the U.N. is not a court, and sanctions are not a criminal punishment. Terrorist designations made by the Security Council are based on international security and policy considerations, and they are designed as a preventive tool to cripple terrorists and their networks.

Mr. Crawford is wrong when he claims that individuals under U.N. sanctions cannot appeal the decision. In the United States, those designated have the right to challenge the decision through administrative channels or by turning directly to the court system, and many have done so. However, every challenged designation has been upheld by U.S. courts, including at the appellate level. The U.N. has also lifted sanctions, in cases where the individual severed his ties to al Qaeda.

Mr. Crawford is also wrong in stating that the Security Council does not debate designations. In fact, they are debated extensively, usually over a period of many months. By way of example, we approved sanctions for Saad al-Fagih, a known associate of Osama bin Laden, Abdelghani Mzoudi, a member of the Hamburg cell that planned 9/11, and Mamoun Darkazanli, a known al Qaeda financier. These are the same three people Mr. Crawford cites to prove the system is broken. I believe they prove the system is working. Mr. Crawford would have known these facts if he had called the U.S. Mission to the U.N. to ask. But he didn't.

Blowing The Easy Ones (WP)

THE BUSH administration has pushed aggressively for expanded surveillance powers, military commissions and rough interrogation techniques. When it comes to fighting the war on terrorism, just about anything goes. Except, that is, those routine steps with no civil liberties implications at all that might significantly interrupt terrorism -- such as, say, reading the mail of convicted terrorists housed in American prisons. The federal Bureau of Prisons, Justice Department Inspector General Glenn Fine wrote, "does not read all the mail for terrorist and other high-risk inmates on its mail monitoring lists." It is also "unable to effectively monitor high-risk inmates' verbal communications," including phone calls. So while the administration won't reveal the circumstances under which it spies on innocent Americans, the communications of imprisoned terrorists, at least, appear sadly secure.

This is not a hypothetical problem. Jailed terrorists and organized-crime figures try to communicate with confederates outside of prison walls. Three inmates involved in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, while housed at the federal government's highest-security prison, managed to exchange around 90 letters with Islamist extremists between 2002 and 2004, including with terrorists in Spain who were planning attacks there. Just last month, federal prosecutors accused a drug lord at the same facility of running a huge distribution network in Los Angeles using coded conversations and messages. Imprisoned people can direct major crimes from behind bars.

Yet somehow, the bureau leaves unread a lot of mail to and from inmates it designates as warranting monitoring. What's more, at some federal institutions, the amount of mail monitored is going down . Part of the problem is that the bureau "does not have enough proficient translators to translate inmate mail written in foreign languages" -- a government-wide deficiency. Even when officers eyeball mail, they are not sufficiently "trained in intelligence techniques to evaluate whether terrorists' communications contain suspicious content," the report said.

This should be the easy part of fighting terrorism. It is simply a question of devoting adequate resources to making happen something that everyone agrees needs to happen. When a lawyer for the imprisoned Sheikh Omar Abdel Rahman helped him covertly send messages to his followers, federal prosecutors rightly pressed charges and won a conviction against her. How ironic that other terrorists need only set pen to paper and their exhortations can slip through unread.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Bush Says He Can Edit Security Reports (AP)

By Leslie Miller

The AP, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush, again defying Congress, says he has the power to edit the Homeland Security Department's reports about whether it obeys privacy rules while handling background checks, ID cards and watchlists.

In the law Bush signed Wednesday, Congress stated no one but the privacy officer could alter, delay or prohibit the mandatory annual report on Homeland Security department activities that affect privacy, including complaints.

But Bush, in a signing statement attached to the agency's 2007 spending bill, said he will interpret that section "in a manner consistent with the President's constitutional authority to supervise the unitary executive branch."

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said it's appropriate for the administration to know what reports go to Congress and to review them beforehand.

"There can be a discussion on whether to accept a change or a nuance," she said. "It could be any number of things."

The American Bar Association and members of Congress have said Bush uses signing statements excessively as a way to expand his power.

The Senate held hearings on the issue in June. At the time, 110 statements challenged about 750 statutes passed by Congress, according to numbers combined from the White House and the Senate committee. They include documents revising or disregarding parts of legislation to ban torture of detainees and to renew the Patriot Act.

Privacy advocate Marc Rotenberg said Bush is trying to subvert lawmakers' ability to accurately monitor activities of the executive branch of government.

"The Homeland Security Department has been setting up watch lists to determine who gets on planes, who gets government jobs, who gets employed," said Rotenberg, executive director of the Electronic Privacy Information Center.

He said the Homeland Security Department has the most significant impact on citizens' privacy of any agency in the federal government.

Homeland Security agencies check airline passengers' names against terrorist watch lists and detain them if there's a match. They make sure transportation workers' backgrounds are investigated. They are working on several kinds of biometric ID cards that millions of people would have to carry.

The department's privacy office has put the brakes on some initiatives, such as using insecure radio-frequency identification technology, or RFID, in travel documents. It also developed privacy policies after an uproar over the disclosure that airlines turned over their passengers' personal information to the government.

The last privacy report was submitted in February 2005.

Bush's signing statement Wednesday challenges several other provisions in the Homeland Security spending bill.

Bush, for example, said he'd disregard a requirement that the director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency must have at least five years experience and "demonstrated ability in and knowledge of emergency management and homeland security."

His rationale was that it "rules out a large portion of those persons best qualified by experience and knowledge to fill the office."

Bush Cites Authority To Bypass FEMA Law (BOS)

By Charlie Savage, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, October 6, 2006

Signing statement is employed again

WASHINGTON -- President Bush this week asserted that he has the executive authority to disobey a new law in which Congress has set minimum qualifications for future heads of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.

Congress passed the law last week as a response to FEMA's poor handling of Hurricane Katrina. The agency's slow response to flood victims exposed the fact that Michael Brown, Bush's choice to lead the agency, had been a politically connected hire with no prior experience in emergency management.

To shield FEMA from cronyism, Congress established new job qualifications for the agency's director in last week's homeland security bill. The law says the president must nominate a candidate who has ``a demonstrated ability in and knowledge of emergency management'' and ``not less than five years of executive leadership.''

Bush signed the homeland-security bill on Wednesday morning. Then, hours later, he issued a signing statement saying he could ignore the new restrictions. Bush maintains that under his interpretation of the Constitution, the FEMA provision interfered with his power to make personnel decisions.

The law, Bush wrote, ``purports to limit the qualifications of the pool of persons from whom the president may select the appointee in a manner that rules out a large portion of those persons best qualified by experience and knowledge to fill the office.''

The homeland-security bill contained measures covering a range of topics, including terrorism, disaster preparedness, and illegal immigration. One provision calls for authorizing the construction of a 700-mile fence along the Mexican border.

But Bush's signing statement challenged at least three-dozen laws specified in the bill. Among those he targeted is a provision that empowers the FEMA director to tell Congress about the nation's emergency management needs without White House permission. This law, Bush said, ``purports . . . to limit supervision of an executive branch official in the provision of advice to the Congress.'' Despite the law, he said, the FEMA director would be required to get clearance from the White House before telling lawmakers anything.

Bush said nothing of his objections when he signed the bill with a flourish in a ceremony Wednesday in Scottsdale, Ariz. At the time, he proclaimed that the bill was ``an important piece of legislation that will highlight our government's highest responsibility, and that's to protect the American people.''

The bill, he added, ``will also help our government better respond to emergencies and natural disasters by strengthening the capabilities of the Federal Emergency Management Agency.''

Bush's remarks at the signing ceremony were quickly e-mailed to reporters, and the White House website highlighted the ceremony. By contrast, the White House minimized attention to the signing statement. When asked by the Globe on Wednesday afternoon if there would be a signing statement, the press office declined to comment, saying only that any such document, if it existed, would be issued in the ``usual way.''

The press office posted the signing-statement document on its website around 8 p.m. Wednesday, after most reporters had gone home. The signing statement was not included in news reports yesterday on the bill-signing.

Senator Susan Collins, a Republican from Maine and chairwoman of the Senate Homeland Security and Government Affairs Committee, who has been one of the harshest critics of FEMA's performance during Katrina, yesterday rejected Bush's suggestion that he can bypass the new FEMA laws.

Responding to questions from the Globe, Collins said there are numerous precedents for Congress establishing qualifications for executive branch positions, ranging from the solicitor general's post to the director of the Fish and Wildlife Service.

She also said that Congress has long authorized certain officials from a variety of departments ``to go directly to Congress with recommendations," pointing out that the FEMA director statute was modeled after a law that gives similar independence to the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff at the Pentagon.

``I believe it is appropriate to extend this authority to the official tasked with leading the nation's response to disasters," she said.

Georgetown Law School professor Martin Lederman said Congress clearly has the power to set standards for positions such as the FEMA director, so long as the requirements leave a large enough pool of qualified candidates that the White House has ``ample room for choice."

``It's hard to imagine a more modest and reasonable congressional response to the Michael Brown fiasco," said Lederman, who worked in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel from 1994 to 2002.

The White House did not respond to requests for comment about its signing statement.

In the past, the administration has defended the legality of its signing statements. It has also argued that because Congress often lumps many laws into a single package, it is sometimes impractical to veto a large bill on the basis of some parts being flawed .

At a June hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, a Bush administration attorney, Michelle Boardman , noted that other US presidents have also used signing statements. She asserted that Bush's statements ``are not an abuse of power."

Bush's use of signing statements has attracted increasing attention over the past year. In December 2005, Bush asserted that he can bypass a statutory ban on torture. In March 2006, the president said he can disobey oversight provisions in the Patriot Act reauthorization bill.

In all, Bush has challenged more than 800 laws enacted since he took office, most of which he said intruded on his constitutional powers as president and commander in chief. By contrast, all previous presidents challenged a combined total of about 600 laws.

At the same time, Bush has virtually abandoned his veto power, giving Congress no chance to override his judgments. Bush has vetoed just one bill since taking office, the fewest of any president since the 19th century.

Earlier this year, the American Bar Association declared that Bush's use of signing statements was ``contrary to the rule of law and our constitutional separation of powers."

Last month, the nonpartisan Congressional Research Service concluded that Bush's signing statements are ``an integral part" of his ``comprehensive strategy to strengthen and expand executive power" at the expense of the legislative branch.

Ashcroft Says 9/11 Panel Obsessed With Bush Blame (WT/UPI)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

Former Attorney General John Ashcroft this week became the only Cabinet-level Bush official to criticize the September 11 commission, writing in a memoir that it "seemed obsessed with trying to lay the blame for the terrorist attacks at the feet of the Bush administration, while virtually absolving the previous administration of responsibility."

In the book, Mr. Ashcroft also writes that the hearings of the National Commission on Terrorist Attacks Upon the United States "were not so much about discovering the truth as they were about assessing blame and grandstanding." He added that the hearings "degenerated into show trials."

Slade Gorton, a former Republican senator from Washington state who was a member of the commission, said yesterday that he found the charges "extraordinary," recalling that President Bush had personally repudiated Mr. Ashcroft's tactics in his sparring with the commission.

"Most of the criticism [the commission received] was the exact opposite: that we didn't blame anyone," he said. "Our job was to write a factual account, which readers could use to assess blame for themselves."

In the memoir, "Never Again: Securing America and Restoring Justice," Mr. Ashcroft also accuses the commission of trying to "stimulate media interest" in its hearings by leaking "juicy tidbits" beforehand. He writes that this was why he alone of all the serving and former senior officials who were witnesses for the commission did not provide them with advance copies of his testimony.

Mr. Gorton dismissed that explanation, saying, "The reason, I'm convinced, is that he intended to and did use his testimony to launch a disingenuous and underhanded personal attack on a member of the commission."

At his April 14, 2003, appearance, Mr. Ashcroft reported to the commission a just-declassified memo written by commission member and former Clinton administration Justice Department official Jamie S. Gorelick in 1995. The memo, Mr. Ashcroft said, was "the basic architecture" for what became known as the "wall" that hindered cooperation between U.S. intelligence and law-enforcement agencies.

Before September 11, 2001, a variety of laws, court rulings and departmental regulations strictly separated intelligence from criminal investigations, out of concern that prosecutors should not be allowed to use the much less restrictive rules about wiretapping and other kinds of surveillance that applied in intelligence operations to gather material for criminal cases.

The commission's report, however, concluded that the wall grew up during the 1980s, primarily as a response to a series of court rulings, and noted that a memo from Mr. Ashcroft's deputy in August 2001 had effectively ratified the policy laid out by Miss Gorelick in 1995.

Two weeks later, on April 28, Mr. Ashcroft declassified more memos written by or receiving comment by Miss Gorelick, posting them on the Justice Department Web site, even though they had not been made available to the commission.

Mr. Ashcroft, who was traveling in Europe yesterday, did not respond to a request for a comment. The White House, the Justice Department and Miss Gorelick all declined to comment.

Report Rips TSA's Plans For Crisis (USAT)

By Thomas Frank

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Transportation Security Administration may not be able to secure the nation's airports, transit systems and other vital operations during a terrorist attack, a government report released Thursday says.

The administration's ability to perform “essential functions” during an attack or other emergency “is at risk” and “could be impaired or fail,” according to the report, filed after an investigation by the Homeland Security Department inspector general.

The report criticizes the TSA for having inadequate plans to keep itself running in a terrorist attack, disaster or other emergency.

Such planning “has not been a priority for TSA nor have adequate resources been available,” Inspector General Richard Skinner wrote.

The TSA disputed the predictions, saying it could continue to operate during an emergency.

In a statement Thursday, the TSA called its contingency plans effective and said they got high marks during a recent test of how the agency would respond to an attack.

In a July letter to Skinner, the TSA said it has made contingency plans a “high priority” and is rewriting the plan to address shortcomings.

The TSA's potential problems suggest a fundamental flaw with national security, said Clark Kent Ervin, Skinner's predecessor. “If an agency that's designed to help the rest of the country recover can't itself recover from an attack, how helpful can it be to the rest of the country?”

Federal agencies must have plans enabling them to function for 30 days after an emergency.

The TSA's plan is “cumbersome” because it includes too many activities and people instead of focusing on priorities, Skinner's report said.

Some of the actions called for in TSA's current emergency plan include answering routine complaints and collecting customer feedback.

The TSA doesn't prioritize its plans and never completed a review of them, the report says.

Report Hits Preparedness To Protect Transport Systems (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

Homeland Security officials still lack a continuity-of-operations plan to ensure that the nation's transportation systems are not interrupted in the wake of a terrorist attack, according to an inspector general report released yesterday.

Without the plan, the Transportation Security Administration's (TSA) "ability to support, coordinate, and direct intermodal transportation security during an emergency could be impaired or fail," the report said.

The Federal Emergency Management Agency has the task of overseeing the plan, but "has provided only limited oversight," because it "does not currently "have the authority to serve as a regulatory agent responsible for ensuring" that agencies have a viable Continuity of Operations Plan (COOP), the report said.

In his response to the audit, FEMA Director R. David Paulison disputed whether his agency is responsible for oversight, rather than assistance.

The order says FEMA "shall coordinate and support" national emergency preparedness and does not specify the COOP program, Mr. Paulison said.

Mr. Paulison noted that nearly 30,000 employees have taken advantage of emergency courses offered by his agency.

According to federal guidelines, the TSA must be capable of implementing an emergency plan without warning and be fully operational within 12 hours.

The current program "only partially" addresses 11 key elements required in a plan, including alternate operating facilities, delegation of authority, orders of succession, protecting vital records, interoperable communications and reconstruction.

The TSA is a key component of homeland security and oversees security for highways, railroads, buses, mass transit systems, ports and 450 U.S. airports with 50,000 employees.

"TSA has developed a cumbersome COOP plan that would require more than 200 agency personnel to conduct 138 mission-essential functions at two or more different locations during the most extreme emergency situations," the report said.

The report questions some functions considered "essential," such as investigating routine complaints, paperwork, and collecting customer and airline feedback.

The specific "mission-essential" functions not addressed in the plan were redacted from the report, as well as some parts of the TSA's response to the investigations.

"TSA officials agreed that COOP planning has not been a TSA priority, as evidenced by the ...," one redacted statement in the report said.

The response from Robert Jamison, TSA deputy assistant secretary, completely redacted how the agency plans to address the 11 elements cited by the inspector general.

"However, TSA has made several significant changes to the program in recent months that are not reflected in the report," Mr. Jamison said. "For example, the assistant secretary has made COOP a high priority, and COOP management has begun developing a detailed and comprehensive program management plan and multi-year strategy."

The inspector general's report recommended more funding be allocated and stronger oversight from top homeland officials. After the audit began, the Department of Homeland Security allocated $10 million in funding for the program.

EU, U.S. Agree On Air Passenger Data (AP)

By Robert Wielaard

The AP, October 6, 2006

LUXEMBOURG - European Union and U.S. negotiators reached a deal on sharing trans-Atlantic air passenger data for anti-terror investigations, diplomats said Friday, concluding arduous talks that highlighted divisions over privacy rights.

Details of the agreement - reached a week after the two sides missed an Oct. 1 deadline - were not immediately revealed. It followed a trans-Atlantic video conference lasting at least seven hours, said EU diplomats who spoke on condition of anonymity because EU government representatives had not yet been formally notified of the deal.

Negotiators were briefing the 25 EU ambassadors about the deal before more discussions by EU justice and interior ministers later Friday.

The EU ministers were expected to endorse the accord, which replaces a 2004 trans-Atlantic air passenger privacy deal that the EU high court voided last May for technical reasons. The re-negotiated deal is an interim agreement; the EU and the U.S. hope to conclude a permanent one next year.

Negotiations collapsed last week when EU negotiators - seeking a simple replacement accord - could not agree to a request by U.S. Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff for more routine sharing of passenger data among U.S. law enforcement agencies. Washington also wanted the right to access airline reservation systems.

Under the lapsed agreement, passenger data is relayed to U.S. Customs and Border Protection officials who cannot routinely share it with other Department of Homeland Security agencies or the FBI.

Reaching a new deal had been an EU priority to ensure airlines could continue to legally submit 34 pieces of data about passengers flying from Europe to the United States. Such data - including passengers' names, addresses and credit card details - must be transferred to U.S. authorities within 15 minutes of a flight's departure for the United States.

Washington had warned that airlines failing to share passenger data faced fines of up to $6,000 per passenger and the loss of landing rights.

The talks reflected disagreements between the United States and the European Union over how far governments should go in curbing personal freedoms to prevent terror attacks.

During the negotiations, EU officials stressed they shared Washington's concerns about terrorism, but demanded strict data protection guarantees in return for more routine sharing of passengers' personal details among U.S. government law enforcement officials.

Washington and Brussels have already faced off over the U.S. administration's use of secret CIA detention centers in Europe to interrogate terror suspects.

European governments are also annoyed over a secret deal between the U.S. Treasury and the Belgium-based money transfer company SWIFT, which has for years secretly supplied U.S. authorities with massive amounts of personal data for use in anti-terror investigations, violating EU privacy rules.

Privacy restrictions tend to be stricter in Europe than in the United States.

EU, US Try To Nail Down Agreement On Sharing Air-travel Data (CSM)

By Susan Sachs

The Christian Science Monitor, October 6, 2006

PARIS

The European Union and American antiterrorism officials are close to resolving longstanding differences over sharing personal information about airline passengers.

An agreement could be reached Friday to clear up a murky situation for European airlines, which risked being in violation of EU laws if they provided passenger data to the United States, and risked being barred from US airports if they refused.

"We have an initial agreement, and we will be negotiating with them today," Friso Roscam Abbing, a spokesman for the European Commission, said on Thursday. "We hope that things go well."

The EU, citing privacy concerns, had objected to demands by the US Department of Homeland Security that airlines turn over data that might reveal a passenger's ethnicity or religion. It also balked at the US plan to keep the passenger information indefinitely.

The International Air Transport Association says about 105,000 people fly between Europe and the United States each day.

The draft agreement under discussion would require airlines to provide the US government up to 34 different types of passenger information, most of it collected when a reservation is made and the rest gathered just before takeoff.

Data that could indicate a passenger's religion - say, a request for a meal without pork, which is forbidden in Islam and Judaism - would not be transmitted. In addition, the US government would have to remove the passenger data received from European airlines from its databases after 11 years.

Answering another EU concern, the proposed new agreement would also specify that the US Customs and Border Protection agency could share the passenger information with other agencies, but only after notifying the EU on a case-by-case basis.

After 9/11, the US required all airlines using its airports to provide data about their passengers, including e-mail addresses, credit card numbers, and information about how and when they bought their tickets.

The measure was presented as an antiterror tool that could help US investigators spot suspicious activity.

The European Parliament was hostile to the US demand from the start, with some members complaining that the Americans wanted too much personal information on passengers that could be used for purposes other than antiterror investigations.

A temporary accord between the EU commission and the US was reached in 2004, but the European Court of Justice invalidated it earlier this year.

European governments have objected to other US counterterror actions, including the use of European airspace and airports for secretly transporting terror suspects.

Last month, the EU also said it would investigate allegations that the Belgium-based Society for Worldwide Interbank Financial Telecommunication, or SWIFT, violated European privacy laws by sharing confidential banking records with American antiterror officials.

WAR NEWS:

Rice, In Baghdad, Insists That Iraqis Are 'Making Progress' (NYT)

By Philip Shenon

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 5 — Wearing a helmet and a flak jacket and flanked by machine-gun-toting bodyguards to defend against insurgents, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice came here Thursday, insisting that there were new signs of progress in Iraq and that the Bush administration had never sugarcoated its news about the American occupation.

"It is a quite critical time for the Iraqi government," Ms. Rice said of the reasons for her brief unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital.

"What the American people see on their television screens is the struggle," she said. "It is harder to show the political process that is going on at local levels, at provincial levels and indeed at the national level." Iraqis, she said, are "making progress."

Ms. Rice said she was in Iraq to offer support to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki and to urge him to move faster to settle political differences that are seen as having prevented actions to curb the insurgents' violence.

Ms. Rice met twice with Mr. Maliki on Thursday and praised him for his "excellent leadership of Iraq."

Yet signs of progress were not much in evidence in the first hours of her visit.

It began inauspiciously when the military transport plane that brought her to Baghdad was forced to circle the city for about 40 minutes because of what a State Department spokesman later said was either mortar fire or rockets at the airport.

On Thursday evening, during her meeting with President Jalal Talabani, the lights went out, forcing Ms. Rice to continue the discussion in the dark. It was a reminder of the city's erratic — and sometimes nonexistent — electrical service.

She arrived in the midst of an especially bloody few days for American troops. At least 21 American soldiers have been killed in Iraq since Saturday, most in Baghdad. Two car bombings in the city on Thursday left at least four Iraqi civilians dead.

The extraordinary security precautions for Ms. Rice's trip here — her first to Iraq in six months, her fifth as secretary of state — were evidence of continuing turmoil in Iraq three years after the American ouster of Saddam Hussein.

Traveling from Israel on Thursday morning, Ms. Rice had to abandon her comfortable official jet at an American air base in Turkey and to board a C-17A cargo plane equipped with antimissile technology for the final, 90-minute leg into Baghdad; that procedure has become routine for all high-ranking Bush administration officials visiting Iraq.

From the airport in Baghdad, Ms. Rice flew by military helicopter to the heavily fortified American-controlled Green Zone, bypassing the dangerous, explosives-strewn airport highway into the city.

Reporters traveling with her were told of the Baghdad trip only hours before departure and were instructed not to share details with anyone, including their editors and families, until she had arrived safely. They were barred from reporting how long she would stay in Iraq until after she had left the country.

Meeting with reporters en route to Baghdad, Ms. Rice defended Prime Minister Maliki against recent criticism from senior Iraqi and American officials that he has failed to show the political muscle needed to prevent a full civil war.

"I do think he has the strength," she said. "I think he's a very good and strong prime minister."

She said that Mr. Maliki's government was "starting to really take some actions" to end the insurgency and restore order, including the move this week to suspend a brigade of about 800 Iraqi policemen for suspected complicity in death squads.

"That's a very positive thing, because we've said many times that the Interior Ministry in the prior government, before the permanent government was put in place, was not active enough" in dealing with police collusion with militias, she said.

"The security situation is not one that can be tolerated and it's not one helped by political inaction," she said. "That is a message that Prime Minister Maliki is trying to send."

While trying to put a brave face on the situation here, Ms. Rice defended the administration from accusations at home that President Bush and his closest advisers — Ms. Rice has been singled out among them — have not been truthful about Iraq.

The criticism has grown sharper since the disclosure of details last week of a book by the reporter Bob Woodward of The Washington Post, who has been granted extraordinary access to President Bush's inner circle in the past, that depicts the administration as dysfunctional and deceitful about the American invasion and occupation of Iraq.

In the book, Ms. Rice is described as having ignored warnings about a possible terrorist attack before Sept. 11, 2001, when she was the national security adviser, and as having discouraged debate about national security issues. Ms. Rice and the White House have disputed many of the book's assertions.

The book reports that President Bush's father, former President George Bush, who employed Ms. Rice on his National Security Council in the early 1990's, had said recently that she had been a "disappointment" and "not up to the job."

The senior Mr. Bush disputed that account during an interview on CNN with Larry King on Thursday. "That quote, that's a lie — I can't make it any more clear than that because I like Condoleezza Rice," he said. I can't believe Woodward — I haven't read the book — that he actually said I said that."

Mr. Bush said he spoke to Ms. Rice himself on Wednesday and added, "I guess there were some hurt feelings." He said he told her not to believe the account.

Meeting with reporters en route to Baghdad, Ms. Rice refused to be drawn into a discussion about the book. "Look, I'm not going to address Bob Woodward," she said.

Rice Pushes Iraqis To Defuse Violence (WP)

By Robin Wright

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 5 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice urged the embattled Iraqi government on Thursday to accelerate efforts to foster national reconciliation and help end sectarian violence.

Rice, on an unannounced visit to the Iraqi capital, warned that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's six-month-old administration has reached a "critical time" and needs to make faster progress to defuse the turmoil. A day earlier, U.S. military officials announced that the number of planted bombs in Iraq had reached "an all-time high" and that at least 24 U.S. soldiers had been killed since Saturday.

"The security situation is not one that can be tolerated and is not one that is helped by political inaction," Rice told reporters traveling with her.

Although Rice did not give a timeline, Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.) warned Thursday that the United States should explore a "change of course" if the security situation in Iraq does not improve over the next 90 days.

"If these movements now being taken by the Iraqi leadership and their government do not bring about a reduction in the killings and all of the other disruption and do not point to a clear direction that Iraq is going . . . then I think we have to make some bold decisions here in our country, but make them in a way so that we don't allow this land of Iraq to be torn up and fall into the hands of terrorists," Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said at a news conference in Washington after returning from his own trip to Iraq.

After talks with Rice, Iraqi Foreign Minister Hoshyar Zebari acknowledged that Washington is expressing growing impatience with Iraq and asking for more tangible progress in both security and reconciliation of the country's divided religious, political and ethnic factions.

Over a dinner breaking the dawn-to-dusk fast during the holy month of Ramadan, Rice told Maliki and other Iraqi leaders that it was time for ordinary Iraqis to feel a difference, Zebari said. But he said she also confirmed the Bush administration's full support for the fragile young government.

Iraqi officials told Rice that they need time to make "slow but steady progress" on political reconciliation, for example, before they can act against factional militias, particularly the Shiite militias that might undercut Maliki's own support base, Zebari said. Maliki is a Shiite.

"Our role is not to resolve those issues for them. They are going to have to resolve those issues among themselves," Rice had earlier told reporters traveling with her. "Our role is to support all the parties, indeed to press all the parties to work toward that resolution quickly."

During the dinner, Iraq's parliamentary speaker, Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, suggested to Rice that U.S. troops reoccupy Baghdad, where the government's new security plan has made limited progress, according to both Iraqi and U.S. participants. Mashhadani, the leading Sunni Arab in government, until recently had denounced the continued U.S. military presence in Iraq.

Though U.S. officials rejected such a move, they took the exchange as a positive development because it reflected the changing Sunni attitude and a realization that the United States is not the enemy, a senior State Department official told reporters.

In a reflection of the deteriorating security situation here, Rice's plane was forced to circle Baghdad for nearly an hour before landing because of a mortar attack near the airport.

Violence continued to rage across Iraq, with at least 35 people killed or found dead in separate incidents across the country, police said.

The U.S. military announced that two Marines assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 were killed in combat Wednesday in Anbar province, the volatile Sunni insurgent stronghold. And a Kurdish member of parliament, Mohammed Ridah Sinkawi, was assassinated by militia members in northeast Baghdad on Thursday night, according to Mohammed Abu Bakr, another Kurdish legislator.

Despite growing concern, even among some U.S. officials, about whether Iraq's leadership has the ability to take the firm steps required, Rice said she believes Maliki can do the job. "I think he has the strength. He's a good and strong prime minister," she said.

She also praised Iraqis as a strong people capable of facing the current political, economic and military problems. "This is an important time and a challenge for the Iraqi people . . . and we know that they will overcome these challenges," Rice said.

Rice, who is playing the dominant role in Iraq policy during President Bush's second term, also talked to the Iraqi leadership about the national compact aimed at settling outstanding and divisive issues in Iraq's new constitution. The compact seeks to resolve such problems as dealing with militias, distributing Iraq's oil revenue among its three major sectarian and ethnic groups, and determining how much autonomy to grant areas of the country under a federal system.

Rice made clear that the United States opposes a proposal by Kurds to channel oil revenue from Kirkuk, a disputed northern city, into the country's three primarily Kurdish provinces. "We believe that oil has to be a resource for the Iraqi people as a whole and benefits the people as a whole," Rice said. "Our only view, which we have communicated, is that oil needs to be a unifying factor, not one that makes the country less unified."

"The core of getting a stable security environment really does rest on getting some of these political issues resolved," Rice said.

Rice Urges Limit To 'Endless Debate' On Iraqi Division (WT)

By Nicholas Kralev

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned Iraqi leaders during an unannounced visit yesterday that they have limited time to end the factional wrangling that has produced political paralysis while violence in Baghdad rises to new heights.

A month before the U.S. midterm elections in which the Iraq war is a major issue, Miss Rice decried "what the American people see on their television screens."

Iraqi leaders "don't have time for endless debate of these issues," she told reporters during the flight to Baghdad, citing the division of oil wealth, changes to the national constitution and the desire for greater regional autonomy.

"They have really got to move forward," she said. "That is one of the messages that I'll take, but it will also be a message of support and what can we do to help."

A senior U.S. official said later that Miss Rice had told the Iraqis that most Americans, when looking at Iraq, "don't see the fine print" and are unaware of the country's "historical narrative."

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell announced a day before Miss Rice's arrival that the number of planted bombs in Baghdad was "at an all-time high," while U.S. military fatalities in the capital had jumped to 22 in four days.

The tense security situation was driven home when Miss Rice's plane was forced to circle for close to an hour before landing because of what U.S. officials described as "indirect" fire against the Baghdad airport complex.

The Sunni speaker of Parliament, Mahmoud Mashadani, suggested to Miss Rice that the United States "reoccupy" Baghdad, U.S. and Iraqi officials said. The senior U.S. official said that Miss Rice took that to reflect the view of many Sunnis, who once rejected the U.S. presence but now look to the Americans for protection.

The secretary praised a decision by Iraqi authorities on Wednesday to pull a brigade of about 700 policemen out of service because of suspected ties to death squads that have largely targeted Sunnis.

"That's a very positive thing, because we've said many times that the Interior Ministry in the prior government ... was not active enough in really rooting out potential corruption and potential violence within the ministry itself or of the ministry forces," she said.

She credited Nouri al-Maliki's government for acting against the police brigade and called him "a very good and strong prime minister." She met with Mr. al-Maliki, President Jalal Talabani and other Shi'ite and Sunni leaders. She had a second meeting with Mr. al-Maliki at the end of the evening.

"Our role is to support all the parties and, indeed, to press all the parties to work toward that resolution quickly, because obviously the security situation is not one that can be tolerated, and it is not one that is being helped by political inaction," Miss Rice said.

She urged her hosts "to get a national reconciliation plan, to get everybody to understand precisely how their interests are going to be represented." She also told them to "pull more people into the political process and out of the insurgency."

On Monday, Mr. al-Maliki announced a new security plan for Baghdad, creating local committees in which Sunnis and Shi'ites are meant to work together to stop the violence on a district-by-district level. Details of the plan have yet to be fleshed out.

Miss Rice declined to offer specific advice on how Iraqis should amend their constitution or sort out the autonomy issues, but she weighed in on a dispute over the ownership of oil in the Kurdish north.

"We believe that oil has to be a resource for the Iraqi people as a whole, and it has to benefit the Iraqi people as a whole," she said. "The relationship between the regions, the localities and the center on how exploration is done, how decisions are made, I think that's what the hydrocarbon law has to address."

Miss Rice was to visit the Kurdish north today, concluding her fifth visit to Iraq since she became secretary of state in January 2005. She was here twice in April -- first with then-British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw to push for the formation of a Cabinet, and then with Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld to lend support to Mr. al-Maliki.

Iraq Leaders Urged To Settle Differences (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 5, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned Iraqi leaders on Thursday they have limited time to settle their differences and that the escalating waves of violence are intolerable.

On a visit five weeks before congressional elections in the U.S., Rice also insisted the Bush administration has been honest with Americans about the costs and stakes in Iraq.

Administration officials recently have found themselves defending their conduct of the war, and Rice's remarks reflected the political toll for the White House from an unpopular conflict.

"This is really hard going," Rice told reporters during her stop in the Iraqi capital. "Not only do I believe that the president has been clear with the American people that this is a struggle, he's been clear with the American people why he thinks it's a struggle that needs to be waged."

After meetings in the Mideast with Arab and Israeli leaders, the top U.S. diplomat came to Iraq to tell sometimes squabbling leaders they have a short window to resolve disputes that she said are spurring sectarian and insurgent violence.

While killings among Iraqis have not abated, American casualties also have spiked recently.

Car bombs killed four people and wounded 28 in Baghdad on Thursday. At least 23 U.S. soldiers have died since Saturday; most were in Baghdad amid a massive security sweep by U.S. and Iraqi forces.

Rice said the U.S. role is "to support all the parties and indeed to press all the parties to work toward that resolution quickly because obviously the security situation is not one that can be tolerated and it is not one that is being helped by political inaction."

In a series of meetings with leaders representing most ethnic and religious factions, Rice delivered a blunt message about how Americans do not see the history behind ethnic and sectarian splits, said a senior State Department official present at the sessions.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the meetings were confidential, said Rice also said Americans need to see Iraqis working together rather than killing one another.

Rice met with Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki and other officials as the sectarian cycle of revenge killings between Shiites and Sunnis threatened to undermine his government. Shiite and Sunni parties in al-Maliki's coalition accuse each other of backing militias.

Al-Maliki told Iraqi state TV on Thursday that the country is in the final stage of "confronting the security challenge" and that security would be achieved "within the two or three months to come."

Rice said Iraqis themselves must settle difficult problems such as the division of oil wealth, possible changes to the constitution and the desire for greater autonomy in various regions.

"Obviously the security side and the political side are linked," Rice told reporters.

In an interview with The Associated Press, al-Maliki said that once the Iraqis work out their differences, "the political solution must be obligatory, one that all parties adhere to. The presence of parties with militias in the government is not acceptable."

Rice described the task as "the ability to get everybody to understand precisely how their interests are going to be represented and how their interests are going to be served in this political process."

Al-Maliki made curbing Baghdad violence his first priority after taking office in the spring. But curfews and other measures have failed to make much difference.

On Monday, al-Maliki announced a security plan to unite the feuding parties, creating local committees in which Sunnis and Shiites will work together to manage efforts at quelling the violence on a district-by-district level.

Contentious details of the plan must be worked out, and Shiite and Sunni parties twice have put off negotiations.

"This is, of course, a time of challenge for the Iraqi people," Rice said after a brief meeting with al-Maliki. "They are a committed people and we know they will overcome these challenges."

Rice's plane circled the Baghdad airport for 35 minutes before landing because of a threat from "indirect fire" — mortar rounds or rockets — in the airport area, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters.

In Washington, U.S. Senate Democrats issued a press release Thursday calling attention to the growing number of U.S. casualties and a record level of bomb attacks in Baghdad.

In AP-Ipsos polling last month, more than half of Americans said the United States was losing ground in Iraq. About 40 percent approved of President Bush's job performance.

DOJ_NMG_0076453

Rice disputed that the administration has been less than candid about Iraq. Now in its fourth year, the conflict has claimed more than 2,700 American lives and cost more than $300 billion.

A new book by journalist Bob Woodward about the wartime White House, asserts that the administration routinely has understated the difficulties and fudged hard truths in Iraq.

"I would say, go back and look at any presidential speech in the last year and the discussion of the fact that this is very tough going is in there," Rice said.

Rice In Iraq Visit (FT)

By Steve Negus

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

Condoleezza Rice, US secretary of state, made a surprise visit to Iraq on Thursday, pressing the country's leaders to move more quickly to deal with sectarian violence.

"They don't have time for endless debate of these issues," Ms Rice said before meeting Nouri al-Maliki, the prime minister.

Ms Rice said Iraqis must resolve for themselves divisive issues such as control of oil wealth and formation of autonomous regions.

The visit came just three days after Mr Maliki had announced an initiative setting up local committees to oversee the security forces.

Bolton fallback

Some congressional staffers are talking up a fallback position in the event that John R. Bolton, U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, is not confirmed by the Senate in his current post.

President Bush made a recess appointment in August 2005, after Democrats and one Republican blocked his confirmation. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Richard G. Lugar, Indiana Republican, wants another committee vote. But now Sen. Lincoln Chafee, Rhode Island Republican, who is in a tight re-election battle in a liberal-leaning state, is balking.

With confirmation prospects looking dim, Mr. Bolton's recess appointment will expire when a new Congress convenes Jan. 3.

The fallback: Mr. Bush could name Mr. Bolton as a deputy U.N. representative, a non-confirmable position, and then name him "acting" U.N. ambassador. Such a move would require some musical chairs of current deputies in the U.S. representative office in New York.

During a meeting at The Washington Times this week, we asked R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, about such a deal. "We want confirmation," he said. "We do not discuss fallback positions."

Iran option

A former Navy intelligence officer weighs in on how the world will stop Iran from building nuclear bombs:

"I really believe the Israelis are going to strike [Iran's] several uranium processing factories soon. They cannot survive a first strike. This time, unlike when they sent eight F-16s to destroy the Iraqi reactor Osirak, I think they will use the Jericho missiles and the submarine-launched, nuclear-tipped Tomahawks to do nuclear strikes. Most of the factories are 150 meters underground and too deep for bunker busters."

SLAM-ER

Boeing recently conducted a successful flight test of the Navy's extremely accurate Standoff Land Attack Missile-Expanded Response, known by the appropriate acronym, SLAM-ER. The test was against a simulated Iranian Shahab-3 mobile missile and a Russian-made SA-10 air defense missile.

The SLAM-ER scored a direct hit against the moving SA-10 target at the Navy's China Lake, Calif., air warfare test center on Sept. 13, the company said.

That test followed a June 1 flight test missile attack against a Shahab-3 missile launcher mock-up.

"SLAM-ER now has the flexibility to engage both fixed and moving land targets," said Jan Browne, Boeing's naval weapons director. "This demonstrated capability greatly enhances the Navy's ability to engage high-interest mobile targets in today's varied threat environment."

The latest test-firing was carried out from a Navy F/A-18 jet, which was able to relay targeting data to the SLAM-ER after it was launched.

DOJ_NMG_0076454

The next test will involve firing the missile at a SA-3 missile launcher, and the SLAM-ER will attempt to hit the target as it changes speed and maneuvers.

The satellite-guided missile has a range of up to 155 miles and is extremely accurate.

Rummy on war

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld told journalist Bob Woodward that the global war on terrorism will be won like the Cold War, without a final traditional military battle.

"The Cold War was won not by some buildup to a crescendo of a military battle," Mr. Rumsfeld said July 7. "It was won economic, political and military. And the war on terror, the struggle against violent extremists, is going to be won the same way, over an sustained period of time."

Viewing the war as purely a military battle is wrong and winning will take "patience and persistence."

"And ultimately it will take what helped us prevail in the Cold War, and that is the fact that through successive administrations of both political parties, people recognized the threat and they were willing to invest and persevere, and they were willing to work with other countries in Western Europe, in this case, and make tough decisions."

Mr. Rumsfeld also expressed his doubts about the reliability of U.S. intelligence assessments.

Asked about a May intelligence assessment that the Sunni insurgency in Iraq was gaining strength, Mr. Rumsfeld said: "I read so many of those intelligence reports and they are all over the lot.

"In a given day, you can see one from one agency, and one from another agency, and then I'll ask Casey or Abizaid what they think about it or Pete Pace, 'Is that your view?' and trying to triangulate and see what people think, but it changes from month to month. I'm not going to get tied to saying I agree or don't agree with something like that."

He was referring to Gen. George Casey, the top commander in Iraq; Gen. John Abizaid, the head of U.S. Central Command; and Gen. Peter Pace, Joint Chiefs chairman.

Mr. Rumsfeld last week told reporters he is a not a fan of Mr. Woodward and has not read his earlier books, "so I wouldn't hold your breath on this one."

USS Bush

The USS George H.W. Bush will be the last of the Navy's Nimitz-class carriers and will honor the former World War II naval aviator. Mr. Bush was shot down while flying an Avenger torpedo during an attack on enemy installations near Chichi Jima in September 1944.

"Although the plane was on fire and heavily damaged, he completed a strafing run on the target before bailing out of the doomed aircraft," the Navy said in announcing the christening.

Mr. Bush parachuted into the sea and later was rescued by the Navy submarine USS Finback. He was awarded the Distinguished Flying Cross and three Air Medals.

The 97,000-ton ship, when commissioned and operational, will carry 5,000 crew members and about 75 warplanes.

Warner Downbeat After Iraq Trip (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

The Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee yesterday offered a stark assessment of the situation in Iraq after a trip there this week, saying that parts of the country have taken "steps backwards" and that the United States is at risk of losing the campaign to control an increasingly violent Baghdad.

Sen. John W. Warner (Va.) told reporters on Capitol Hill that the Iraqi government is having trouble making strides and is incapable of providing even basic human necessities to people in certain areas of the country. Though Warner praised U.S. efforts to keep Iraq under control, he was far less optimistic about the situation there than he had been over the past three years.

Echoing the sentiments of several leading Democrats on his committee, Warner said he believes the United States may have to reevaluate its approach in Iraq if the situation does not improve dramatically over the next several months.

"I assure you, in two or three months, if this thing hasn't come to fruition and if this level of violence is not under control and this government able to function, I think it's a responsibility of our government internally to determine: Is there a change of course that we should take?" Warner said. "And I wouldn't take off the table any option at this time."

Warner and other senators traveled to Jordan, Iraq and Israel this week to discuss the security situation and to evaluate the progress of the Iraqi government. He said U.S. military commanders believe there is no way to reduce the number of U.S. troops in the region in the foreseeable future because of a steady increase in the level of violence, and he added that it is important to acknowledge the civil insurrection, sectarian violence, "unacceptable level" of killings and "heavy casualties" among U.S. forces there.

Sen. Carl M. Levin (Mich.), the committee's ranking Democrat, who was on the same trip, called yesterday for a change in dynamic in Iraq if the government continues to falter in the coming months.

Warner blamed the Iraqi leaders for failing to improve conditions. "You do not see them taking the levers of sovereignty and pulling and pushing them and doing what is necessary to bring about a situation in Iraq whereby the people are able to live, have sufficient food and fresh water, and have a sense of confidence in their government that they're going forward," Warner said.

But he said the situation is not beyond repair. "We're not going to give up hope yet. Let's give it more time to work."

Warner acknowledged that, before the invasion of Iraq, there was a lack of understanding among members of Congress about how much it would take to give Iraq full sovereignty. He blamed himself for not aggressively asking such questions before the war.

Senator Says U.S. Should Rethink Iraq Strategy (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 5 — The Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee warned Thursday that the situation in Iraq was “drifting sideways” and said that the United States should consider a “change of course” if violence did not diminish soon.

The chairman, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, expressed particular concern that Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki had not moved decisively against sectarian militias.

“In two or three months if this thing hasn’t come to fruition and this level of violence is not under control, I think it’s a responsibility of our government to determine: Is there a change of course we should take?” Senator Warner said.

He did not specify what shift might be necessary in Iraq, but he said that the American military had done what it could to stabilize Iraq and that no policy options should be taken “off the table.” He was speaking at a Capitol Hill news conference after returning from a Middle East trip that included a one-day visit to Baghdad.

His comments underscored the growing misgivings of even senior Republicans about the situation in Iraq. They also appeared to be a warning to the Bush administration that it might have to consider different approaches after the November midterm elections.

Mr. Warner, whose term as chairman expires at the end of the year, said he hoped his committee would be able to hold hearings in November on policy options recommended by an independent panel, led by former Representative Lee H. Hamilton of Indiana and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III.

Mr. Warner said the idea of partitioning Iraq along ethnic and sectarian lines would have “very serious consequences,” and he refused to endorse the idea of setting a timetable for a phased withdrawal of American troops.

In a separate news conference, Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the top Democrat on the committee, said he told Iraqi officials during the trip that he favored setting a date for a drawdown of troops.

Mr. Levin described a plan that Mr. Maliki announced Monday to increase security in Baghdad as “very tenuous.” The plan has no provisions for disarming sectarian militias, he said.

Mr. Levin added that the American ambassador in Baghdad, Zalmay Khalilzad, had told him during the trip that such warnings were a “useful message” to send to Mr. Maliki, though the administration had not endorsed the idea.

“I think the time is coming when the administration is going to deliver that message,” he said, “because it’s the only way, I believe, to change the dynamic in Iraq.”

How Al Qaeda Views A Long Iraq War (CSM)

By Dan Murphy

The Christian Science Monitor, October 6, 2006

CAIRO

In appearances across the US, President Bush has been campaigning against withdrawing troops from Iraq, arguing that to leave now would hand a historic victory to Al Qaeda and inspire new generations of jihadists to attack the US.

But a letter that has been translated and released by the US military indicates that Al Qaeda itself sees the continued American presence in Iraq as a boon for the terror network, which has recently shown signs of expanding into the Palestinian territories and North Africa.

"The most important thing is that the jihad continues with steadfastness ... indeed, prolonging the war is in our interest," says the writer, who goes by the name Atiyah. The letter, released last week, was recovered in the rubble of the Iraqi house where Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, former leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, was killed by a US bomb in June.

If the letter is accurate, it provides a window into the group's strategic thinking on Iraq that differs starkly from the one the Bush administration has been expressing publicly - a view the president reiterated Wednesday when he said that Al Qaeda believes that "America is weak, and if they can kill enough innocent people we'll retreat. That's precisely what they want."

While the letter was released only recently, Atiyah, thought to be a senior Al Qaeda leader whose full name Atiyah Abd al-Rahman, apparently wrote it last December from the Pakistani region of Waziristan. It has surfaced among a flurry of other communiqués from Al Qaeda.

Al Qaeda's No. 2, Ayman al-Zawahiri, released a videotape this week in which he lashed out at Mr. Bush and Pope Benedict XVI. On Sept. 28, Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, believed to have replaced Mr. Zarqawi as the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq, published an Internet statement in which he reached out to Sunni tribal leaders who have been in conflict with Al Qaeda. And a new group claiming to be Al Qaeda in Palestine issued a video attacking Palestinian political leaders.

But the Atiyah letter, reflecting as it does the candid opinions of Al Qaeda, rather than the group's propaganda statement crafted for public consumption, appears to offer the most insight. It is largely focused on the fact that Zarqawi's tactics were alienating Iraqi Sunni leaders, and urges him to move with more caution.

He strongly warned Zarqawi against assassinating Sunni leaders. Al Qaeda is a Sunni organization that has been trying to use minority Sunni anxiety in Iraq to build support. The letter also called the Zarqawi-organized bombing of three hotels in Jordan in 2005 a "mistake," arguing that expanding Iraq's jihad beyond its borders too soon will cost them public support.

At one point, Atiyah muses that perhaps Zarqawi should step down from his leadership role, "if you find at some point someone who is better and more suitable than you." Since Zarqawi's death, a "more suitable" figure from Al Qaeda's standpoint has indeed emerged.

"In order to understand this letter one has to see the circumstances of when this letter was released," says Rita Katz, the director of the SITE Institute, which is devoted to tracking Islamist militant groups. "This followed after Zarqawi had an audio message ... in which he threatened the tribes of the Sunnis who wouldn't cooperate with him. That was a real turning point.

"The letter from Atiyah is basically his response to this. He's telling him that instead of fighting Sunni opponents, you should reach out with more peaceful solutions."

Ms. Katz says Mr. Muhajir's Sept. 28 statement shows he has taken that advice to heart. She points out that a number of Sunni tribes in Iraq's turbulent Anbar Province have turned against Al Qaeda's main umbrella group in Iraq, the Mujahideen Shura Council (MSC), in recent months.

"Al-Muhajir's latest speech was quite interesting, because he basically said sorry to the heads of the Sunni tribes. 'We need you. We'll work together to defeat the enemy.' "

The day before his speech, Al Jazeera reported a statement it said was delivered by Ahmad Naji al-Juburi, head of the tribal council in Salahuddin Province north of Baghdad, in which he lashed out at Al Qaeda for killing "civilians, defenseless people, police and security men ... Al Qaeda said it came to Iraq for jihad and to liberate it from occupation [but] what Al Qaeda is doing is utterly at odds with what it announced."

Katz and others say Muhajir is eager to mend fences with Sunni leaders, because he knows that if Al Qaeda loses the support of Sunni tribes, it will be in a very tenuous position.

"Al-Muhajir took another step toward undoing some of the alienation Abu Musab al-Zarqawi had created in Iraq's Sunni community," Michael Scheuer, who ran the CIA's bin Laden unit from 1996 to 1999 and is now a senior fellow at the Jamestown Foundation in Washington wrote in a commentary on Muhajir's and other recent Al Qaeda communications.

How long Muhajir will be in charge of Al Qaeda in Iraq is unclear. Earlier this week, Iraqi National Security Adviser Mowaffak al-Rubaie said security forces are close to catching him. On Sept. 28, the US military caught a man it described as his driver. But given the ease with which Al Qaeda in Iraq weathered the killing of Zarqawi, analysts are skeptical that killing Muhajir will have much impact on Iraq's war.

"When Zarqawi was killed, people said that was the end of the insurgency and the end of the mass killings. But in fact we've seen mass killings increase dramatically since," says Katz. "Al Qaeda in Iraq played an important role at the beginning of the war. Zarqawi set up something that hadn't existed before, but at this stage the infrastructure is set up very nicely."

Angels And Intelligence Estimates (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

Lost between the Foley tsunami and the Woodward hurricane is the storm that began the great Republican collapse of 2006. It was only a few weeks ago that the Republicans were clawing their way back to contention for the November elections, their prospects revived by the president's strong speeches on terrorism around the Sept. 11 anniversary, the landmark legislation on treating and trying captured terrorists, and a serendipitous fall in gas prices.

Then came the momentum stopper, the leaked National Intelligence Estimate that was trumpeted as definitive evidence that the war in Iraq had made terrorism worse. Mark Foley's folly and Bob Woodward's history have overwhelmed that story, but it will remain an unrebutted charge long after Foley is forgotten and Woodward is remaindered. It demands debunking.

The question posed -- does the Iraq war increase or decrease the world supply of jihadists? -- is itself an exercise in counting angels on the head of a pin. Any answer would require a complex calculation involving dozens of unmeasurable factors, as well as construction of a complete alternate history of the world had the U.S. invasion of 2003 not happened.

Ah, but those seers in the U.S. "intelligence community," speaking through a leaked National Intelligence Estimate -- the most famous previous NIE, mind you, concluded that Saddam Hussein had weapons of mass destruction, slam-dunk -- have peered deep into the hypothetical past and found the answer. As spun by Iraq war critics, the conclusion is that Iraq has made us less safe because it has become a "cause celebre" and a rallying cry for jihad.

Become? Everyone seems to have forgotten that Iraq was already an Islamist cause celebre and rallying cry long before 2003. When Osama bin Laden issued his declaration of war against America in 1998, his two principal justifications for the jihad that exploded upon us on Sept. 11, 2001, centered on Iraq: America's alleged killing of more than 1 million Iraqis through the post-Gulf War sanctions and, even worse, the desecration of Islam's holiest cities of Mecca and Medina by the garrisoning of infidel U.S. soldiers in Saudi Arabia (as post-Gulf War protection from the continuing threat of invasion by Hussein).

The irony is that the overthrow of Hussein eliminated these two rallying cries: Iraqi sanctions were lifted and U.S. troops were withdrawn from the no-longer-threatened Saudi Arabia. But grievances cured are easily replaced. The jihadists wasted no time in finding new justifications for fury and reviving old ones. The supply is endless: Danish cartoons, papal pronouncements, the liberation of women, the existence of Israel, the licentiousness of Western culture, the war in Afghanistan. And, of course, Iraq -- again.

How important is Iraq in this calculus? The vaunted National Intelligence Estimate -- unspun -- offers a completely commonplace weighing of the relationship between terrorism and Iraq. On the one hand, the American presence does inspire some to join the worldwide jihad. On the other hand, success in the Iraq project would blunt the most fundamental enlistment tool for terrorism -- the political oppression in Arab lands that is deflected by cynical dictators and radical imams into murderous hatred of the West. Which is why the Bush democracy project embodies the greatest hope for a reduction of terrorism and why the NIE itself concludes that were the jihadists to fail in Iraq, their numbers would diminish.

It is an issue of time frame. The bombing of the Japanese home islands may have increased short-term recruiting for the kamikazes. But success in the Pacific war put a definitive end to the whole affair.

Moreover, does anyone imagine that had the jihadists in Iraq remained home they would now be tending petunias rather than plotting terror attacks? Omar al-Farouq, leader of al-Qaeda in Southeast Asia, escaped from a U.S. prison in Afghanistan a year ago and was apparently drawn to the "cause celebre" in Iraq. Last month he was killed by British troops in a firefight in Basra. In an audiotape released Sept. 28, the leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq said that more than 4,000 of its recruits have been killed there since the American invasion. Like Omar al-Farouq and Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, they went to Iraq to die in Iraq.

It is clear that one of the reasons we have gone an astonishing five years without a second attack on the American homeland is that the most dedicated and virulent jihadists have gone to Iraq to fight us, as was said during World War I, "over there."

Does the war in Iraq make us more or less safe today? And what about tomorrow? The fact is that no definitive answer is possible. Except for the following truism: During all wars we are by definition less safe -- and the surest way back to safety is victory.

Kurdish Lawmaker Killed In An Attack In Baghdad (NYT)

By Michael Luo, Khalid Al-ansary

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 5 — A Kurdish lawmaker, along with his driver, was shot and killed here Thursday afternoon. He was the first Parliament member in the current government to be assassinated, officials said.

The lawmaker, Mohammad Redha Mohammad, was an Islamist Sunni in the mostly secular Kurdistan Alliance, which represents the second-largest bloc in the Iraqi National Assembly.

Mr. Mohammad's religious background raises the possibility that his killing was yet another example of the sectarian violence that has riven this country since February's bombing of a Shiite shrine in Samarra.

An Interior Ministry official said the two bodies had been found by the Iraqi police in northern Baghdad, just a few yards from offices of the Sunni Endowment, a government organization that administers Sunni mosques. It is in Slaikh, a neighborhood that has been troubled by sectarian violence. Both men had been shot in the head.

Members of Parliament are permitted to hire up to 20 bodyguards, but Mr. Mohammad had none with him on Thursday, said Arif Tayfoor, deputy speaker of the Kurdistan Alliance, who confirmed the discovery of the body. Mr. Mohammad probably felt comfortable visiting the organization without his personal security detail because of his Islamist credentials, Mr. Tayfoor said.

Over the summer, a prominent Sunni lawmaker was kidnapped and held for nearly two months by men she described as religious Shiites. Her kidnapping prompted others in her Sunni political party, the Iraqi Islamic Party, to boycott Parliament for weeks, complaining that the Shiite-led government was not doing enough to rein in Shiite militias.

American officials have been increasing pressure on the Iraqi government to take concrete steps to rein in both Sunni and Shiite militias, which have close ties to the political parties.

A flurry of news reports earlier in the day briefly raised hopes that Al Qaeda's new leader in Iraq, Abu Ayyub al-Masri, had been killed. American military and Iraqi government officials later said that the reports were probably not true, but that to make sure, DNA tests would be performed on the body of a man killed in a recent firefight in Anbar Province. Mr. Masri is believed to have taken over Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia after Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed in June.

On Wednesday, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief American military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters that a former driver and personal assistant to Mr. Masri had been captured in a recent raid in Baghdad. The former driver was the second close associate of Mr. Masri, an Egyptian explosives expert who is said to have trained at a Qaeda camp in Afghanistan in 1999, to be captured in the past month.

Days earlier, Iraq's national security adviser, Mowaffak al-Rubaie, had boasted at a news conference that the government was closing in on Mr. Masri, showing captured videotape of a man identified as Mr. Masri demonstrating how to rig a car bomb.

The skirmish in Anbar occurred within the last few days, said Lt. Col. Barry Johnson, a military spokesman, declining to be more specific. A group of American troops came under fire and fought back, killing several insurgents, he said. The military believes they were affiliated with Al Qaeda, he said, but has determined that it is "highly unlikely" that Mr. Masri was among them.

The DNA results will be available within days, said Ali al-Dabbagh, a spokesman for the Iraqi prime minister's office.

Violence continued elsewhere in the capital, where American troops and their Iraqi counterparts have been in the midst of a stepped-up military campaign, going neighborhood by neighborhood to search buildings and secure areas. Despite these efforts, General Caldwell said Wednesday that bombings were at an all-time high since the war began in March 2003.

On Thursday, a roadside bomb detonated at 6 a.m. near Bab al-Sharji, a busy commercial district. About 20 construction workers gathered in the area were wounded. Later in the morning, a car bomb exploded in Huriya, a mixed neighborhood in northern Baghdad rife with sectarian violence, killing two people and injuring two others.

A car bomb exploded in the afternoon in the town of Abu Ghraib, west of Baghdad, near an Iraqi police and army convoy. The blast killed a woman and wounded seven other people, including a soldier.

At least 35 bodies were found dumped in various parts of the city between 6 a.m. Thursday and midnight. Most of them showed signs of torture and had been handcuffed, blindfolded and shot in the head at close range, an Interior Ministry official said.

Anti-U.S. Attack Videos Spread On The Internet (NYT)

By Edward Wyatt

LOS ANGELES, Oct. 5 — Videos showing insurgent attacks against American troops in Iraq, long available in Baghdad shops and on Jihadist Web sites, have steadily migrated in recent months to popular Internet video-sharing sites, including YouTube and Google Video.

Many of the videos, showing sniper attacks against Americans and roadside bombs exploding under American military vehicles, have been posted not by insurgents or their official supporters but apparently by Internet users in the United States and other countries, who have passed along videos found elsewhere.

Among the scenes being viewed daily by thousands of users of the sites are sniper attacks in which Americans are felled by snipers as a camera records the action and of armored Humvees or other military vehicles being hit by roadside bombs.

In some videos, the troops do not appear to have been seriously injured; in one, titled "Sniper Hit" and posted on YouTube by a user named 69souljah, a serviceman is knocked down by a shot but then gets up to seek cover. Other videos, however, show soldiers bleeding on the ground, vehicles exploding and troops being loaded onto medical evacuation helicopters.

At a time when the Bush administration has restricted photographs of the coffins of military personnel returning to the United States and the Pentagon keeps close tabs on videotapes of combat operations taken by the news media, the videos give average Americans a level of access to combat scenes rarely available before, if ever.

Their availability has also produced some backlash. In recent weeks, YouTube has removed dozens of the videos from its archives and suspended the accounts of some users who have posted them, a reaction, it said, to complaints from other users.

More than four dozen videos of combat in Iraq viewed by The New York Times have been removed in recent days, many after The Times began inquiries.

But many others remain, some labeled in Arabic, making them difficult for American users to search for. In addition, new videos, often with the same material that had been deleted elsewhere, are added daily.

Russell K. Terry, a Vietnam veteran who founded the Iraq War Veterans Organization, said he had mixed feelings about the videos.

"It's unfortunate there's no way to stop it," Mr. Terry said, even though "this is what these guys are over there fighting for: freedom of speech."

One YouTube user, who would not identify himself other than by his account name, facez0fdeath, and his location, in Britain, said by e-mail that he posted a video of a sniper attack "because I felt it was information the U.K. news was unwilling to tell."

"I was physically sickened upon seeing it," he said, adding, "I am wholly opposed to any form of censorship."

The video he posted, which had been viewed more than 33,000 times, was removed earlier this week.

Another YouTube user, who said he was a 19-year-old in Istanbul and who posted more than 40 videos of Iraq violence, said via e-mail that "anti-war feelings and Muslim beliefs (the religion of peace) motivates me."

Neal O. Newbill, a freshman at the University of Memphis who viewed some of the YouTube videos and posted comments on them, said in an interview that he was enraged by the recorded chants of "Allahu Akbar," Arabic for "God is great," that follow some of the sniper attacks.

But Mr. Newbill added that he was awed by the size of the blasts from the improvised explosive devices, or I.E.D.'s, used against American vehicles. A son, nephew and grandson of American veterans, Mr. Newbill said he had sought out the videos, searching on YouTube for "I.E.D.," "because I like watching stuff blow up."

The Web sites also contain a growing number of video clips taken by American soldiers. One shows the view from the back of a truck containing several members of a platoon, whose vehicle then hits an I.E.D. and is turned on its side. A few videos also show American servicemen or private security guards firing at attackers, and one shows an American rocket-propelled grenade hitting a building from which insurgents are firing.

A spokesman for United States Central Command, which oversees troops in Iraq, said the military was aware of the use of common Internet sites by both insurgent groups and American military personnel.

"Centcom is aware we are facing an adaptive enemy that uses the Internet as a force multiplier and as a means of connectivity," Maj. Matt McLaughlin, the spokesman, said by e-mail.

While posting of Web logs, pictures and videos by American troops is subject to military regulations, Major McLauglin said, "Al Qaeda uses the Internet and media to foster the perception that they are more capable than they are."

Some of the videos are obvious propaganda, with Arabic subtitles and accompanying music, while others simply have scenes without sound or graphics. They appear to be real, though the results of attacks are not always clear.

One frequently posted video shows individual photographs of several hundred American soldiers allegedly killed by a Baghdad sniper referred to as Juba. But a television news report from the German weekly Der Spiegel that also has been posted on the video sites shows an interview with one American soldier whom the insurgent group claimed to have killed but whose protective vest stopped the sniper's bullet.

Geoffrey D. W. Wawro, director of the Center for the Study of Military History at the University of North Texas and a former instructor at the United States Naval War College, said the erosion of the command structure of terrorist and insurgent groups had led them to increase their reliance on the Internet and videos to gain recruits.

American troops, too, have always sent snapshots home from the front, Mr. Wawro said, and digital pictures and video are simply a new incarnation of that.

"This is how the new generation does things," he said.

"It results in a continued trivialization of combat and its effects," Mr. Wawro added, "but no one feels completely comfortable saying, Don't do it."

YouTube does feel comfortable saying so, however, as does Google Video. Both have user guidelines that prohibit the posting of videos with graphic violence, a measure that spokeswomen for each service said was violated by many of the Iraq videos.

Julie Supan, senior director of marketing for YouTube, said the company removed videos after they were flagged by users as having inappropriate content and were reviewed by the video service.

In an e-mail message, Ms. Supan said that among the videos removed were those that "display graphic depictions of violence in addition to any war footage (U.S. or other) displayed with intent to shock or disgust, or graphic war footage with implied death (of U.S. troops or otherwise)."

Clark: Hanging Saddam Would Cause Chaos (AP)

By William C. Mann

AP, October 6, 2006

Former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, a member of Saddam Hussein's defense team, predicted on Thursday that a bloodbath would follow should an Iraqi court trying the former president have him executed.

At a news conference, Clark said he feared that should Saddam and the others be hanged, "catastrophic violence" would follow that would lead to "the end of civilization as we know it in the birthplace of civilization, Mesopotamia. Total, unmitigated chaos."

Saddam's Sunni Muslim tribe of 1.5 million would be enraged over what they would consider the revenge killing of the former president by the Shiite-controlled and U.S.-sponsored government, Clark said.

Clark, 78, was attorney general under President Johnson despite opposing the Vietnam War and has been best known since for defending people with unpopular causes. Besides Saddam, he has worked with blind Egyptian cleric Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman, a planner of the 1993 World Trade Center bombing, and American Indian activist Leonard Peltier, convicted in a 1975 gunfight at the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in which two FBI agents died.

Saddam and the other defendants, who include his vice president, Taha Yassin Ramadan, are being tried for genocide in the deaths of tens of thousands of Iraqi Kurds during the late 1980s. They already have been tried for murder and torture in the deaths of 148 Iraqi Shiites from the Iraqi town of Dujail who allegedly conspired to kill Saddam in 1981.

The court that tried them was to have returned its verdict on Oct. 16, but it announced this week it will not do so. A new date was not set.

Clark said the defendants are at Camp Cropper near Baghdad's airport in a new $60 million detention center. The Army says it oversees about 13,000 prisoners in Iraq at Cropper, Camp Bucca in the southern desert and Fort Suse in the Kurdish north.

The United States has said it transferred Saddam to Iraqi custody some time ago, but his whereabouts have not been divulged.

In March, an AP-Ipsos poll in the United States and several other countries found that two out of three Americans felt Saddam was getting a fair trial and if convicted should be executed. Lesser majorities in eight other countries polled said he was being tried fairly and should be jailed for life if convicted.

Sailor Charged In Iraqi's Slaying To Testify Against 7 Codefendants (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

SAN DIEGO — A Navy corpsman will plead guilty to reduced charges in the April killing of an Iraqi man and provide testimony that can be used against seven Marines charged in the case, his lawyer said Thursday.

Murder and conspiracy counts against Navy Petty Officer 3rd Class Melson Bacos, 21, will be dropped today in exchange for a guilty plea to lesser charges, attorney Jeremiah Sullivan III said.

At the hearing set for Camp Pendleton, Bacos will answer the judge's questions about the April 26 killing in Hamandiya, west of Baghdad. The seven Marines face charges of murder, conspiracy and kidnapping.

Sullivan declined to disclose what Bacos' sentence would be but said he would remain in the Navy and have a "bright future ahead of him." The North County Times, which first published news of the plea bargain Wednesday, said Bacos would be sentenced to a year in the brig. Bacos was not accused of firing his M-16 rifle.

The eight defendants have been behind bars since being ordered back to Camp Pendleton in May. After the plea deal was reached, Bacos was moved to the brig at Miramar Marine Corps Air Station in San Diego, Marine officials said.

Marine Pfc. John Jodka also was moved Wednesday from the brig at Camp Pendleton, but a gag order issued by the judge in his case keeps attorneys from saying whether he, too, has reached a plea bargain.

The eight, all members of the 3rd Battalion, 5th Regiment, 1st Marine Division, are accused of dragging Hashim Ibrahim Awad, 52, from his home, tying his hands and feet, fatally shooting him and then planting an AK-47 rifle and shovel near his body to suggest he was an insurgent caught burying a roadside bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0076461

At an Aug. 30 hearing, a prosecutor said that two defendants, Sgt. Lawrence G. Hutchins III and Cpl. Trent D. Thomas, had confessed to the slaying and that a third, Lance Cpl. Robert Pennington, provided details about a conspiracy to cover up the crime.

Defense attorneys said the comments were statements, not confessions.

As a member of the battalion, Bacos accompanied Marines into combat to provide additional firepower and emergency medical care. He received a Purple Heart for his first deployment in late 2004, when the battalion was a key part of the fight against insurgents in Fallouja. The battalion suffered 19 deaths and more than 50 wounded.

In a video posted on his lawyer's website, Bacos talked of the aftermath of one daylong battle in December 2004. He recalled how he tried to save the lives of Marines, their blood smearing his hands.

"Everyone was tired, but there were Marines to take care of because of the firefight," he said.

NATO Takes Control Of Afghan Security (AP)

By Jim Krane

AP, October 5, 2006

NATO extended its security mission Thursday to all of Afghanistan nearly five years after the West began its war to defeat the Taliban, taking command of 12,000 U.S. troops in the war-battered country's east.

The handover diminishes the Pentagon's role in Afghanistan and gives the Europe-based military alliance its biggest test yet.

The transfer of command "illustrates the enduring commitment of NATO and its international partners to the future of this great country," said British Gen. David Richards. He was promoted to the military's top rank hours before a handover ceremony at the NATO compound in Kabul attended by President Hamid Karzai and U.S. Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry.

The takeover caps an already historic expansion for the military alliance that was created as a Cold War bulwark against the Soviet Union. The mission in Afghanistan is the biggest ground combat operation in NATO history, and gives Richards command of the largest number of U.S. troops fighting under a foreign commander since World War II.

The move comes during a rapid spread of the Taliban insurgency, with close to 100 suicide attacks this year, a nearly fivefold increase over 2005. Almost 200 civilians and soldiers have been killed. According to an Associated Press count based on Afghan, NATO and U.S. figures, more than 3,000 people have died in violence this year, mostly militants.

"NATO has never been tested like this, ever," said Seth Jones, a RAND Corp. expert on Afghanistan. "They've got an extraordinarily difficult task ahead of them."

With NATO handed the lead role, Washington has shed some responsibility for a stability project that appears to be headed in the wrong direction. U.S. voters readying for midterm elections have expressed fatigue with the Bush administration's twin wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Increasing the international role in Afghanistan — which America has been unable to do in Iraq — could disarm critics who say President Bush mishandled the war. But few Muslim countries have joined the international effort, with fewer than 500 troops from Muslim nations.

On Friday, Bush acknowledged setbacks in the training of Afghan police to fight the Taliban resurgence but predicted eventual victory.

Richards pledged a reversal of Afghanistan's deteriorating security, joking that he would appear in front of a firing squad if the country isn't safer when his command ends in February.

"If by next spring these improvements are not evident, then I will be surrendering to whoever wants to put me up against a wall," he told reporters after the ceremony.

But analysts say NATO will be hard-pressed to reverse the deepening insurgency and lawlessness plaguing Afghanistan, since the alliance lacks the troops to maintain a strong presence across volatile regions and halt militant incursions from Pakistan, where Taliban leaders and fighters are believed to hide.

"It's hard to imagine that the situation will improve. We've got to have sufficient security forces to seal the border or at least better patrol it," said Bruce Hoffman, a counterinsurgency expert who teaches at Georgetown University in Washington.

Richards may be better suited to seek help from Pakistan. The British general said his promotion Thursday to four-star general — Britain's top rank — signifies a more intense international commitment to the country and gives him a bigger role dealing with regional governments.

An immediate task will be to persuade members of the 37-nation NATO coalition to deliver thousands of promised troops and weapons that have been withheld, and to ship them into combat in the country's southern and eastern battle zones.

Germany, Spain and Italy have been reluctant to send troops to southern Afghanistan, where soldiers from Canada, Britain, the United States and the Netherlands have borne the brunt of the fighting. NATO also has forces in the more stable northern and western regions of Afghanistan and in Kabul.

"There are NATO countries that appeared to want a peacekeeping mission and now they're in the middle of an insurgency," Jones said. "This isn't the mission they signed up for."

In Canada and the Netherlands, public pressure is building to bring soldiers home. Calls to withdraw could succeed if either country suffers more casualties, Jones said.

With about 12,000 troops, the U.S. is the biggest contributor to the more than 31,000-strong NATO mission. Britain has 5,200 troops and Germany has 2,750 troops here.

Eikenberry will remain the top U.S. commander in Afghanistan, with administrative and legal responsibility for all American forces, including those led by NATO. Eikenberry will continue to lead some 8,000 U.S. troops functioning outside NATO who are tracking al-Qaida terrorists, helping train Afghan security forces and doing reconstruction work.

Eikenberry said that consolidating the command under Richards would streamline military cooperation and effectiveness. Direct U.S. control is now centered on the sprawling American base at Bagram. Most air operations in the Afghan theater also remain under American oversight.

U.S.-operated prisons and interrogation centers at Bagram will remain under American command, while NATO will continue to transfer its detainees to Afghan police.

The alliance's leadership takes command of U.S. troops responsible for 11 mountainous eastern provinces just two months after being handed control of restive southern Afghanistan, where NATO has struggled to stem rising violence.

A 10-day NATO offensive in Kandahar province last month was the largest ground operation the alliance has ever undertaken.

Hundreds of Taliban fighters were killed and more than 100 taken prisoner in NATO's coordinated ground and air assaults. Few NATO soldiers were killed or wounded. Richards said the operation prevented the Taliban from holding valuable ground that might have allowed it to attack Kandahar, Afghanistan's second-largest city.

"The significant defeat of the Taliban is probably the greatest single defeat they suffered since 2001," Richards said. "We have unequivocally proved our mettle in military operations."

An American four-star general, Army Gen. Dan K. McNeil, will take charge of both U.S. and NATO forces in February, pending confirmation by the Senate.

NATO Takes Security Helm (LAT)

By Paul Watson

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan — The North Atlantic Treaty Organization on Thursday took command of U.S. troops fighting insurgents in eastern Afghanistan, putting the Western alliance in charge of security across the country amid an increase in fighting.

British army Lt. Gen. David Richards, NATO's commander in Afghanistan, called the transition historic for both the alliance and Afghanistan and said the transfer of U.S. forces to his command would not mean a reduction in capability.

"By bringing all of these forces under unified command, we enhance the effectiveness of the operation, as we have far greater flexibility in the use of our assets," Richards said at a ceremony attended by Afghan President Hamid Karzai. "Throughout Afghanistan we will continue to confront insurgents when and where necessary.

"But the overarching purpose of our security operations is to enable improvements in government capacity and to accelerate reconstruction and development, for real benefit to the lives of all Afghans."

NATO has about 31,000 troops from 37 countries under its command in Afghanistan. About 10,000 of those are U.S. forces in eastern provinces bordering Pakistan.

Cross-border attacks are on the rise there despite Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf's repeated commitments to rein in militants.

About 8,000 U.S. troops will remain under direct American command to serve as a counter-terrorism force and to support reconstruction projects, as well as to help train and equip the Afghan army and police.

"As a NATO member, the United States will remain the largest contributor of troops and capability," said Army Lt. Gen. Karl Eikenberry, commander of American troops in Afghanistan. "We will maintain our strong national capability in support of our counter-terrorism mission to strike Al Qaeda and its associated movements wherever and whenever they are found."

NATO originally agreed to deploy troops in Afghanistan as peacekeepers in support of aid projects, but the alliance is now waging its first ground war in its 57-year history. And as the violence escalates, NATO commanders are struggling to persuade the 26 member nations to fulfill a request for an additional 2,500 troops.

NATO commanders also have complained that some member governments place restrictions on what their troops can do in Afghanistan, making it more difficult to launch coordinated combat operations.

Richards took command of forces in southern Afghanistan on July 31. Since then, at least 16 foreign soldiers have died in hostile fire, including seven Americans.

U.S. troops have suffered the highest number of combat deaths among foreign forces this year, with at least 50 killed in hostile fire. Canadian forces have had 27 combat deaths, the second-highest number among the foreign contingents.

Together, Americans and Canadians account for almost three-quarters of the foreign forces' deaths from hostile fire this year.

The insurgents' heavy toll on Canadian troops is putting political heat on Canada's Conservative Party government. In a recent poll, 59% of respondents agreed with the statement that Canadian soldiers were "dying for a cause we cannot win." In an earlier poll, more than half of Canadian respondents said they thought their country was more likely to be attacked by terrorists because its forces were in Afghanistan.

NATO's supreme allied commander, U.S. Marine Gen. James L. Jones, said he was confident the alliance could handle any military challenge. But he added that he thought the strife in "Afghanistan will not be resolved by military means."

Defeating the insurgency depends more on "how well the reconstruction mission, the international aid mission, is focused," he was quoted Wednesday as saying at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington. "And on that score I think there is a requirement to do more, to bring more focus, more clarity, more purpose and more results in a shorter period of time."

U.S. and NATO commanders say they have killed hundreds of insurgents in recent weeks. But Afghan police, soldiers and civilians have borne the brunt of the war, which is causing increasing dismay among Afghans almost five years after the Taliban regime was ousted.

More than 800 members of the Afghan security forces have died in those years, compared with 337 foreign members of the U.S.-led coalition, Eikenberry said Thursday.

Once-rare suicide bombings are now relatively common, even in the capital, Kabul. A suicide attacker killed at least 12 people outside the Interior Ministry on Saturday. Two days later, a man threw himself in front of a NATO convoy in the capital while detonating hand grenades strapped to his body, wounding three soldiers and three civilians.

Japan Extends Afghan Coalition Support (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

Japan's Cabinet on Friday approved a one-year extension of the law that allows the country's support of coalition forces in Afghanistan, the government's top spokesman said.

Japan's navy has provided fuel for coalition warships in the Indian Ocean since November 2001 under a special anti-terrorism law set to expire on Nov. 1. It had already been extended in 2003 for two years and again for a year in 2005.

"The international community is continuing its activities to eliminate international terrorism and its efforts are expected to continue ... (It) is important for Japan to continue its cooperation in accordance with our anti-terrorism measure," Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki told reporters.

The government is expected to submit the bill to parliament for planned enactment by the end of October.

Prime Minister Shinzo Abe earlier this week expressed his support for extending the law, which allows Japan to refuel naval ships from the U.S.-led coalition forces in the region as part of the anti-terror effort.

The Indian Ocean dispatch has been part of Tokyo's recent attempts to raise its international profile. Under former Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi, who stepped down last week, Japan also sent non-combat troops to southern Iraq to assist in U.S.-led reconstruction efforts.

Both operations were criticized by some in Japan as violating the nation's pacifist constitution, which prohibits the use of force in solving international disputes.

Abe has pledged to follow an assertive foreign policy and military role. He has voiced support for amending the constitution to join more peacekeeping missions and work more closely with U.S. forces.

Official Pushes Opium Alternative (WT)

By Jason Motlagh

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076464

KABUL, Afghanistan -- Afghanistan must provide an economic alternative to producing opium and win the hearts and minds of the rural poor, the economy minister says.

"That Afghanistan is producing the largest amount of opium in the world is a fact nobody can deny. It is also true that there is no real alternative livelihood for the people who are cultivating poppy at the moment in Afghanistan," Minister of Economy Mohammad Jalil Shams told The Washington Times.

Afghan drug production grew by almost 60 percent compared with last year, according to U.N. figures. Drug production now accounts for more than 50 percent of Afghanistan's gross domestic product.

The booming drug economy supports the Taliban, which is wagingits fiercest campaign since being ousted by U.S.-led coalition forces five years ago for sheltering Osama bin Laden and al Qaeda.

Mr. Shams said in an interview this week that to resolve the drug problem, Afghanistan's economy must be rebuilt.

Establishing electrical power is a top priority, he said.

Once energy and electricity are in place to sustain industries and attract foreign investment, Mr. Shams said, it is a matter of identifying areas where Afghanistan has a competitive advantage and capitalizing on untapped native resources such as copper and iron.

He said the biggest challenge will be the economic integration of farmers in the countryside who depend on poppy cultivation for a livelihood.

Mr. Shams said alternative crops being tested include saffron in Herat province and roses in Jalalabad.

Mr. Shams said that "small steps" were being taken now and dramatic changes are not likely in the near future.

"It takes time, as we can see in other countries such as Pakistan, which has been successful maybe because a part of their [drug] industry has been transferred to Afghanistan," Mr. Shams said.

"They now have alternatives for farmers. It took them at least eight to 10 years. It took Thailand about 20 years to get rid of drug cultivation."

The minister insisted his country was not doomed to become a narco-state, saying it is "only a matter of time before the situation improves."

A recent report by the Senlis Council, a British think tank, said the Taliban has regained control of the southern half of the country largely because of misguided U.S.-led counternarcotics and military policies.

The report charges there has been a "dramatic under-funding of aid and development programs."

Afghan President Hamid Karzai met with President Bush in Washington last week to appeal for greater military and development aid.

"We shall try to win the confidence of the people, but without that, even if we are the strongest possible militarily, it is not possible to establish security," he said.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

H-P's Dunn Could Face Risks From Testimony (WSJ)

By Peter Waldman

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

When former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairman Patricia Dunn testified on Capitol Hill last week on the H-P spying scandal, one congressman asked her about some handwritten notes taken by H-P's former general counsel. The notes indicated Ms. Dunn had been briefed on a ruse by H-P's investigators to obtain people's personal phone records in June 2005. Ms. Dunn's response: "I've seen this for the first time now."

Yesterday, Ms. Dunn was booked in the Santa Clara, Calif., sheriff's office on four felony counts of fraud and conspiracy and released on her own recognizance. A judge scheduled her arraignment for Nov. 17. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer filed charges Wednesday against Ms. Dunn and four others linked to the H-P affair. The charges included fraudulently obtaining private information from a public utility, accessing computer data without permission, identity theft and conspiracy to commit those crimes.

It was Ms. Dunn's testimony in Washington at last week's hearing by a U.S. House subcommittee that has lawyers befuddled. In 33 pages of written testimony and a half-day of questioning by congressmen, Ms. Dunn flouted the golden rules of criminal defense: Never say anything under oath you may regret -- and never say anything at all until you've seen all the evidence.

Now Ms. Dunn, who lawyers said could be the highest-ranking executive ever prosecuted for privacy violations -- and one of the few independent directors of a major company ever prosecuted at all for corporate misdeeds -- must live in a legal box she built before prosecutors had even charged her with a crime. "The textbook approach is to avoid having your client testify under oath in any context, when a criminal investigation is pending," said William Keane, a white-collar defense attorney and partner with Farella Braun & Martel in San Francisco.

Ms. Dunn's lawyer, James Brosnahan of Morrison & Foerster in San Francisco, said "every case is different" and some of his best results, spanning a 45-year career, have gone "against the grain" in tactics. "You make different tactical decisions when a client is innocent than when they are guilty," he said. "Pattie Dunn is innocent."

Ms. Dunn, who associates say was determined to explain herself in public, didn't make any obvious gaffes that could come back to haunt her at trial. But lawyers say her extensive statements under oath -- which the California prosecutors referenced in their court affidavit Wednesday -- likely will limit how the defense team can address the evidence at trial.

Lawyers for other people linked to the H-P scandal played it by the book. Ann Baskins, the former H-P general counsel, pleaded her Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination at the congressional hearing. She was forced to resign from H-P but hasn't been charged with any crimes. "I didn't want her first explanation to be in what I considered to be the middle of a chaotic football game," said Ms. Baskins's attorney, Cris Arguedas of Berkeley, Calif.

Kevin Hunsaker, the former H-P ethics attorney who oversaw the company's leak probe this year, also pleaded the Fifth in Congress but is now facing the same charges as Ms. Dunn. His lawyer, Michael Pancer of San Diego, issued a statement yesterday, asserting Mr. Hunsaker's innocence, in part because he "took no actions related to obtaining information about phone calls that were not known and authorized by his superiors after they had obtained an attorney's opinion that the investigative tactics were legal."

Mr. Pancer, in an interview, said he had his client plead the Fifth last week because it was clear they hadn't seen all the evidence H-P was giving the subcommittee right up until a day before the hearing. "I told Kevin I wouldn't even represent him if he insisted on going forward, because you need to explain every document, and you can't explain what you don't have."

Ms. Dunn, and Mr. Brosnahan, took a different approach. The crux of the prosecutors' case against Ms. Dunn is that, from the start of the boardroom leak probes she first launched in 2005, she allegedly knew H-P's investigators were using pretexting, a form of fraudulent impersonation, to obtain the personal phone records of certain H-P board members and journalists. She maintains she had no idea fraud may have been involved and that she relied on H-P lawyers and security personnel to ensure everything was done legally.

Though expansive and confident in most of her answers on Capitol Hill, Ms. Dunn seemed to trip up when congressmen confronted her with several documents suggesting she had been briefed early on about the pretexting work. The key evidence, cited by California prosecutors in their court affidavit Wednesday, comes from documents about a June 15, 2005, conference call that apparently took place among Ms. Dunn, Ms. Baskins and Ronald DeLia, the Massachusetts investigator who ran H-P's leak probes.

The documents include a seven-page progress report on the probe by Mr. DeLia, dated June 14, 2005, mentioning "pretext calls" in a footnote; an email sent on that same day from Ms. Dunn to Mr. DeLia, setting up the conference call for the next day; and Ms. Baskins's handwritten notes apparently taken during the call itself.

If there is any smoking gun in this case, it may be the Baskins notes. Written under the title "Kona" -- H-P's code name for the investigation -- Ms. Baskins's notes, dated June 15, 2005, record how investigators, in a "time-consuming process," obtain phone records from call carriers "via pretexts to extract info." On the next line, she wrote, "i.e. I didn't make the call."

Further down on the same page, Ms. Baskins scrawled what appear to be a series of brief questions posed by "PCD" -- or Patricia Cecile Dunn -- suggesting she participated actively in the call: "How to speed up? Ramp up? New tactics?" Ms. Baskins wrote under Ms. Dunn's initials.

Confronted with the Baskins notes, Ms. Dunn testified she had never seen them before, and she claimed not to have any recollection of the conference call. She also testified she couldn't remember Mr. DeLia -- who took the Fifth at the hearing and is also being prosecuted in the case -- briefing her on pretexting, while other documents suggest that he did.

"I do not recall the June 15th discussion," she testified, though she added about the documents, "If I connect these dots, it took place."

A Lifelong Fighter's Toughest Round (WP)

By Yuki Noguchi

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

At age 12, she lost her father. She later dropped out of college to support her mother. Dunn nevertheless rose to the rarefied upper ranks of the mostly male finance industry. She ousted the former HP chairman and chief executive -- another tough woman -- and assumed the chairman's seat. Dunn fought bitterly with others on HP's board, and despite her avowed preference for privacy, has gained notoriety for backing a rigorous hunt that included accessing private phone records to smoke out the source of news media leaks from the board.

This week, the 53-year-old former HP chairman faced another major blow: She found out she has a recurrence of advanced ovarian cancer the day before the California attorney general charged her and four others with fraud and conspiracy in the corporate leak probe.

Circumstances required Dunn to be self-reliant from an early age, her friends and business associates said, and her diligence and willingness to learn delivered her from poverty to the top echelons of business. That same tenacity and conviction may have provoked the ire of her enemies on the HP board, who say her strong sense of mission -- plug the leak -- led her down an unethical path.

Now she must rely on that same tough quality to survive her two-front battle. She surrendered to authorities yesterday and, after a three-minute court hearing in which she agreed to return Nov. 17 for her arraignment, was released on her own recognizance. Today she will begin chemotherapy for her fourth bout with cancer. She has survived not just ovarian cancer, but also melanoma and breast cancer.

"She's strong," said Alison Davis, who for three years served as chief financial officer when Dunn was chief executive of Barclays Global Investors. "People can be threatened by a strong woman who represents a challenge to their will," she said. "She will stand up to defend herself."

Dunn's personality earned her her number one critic, venture capitalist Thomas J. Perkins, who pinned the blame for the investigative tactics on her, calling it "a Pattie Dunn program, 100 percent."

Sources close to Perkins and his friend and fellow HP board member George A. Keyworth II say the deep rifts between Dunn and Perkins provoked a witch hunt focused on trying to get Perkins and Keyworth off the board.

Dunn, in turn, shot back. "I won't indulge in a chronology of the intimidation, pressure, rudeness and criticism that Tom directed at me, but I will simply say that I have never had remotely similar experiences with anyone," she wrote in an Aug. 17 letter to members of the HP board. The personality differences were "compounded by a fundamental difference in philosophy between me and Tom" about corporate governance, she wrote.

Members of Congress last week hammered Dunn for not accepting responsibility for an overzealous leak investigation, and for failing to heed red flags that the investigation was moving into unethical and potentially illegal territory. Among other things, documents showed that Dunn had authorized a surveillance and sting operation designed to trace the e-mail, phone and in-person communications between reporters and board members.

On Tuesday, the day before her indictment, Dunn was told her Stage 4 ovarian cancer had come back. Still, she's maintaining a tough front. An e-mail she sent to several friends yesterday morning said she found out she'd been indicted while shopping for a suit at Nordstrom's.

Dunn called her new diagnosis a nasty surprise and said that the state attorney general now considered her "a public threat," said John C. "Sandy" Walker, a close friend who has worked as the architect for her two houses. But, she joked, she was engaging in "retail therapy," and talked about her upcoming interview on the CBS News program "60 Minutes."

"She's been through some extraordinary treatments" for her various cancers, Walker said, "but every time she says, 'But I'm fine.' "

Dunn's older sister, Debbie Lammers, said that toughness was forged in her early years.

"What we've been through since we were small children has put her in good stead to deal with these current circumstances," said Lammers, who talks to Dunn every day. "She is determined, she is focused, she is steady."

Their father, Henry Dunn, a Las Vegas entertainer, was a gregarious and upbeat businessman who preached the stiff upper lip, Lammers said. He was 25 years older than their showgirl mother, Ruth, and he died when Patricia Dunn was 12. That left the girls and their infant brother with their bereaved mother, who was isolated from other family support.

Dunn nevertheless always appeared pretty and poised, and was elected to the student council her senior year, a role she took so seriously she read the handbook of rules after she was elected, said Barbara Rosenberg, her honors English teacher at Terra Linda High School in San Rafael, Calif. Dunn absorbed books so quickly that Rosenberg got special permission to expand her reading assignments to college-level literature, and Dunn often talked about her desire to pursue journalism, she said.

Dunn's academic career was interrupted because her mother was overwhelmed by financial and emotional problems, forcing Dunn to drop out of the University of Oregon. She finished her degree by commuting on three buses to the University of California at Berkeley, according to a life history Dunn provided to the Congress during her testimony last week.

Dunn has been married for 25 years to William W. Jahnke, whom she calls "the best husband in the world," and helped raise his four children from a previous marriage.

Although Dunn's rise to the top job at Barclays made her one of a small group of female business executives, she has never championed herself as a role model for women. Her sister said Dunn never thought of herself as fitting the typical profile of a hard-nosed businesswoman.

"You may find this hard to believe, but I have never been ambitious for career success," Dunn told an audience gathered last month to honor her induction into the Bay Area Business Hall of Fame. In fact, she fell into the financial services industry almost by mistake; a temporary secretarial job at Wells Fargo Investment Advisors turned into a permanent one, and she abandoned her dream of becoming a journalist.

HP's former chairman and chief executive Carly Fiorina disputes Dunn's portrayal of herself in a memoir, "Tough Choices," to be published Monday. Dunn called for board meetings behind Fiorina's back and presided over the key meeting during which the board fired her, Fiorina wrote. When Dunn suggested Fiorina and the company "position" her firing as a personal decision to move on, Fiorina said she believed "truth is always the best answer," Fiorina wrote.

Dunn's breast cancer was first diagnosed in September 2001, and her medical treatments forced her resignation from the top job at Barclays the next year. She has since had three lumpectomies and radiation therapy for breast cancer. She also has undergone surgeries to remove separate cancers, including a malignant melanoma on her face, and for the ovarian cancer earlier this year.

"When we were kids, we didn't think we had all these problems, because it wasn't in us to complain," Lammers said. "At the time we didn't think it was so tough, but looking back on it, it really was." It is that training that has produced the fighter in her sister. "What we're seeing now," she said, "is the best of Pattie."

Ex-Hewlett-Packard Chair Dunn Released After Hearing (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Joel Rosenblatt And Karen Gullo

Bloomberg, October 6, 2006

Oct. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Former Hewlett-Packard Co. Chairwoman Patricia Dunn, charged with conspiracy and fraud for directing an internal leak probe at the computer maker, was released after surrendering to authorities today in San Jose, California.

Dunn, 53, promised to return for her Nov. 17 arraignment. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer yesterday charged her and four others with using illegal tactics to monitor the phone calls of board members and journalists.

``The attorney general has indicated they have no objection to you being released on your own recognizance," Santa Clara County Superior Court Judge Alfonso Fernandez told Dunn during a 20-minute hearing. The judge said he would release her if she promised to appear at the arraignment. ``Do you understand?" the judge asked. ``Yes," Dunn replied.

The former chairwoman authorized the internal probe at Hewlett-Packard, which used fake identities, or pretexting, to obtain private call records. The felony charges filed by Lockyer -- conspiracy, wire fraud, identity theft and illegal use of computer data -- each carry a maximum sentence of 3 years in prison and a $10,000 or $25,000 fine.

The prosecution came on the same day that Dunn, who stepped down from the world's second-largest personal computer maker last month, announced she had advanced ovarian cancer and was to undergo chemotherapy this week. Her lawyer said yesterday that she would fight the charges ``with everything she has."

Investigation

Last week, Dunn faced a congressional committee that put the computer maker at the center of a national debate over privacy abuses. The former executive has said she relied on investigators and isn't responsible for their conduct. Palo Alto-based Hewlett- Packard is also being investigated by the Justice Department and the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission.

The ex-chairwoman, Jehnke and her spokesman Terry Fahn got into a black Lincoln Continental with tinted windows and drove a few blocks to the Santa Clara County Sheriff's office, where the car entered a back gate. Dunn was booked, fingerprinted and photographed, a sheriff's deputy said. Fahn declined to comment.

Deputy Sheriff Serg Palanov said Dunn was ``calm and collected" during her booking, and that she was allowed to use the non-public entrance because she was a high-profile defendant.

Internal Probe

Hewlett-Packard's internal investigation, started last year to learn who leaked boardroom discussions to reporters, became a scandal in the weeks following the company's Sept. 6 disclosure that some of the tactics used may have been illegal. Company Director George Keyworth resigned last month after admitting he was the source of some of the leaks.

At least six investigators in Massachusetts, Florida, Colorado and Georgia hired by Hewlett-Packard faked the identities of directors, employees and reporters to obtain their phone records.

The company also sought the call logs of former Chief Executive Officer Carly Fiorina and Hewlett-Packard's outside attorney, Larry Sonsini, name partner of Palo Alto-based Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosati.

As part of the conspiracy charge, prosecutors claimed Dunn gave private investigators home, cellular and office telephone numbers for board members.

Hundreds of Calls

Hundreds of telephone calls were gathered using pretexting for two current Hewlett-Packard employees, seven former or current board members or their families and nine journalists or their family members, Michael Holston, a lawyer hired by Hewlett-Packard CEO Mark Hurd to review the company's conduct, said Sept. 22. Hurd, 49, wasn't charged. Lockyer said his investigation is continuing.

According to court papers filed yesterday, pretexting compromised over 24 different individuals' telephone, fax and cellular accounts. During 33 months of call monitoring, there were approximately 1,750 calls made from all of the numbers.

Hewlett-Packard said in a statement yesterday that it's cooperating with state and federal investigators.

Kevin Hunsaker, 41, of Menlo Park, California, a lawyer and former ethics director at Hewlett-Packard who was also charged yesterday, has already surrendered and been booked, Lockyer spokesman Tom Dresslar said. He is scheduled to be arraigned Dec. 6 and is free on his own recognizance.

``It will be clear, when all the facts are aired in this case, Mr. Hunsaker is not guilty of any of the charges," said Michael Pancer, his lawyer, in a statement. ``Neither Kevin Hunsaker nor HP ever authorized, encouraged or knew of any unlawful activity."

Two other defendants, investigator Ron DeLia, 56, of East Sandwich, Massachusetts, who heads Boston-based Security Outsourcing Solutions Inc., and Bryan Wagner, 29, a Littleton, Colorado investigator, have also agreed to surrender. They are expected to travel to California to turn themselves in within a week, Dresslar said.

Lockyer has asked for $50,000 bail for both Delia and Wagner. DeLia's lawyer, John Kiernan, and Wagner didn't return calls seeking comment.

The fifth defendant, Matthew Depante, 27, a West Melbourne, Florida investigator, was also charged yesterday. Dresslar said prosecutors haven't been contacted by his attorney, Richard Preira, who didn't return a call seeking comment.

Hewlett-Packard shares fell 33 cents to $37.51 at 6:19 p.m. after the close of regular trading on the New York Stock Exchange. The shares have remained unaffected by the scandal after analysts and investors said customers will likely continue to buy the company's PCs.

The case is People v. Dunn, Santa Clara County Superior Court in San Jose, 06-1027481.

Former H-P, Apple General Counsels Hire The Go-To Lawyer For Lawyers (WSJ)

By Nathan Koppel

Cristina Arguedas says she loathes the spotlight. If so, she has chosen the wrong line of work.

In recent weeks, the Berkeley, Calif. criminal-defense lawyer has landed in the middle of two tempests, as the go-to lawyer for lawyers. Ann Baskins, Hewlett-Packard Co.'s former general counsel, hired Ms. Arguedas to defend her in a criminal probe into H-P's leak investigation. Ms. Arguedas is also representing Nancy Heinen, the former general counsel of Apple Computer Inc., who left the company not long before it announced "irregularities" in options grants from 1997 to 2001.

Last week, she appeared with Ms. Baskins before a congressional committee looking into H-P's investigation of board leaks. Ms. Baskins, who resigned from H-P the day before her appearance, refused to testify to the committee, citing her constitutional right against self incrimination. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer filed criminal charges Wednesday against former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn and others allegedly involved in the matter, but Ms. Baskins wasn't charged.

"There is no basis to charge her," Ms. Arguedas said in an interview Thursday. "There is no evidence to suggest she committed a crime. This was not me as a mad genius … . There is no evidence for which you could reasonably make accusations."

Representing corporate counsel may seem like a strange assignment for Ms. Arguedas. While building a reputation as one of the top criminal defense attorneys in the country, she has maintained the liberal leanings that drove her law career from the start, right down to her small firm's Berkeley address, outside the Northern California power centers of San Francisco and Palo Alto.

"I'm your basic liberal Democrat. I'm usually on the side of people who write regulations," Ms. Arguedas says. But, she says, "There is now an over-criminalization of regulated businesses." Despite her experience with white-collar defense, Ms. Arguedas stresses that she represents only business people, not corporations. "I don't want to represent corporations -- the attorney-client relationship is too diffused." In the H-P and Apple matters, she says, "My job is to protect Ann Baskins and Nancy Heinen. It is a one-on-one personal relationship."

Ms. Arguedas is one of several lawyers who have been tapped in the last several weeks to represent people involved in the H-P matter, in which improper means were used to obtain board members' phone records. Other attorneys include Viet Dinh, a Georgetown University law professor who is representing former board member Tom Perkins; James Brosnahan of Morrison & Foerster LLP, counsel to chairman Patricia Dunn; and Reginald Brown of Washington firm Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr LLP, who is advising board member George Keyworth.

The 52-year-old head of Arguedas, Cassman & Headley LLP, a seven-lawyer criminal-defense firm, belongs to an elite strata of seemingly ubiquitous lawyers. She represented Timothy Belden, the former head of Enron Corp.'s energy trading desk in Portland, Ore., who cooperated with the government in its prosecution of Jeffrey Skilling and Kenneth Lay. Mr. Belden pled guilty to one count of fraud, but hasn't yet been sentenced. She is one of the lawyers defending David Bershad, who was indicted in May on fraud charges along with his law firm Milberg, Weiss, Bershad & Schulman LLP. And she is one of the counsels to Greg Ritchie, a former KPMG LLP partner charged with having allegedly assisted in marketing fraudulent tax shelters.

Her practice hasn't always been so corporate in nature. While still in law school at Rutgers University, Ms. Arguedas volunteered to work on cases for battered women charged with crimes against their attackers. After graduating, the New Jersey native joined the San Francisco Federal Public Defender's Office, which has trained some of the area's top defense lawyers, such as John Keker, former counsel to Frank Quattrone when the then-investment banker was charged with criminal obstruction. (The government conditionally dropped all charges against Mr. Quattrone.) Traditionally, the public-defender's office has been "a breeding ground for left-oriented lawyers," says Nanci Clarence, who worked as a public defender with Ms. Arguedas. "Cris is very progressive."

Ms. Arguedas continues to represent indigent clients on a pro bono basis. The attorney has a yoga center at her house and takes yearly retreats to the Tassajara Zen Mountain Center in San Francisco.

As her career has taken off, Ms. Arguedas has increasingly focused her energies on a well-heeled clientele. In 1989, in her first white-collar case, she helped defend W. Franklyn Chinn against charges he received illegal bribes as a board member of Wedtech Corp., a defunct defense contractor. Ms. Arguedas counts the case as one of the low points in her career. "We won on half the counts [at trial] but lost on half the counts," she says. On appeal, though, she says, she scored a full victory for Mr. Chinn. "Like any defense lawyer, I've had plenty of losses," she says.

The attorney has developed a thriving subspecialty in the sports arena. In 1995, Johnnie Cochran and Barry Sheck, counsel to football star O.J. Simpson, asked Ms. Arguedas to join the Simpson defense team to prepare the accused murderer for what he might expect on cross examination at trial. Mr. Simpson didn't take the stand in his defense. Ms. Arguedas is known as an expert cross-examiner, who listens intently and can quickly pick up stray details that might impeach a witness's credibility.

Later, Ms. Arguedas was hired to conduct a mock cross-examination of Kobe Bryant, the basketball player accused in 1993 of rape. The case against Mr. Bryant was later dismissed. Ms. Arguedas has successfully defended former Oakland Raiders coach John Gruden on drunken-driven charges, and she helped sprinter Tim Montgomery avoid criminal charges for his alleged use of steroids.

The ironic thing "is that it is hard to go through life knowing as little about sports as Cris does," says Los Angeles attorney Steven Madison, head of the white-collar practice at Quinn Emmanuel Urquhart Oliver & Hedges LLP. "Cris is also one of the truly outstanding white-collar lawyers in the United States."

It's an arena that remains largely male. Ms. Arguedas describes a Los Angeles court hearing she attended last month on behalf of Mr. Bershad in the Milberg Weiss case. The prosecutors and the other defense lawyers were all men, as was the judge, who addressed the attorneys, collectively, as "gentlemen," says Ms. Arguedas. She stood up to gently prod the judge away from the word, she says, when he noticed his error and corrected himself. (Two calls to the judge's chambers weren't returned.)

"I felt like I had gone back in time 20 years," she says. "It's still largely male-only in elite white-collar cases."

Fiorina Memoir Details H-P Board Conflicts Preceding Her Ouster (WSJ)

By Don Clark

Carly Fiorina's new memoir traces her ouster at Hewlett-Packard Co. to veteran technologists on its board, including two of the same names associated with the recent fall of former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn following the company's leak-investigation scandal.

The book, "Tough Choices," which breaks Ms. Fiorina's long silence since her firing as H-P's chief executive in February 2005, describes her concerns about leaks from within the company during her tenure, starting with H-P's purchase of Compaq Computer Corp., completed in 2002. Ms. Fiorina played no direct role in the most recent leak investigations at H-P in 2005 and 2006, in which private phone records of directors, reporters and employees were obtained, and doesn't mention the incidents in her book.

Ms. Fiorina, who joined H-P in 1999, describes conflicts with Tom Perkins, George "Jay" Keyworth and Dick Hackborn, board members with longtime ties to H-P who loved to talk about technology. When they strayed into other areas, they were disruptive, she writes, "and they didn't know what they didn't know."

Just how disruptive things would get would become apparent in early 2005, Ms. Fiorina says in her book, which is scheduled to arrive in most bookstores next week. After a stumble in financial results for its 2004 fiscal third quarter, the former CEO contends that H-P was poised for an upturn.

But two days before a January 2005 meeting of the H-P board, Mr. Keyworth, Mr. Hackborn and Ms. Dunn -- then a director only -- expressed concern about the company's stock price and gave Ms. Fiorina a precise prescription for how to reorganize the company. "From my perspective, their suggestions came out of left field and were half-baked," she says.

Heated discussions followed. She opposed the suggestion that Mr. Perkins, a well-known Silicon Valley venture capitalist who had left in 2004 after reaching a mandatory retirement age for directors, should return on the board. He attended the January meeting as an observer but started making waves, voicing "very strong opinions about everything from personnel to acquisitions," she writes.

Days after the meeting, Ms. Fiorina writes, she was outraged when she learned The Wall Street Journal was preparing an article that would focus on a possible reorganization. "It is hard to convey how violated I felt," she writes, deducing that the article came from leaks from the board.

She convened a Saturday morning meeting with directors via a conference call, but no one admitted to talking to the press. The board requested that Larry Sonsini, H-P's longtime outside attorney, interview board members -- not just about the leak, but to provide their assessment of the board. She says she didn't intend to ask leakers to resign.

"I thought this would be a useful wake-up call to several board members who were not as smart as they thought they were," Ms. Fiorina writes. "It turns out I wasn't as smart as I needed to be. Somehow, at some point, during the next two weeks, certain board members would decide to fire me."

The firing came in Chicago the next month, Ms. Fiorina writes. Surprisingly, Ms. Dunn -- not then the head of any committee -- led the fateful board meeting.

After providing directors a statement about her performance, Ms. Fiorina was asked to leave; when she returned three hours later, only Ms. Dunn and another director remained in the conference room to tell her she was fired. "I expected the board to look me in the eye and tell me why," she writes.

They didn't have the courage, Ms. Fiorina writes, saying she declined Ms. Dunn's suggestion the departure be characterized as Ms. Fiorina's own decision.

Ms. Dunn couldn't be reached for comment, nor could Mr. Hackborn. A spokesman for Mr. Perkins declined to comment, as did Mr. Keyworth's attorney. Ms. Fiorina, who received a $21 million severance package, was succeeded as CEO by Mark Hurd in March 2005. Ms. Dunn, who became chairman, recently resigned after disclosures about her role in leak investigations that used a controversial tactic, called pretexting, to obtain private phone records. Mr. Perkins complained about the tactics to state and federal authorities.

MySpace.com Founder Seeks Probe Of Sale To News Corp. (Update5) (BLOOM)

By Cecile Daurat

Bloomberg, October 6, 2006

Oct. 5 (Bloomberg) -- MySpace.com founder Brad Greenspan demanded a federal probe into the sale of the networking Web site to News Corp., the media company led by Rupert Murdoch, claiming the deal defrauded shareholders of more than $20 billion.

In a report at Freemyspace.com, Greenspan alleges the sale defrauded shareholders of MySpace.com parent Intermix Media Inc. He is seeking an investigation by the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and U.S. Senate.

Greenspan sued MySpace.com in February, saying the $580 million paid by New York-based News Corp.'s Fox unit last year didn't reflect the growth prospects. Registered users at the social networking Web site have more than doubled this year. Greenspan said in his report MySpace would be worth billions of dollars had it stayed independent and sold shares to the public.

``If MySpace had stayed independent it wouldn't be worth as much as now," said Laura Martin, an analyst at Pasadena, California-based Soleil Securities, who rates News Corp. shares ``hold" and doesn't own them. ``Fox created the value."

News Corp. offered $12 a share for Intermix Media in July 2005. Greenspan, who owned 10 percent of Intermix, offered $13.50 a share three months later in an attempt to block the purchase. His offer was turned down by Intermix's board, which said it was unclear Greenspan could raise the money. News Corp., which paid cash, completed the acquisition later that month.

Greenspan today reported on what he calls ``deliberate steps" taken by MySpace's management to ``withhold and manipulate information." He also calls for an unwinding of the purchase.

In July 2005, Intermix Chief Executive Officer Richard Rosenblatt and Ross Levinsohn, the head of Fox's Internet unit, ``knew MySpace was well on its way to being worth $20 billion at the time they struck the deal to sell," Greenspan said his report. He quoted e-mails between the two executives dated July 13, 2005, and July 18, 2005, on the day of the sale agreement, to back up his allegation.

``It doesn't strike me as credible," said Joe Bonner, an analyst at Argus Research in New York, who has a ``buy" rating on News Corp. shares.

Class A shares of News Corp. rose 17 cents to $19.74 at 4:01 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading. They have gained 27 percent this year.

``This is simply a case of sour grapes making for loud complaints," MySpace spokeswoman Julie Henderson said in an e-mailed statement. ``We've strategically built this business since the acquisition and are just now beginning to realize real financial value."

Fast Growing

News Corp. snatched MySpace over a weekend after Viacom Inc. offered $500 million for the business, a sign that Intermix managers didn't make a fire sale to News Corp., as Greenspan alleged, Bonner said.

Missing the purchase was one reason behind the ouster of Viacom CEO Tom Freston, Chairman Sumner Redstone said yesterday in an interview with Charlie Rose.

MySpace.com and other sites run by News Corp.'s Fox Interactive division ranked as the sixth most-popular in the U.S. in August and were the fastest-growing among the top 15 tracked by ComScore Networks Inc., a market researcher.

Murdoch in the past year spent more than $1.2 billion on Internet companies including MySpace.com to take a bigger share of the online advertising market.

In August, News Corp. signed a deal making Google Inc., the world's most-used search engine, the exclusive provider of search and keyword advertising software for Fox Interactive sites including MySpace. The deal will generate at least $900 million in sales over three years.

Ex-MySpace Chief Calls For Probe Of News Corp.'s Purchase (LAT)

By Dawn C. Chmielewski

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

For a guy who walked away from MySpace with $47 million, Brad Greenspan might not seem to have much to be angry about.

But the founder of the Los Angeles company that created the popular social networking site on Thursday railed against his former company and demanded a federal investigation of News Corp.'s 2005 acquisition of MySpace, calling it "one of the largest merger and acquisition scandals in U.S. history."

Greenspan, who was ousted from Intermix Media in 2003, alleged that News Corp. "bilked" shareholders out of tens of billions of dollars and said the Securities and Exchange Commission, the U.S. Justice Department and U.S. Senate should investigate the $580 million deal.

The 33-year-old entrepreneur leveled allegations of insider trading and options manipulation on the Web site FreeMySpace.com, in which he quotes e-mail exchanges that purport to show how Intermix engineered a quick sale to News Corp.

"It wasn't about what's the best deal," Greenspan said. "It was about getting the deal done at any cost and jamming it home. That's just not a fair way to play."

Greenspan's complaints amplify the claims he made in a February lawsuit filed against Intermix and VantagePoint Venture Partners in Los Angeles Superior Court. The complaint claims that News Corp. acquired Intermix as the result of an unfair process and at an unfair price that did not reflect its growth and prospects.

MySpace is the most popular social networking site, populated by more than 50 million people who create personal Web pages. But Rupert Murdoch's News Corp. raised eyebrows with what many critics said was an overly generous offer.

The deal came loaded with baggage -- including concerns about sexual predators stalking children on the social networking site and Los Angeles-based Intermix's practice of installing spyware on home computers.

"It's unfortunate that Mr. Greenspan continues to issue press releases complaining about a deal that many industry experts initially believed was a risk for News Corp. to take," said Julie Henderson, a spokeswoman for Fox Interactive Media. "We've strategically built this business since the acquisition and are just now beginning to realize real financial value. This is simply a case of sour grapes making for loud complaints."

News Corp. has worked for a year to profit on MySpace's traffic without alienating its youthful audience. A deal worth at least $900 million makes Google Inc. the exclusive provider of search and keyword advertising for Fox Interactive sites, including MySpace.

A report from RBC Capital analyst Jordan Rohan predicted that the social networking site could be worth $15 billion to $20 billion within a few years, based on its unprecedented usage growth, international appeal, scale and management team.

Greenspan claims that Intermix's executives failed to tell shareholders how MySpace's ad impressions and revenues were climbing, growing 35 percent month over month. Nor did it seek a fresh valuation to reflect this double-digit growth, he said.

Greenspan said the only ones with knowledge of MySpace's breakneck growth were the News Corp. executives with whom Intermix's chief executive, Richard Rosenblatt, communicated via e-mail, including one message sent just before midnight on July 13, in which he wrote, "I am looking forward to supporting the 20 (billion) dream!"

The company was founded by Greenspan in 1999 under the name EUniverse Inc. It began selling music CDs online but quickly shifted strategies and began running entertainment and game sites, the most popular of which is Grab.com.

Greenspan, then chairman, was ousted during a bruising proxy battle after the company was forced to restate two years of earnings results and Nasdaq suspended trading of its stock. He retained an approximately 10 percent share in the company.

New York state attorney general Eliot Spitzer began investigating Intermix in the fall of 2004 for distributing spyware to unsuspecting users. In June of 2005, the company agreed to pay $7.5 million over three years to settle a lawsuit brought by Spitzer. Greenspan paid $750,000 for his portion of the settlement.

Judge: Jailed Fastow Can Get Out For Deposition (HC)

By Kristen Hays

Houston Chronicle, October 6, 2006

However, U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon ruled that Fastow, 44, who has been federal inmate No. 14343-179 for more than a week, must be in custody of the U.S. Marshals Service when outside the walls of the federal prison in Houston.

``We're pleased that the judge issued her ruling today," University of California spokesman Trey Davis said. The university is the lead plaintiff in a conglomerate of lawsuits slated to go to trial in April next year.

`` We expect that the deposition, which should take place soon, we hope, will provide further information and understanding about the role of the banks as active and knowing participants in the Enron fraud."

The university has racked up $7.3 billion in settlements with various banks, including titans Citigroup and J.P. Morgan Chase & Co. But others, including Merrill Lynch & Co. and Credit Suisse First Boston remain as defendants.

On Sept. 26 U.S. District Judge Kenneth Hoyt sentenced Fastow to six years in prison for his role in cooking Enron's books while enriching himself with millions of dollars on the side. Fastow had originally agreed to serve 10 years when he pleaded guilty in January 2004 to two counts of conspiracy, but Hoyt deemed him deserving of mercy.

Hoyt also ordered Fastow to go immediately to prison, denying requests from plaintiffs' attorneys, Fastow's attorneys and prosecutors to let the ex-CFO remain free until late October so he could give the deposition. About 80 lawyers are expected to participate.

Earlier this week, Hoyt denied a request that Fastow be released in custody of his lawyers to do the deposition, and left the final decision to Harmon, who presides over the civil litigation.

She ruled he can be released in custody of U.S. marshals from 8 a.m. to 6 p.m. Oct. 9 through the end of the month to conduct deposition sessions at a downtown Houston office building where the litigants have long had a deposition center.

Hoyt did recommend that the U.S. Bureau of Prisons assign Fastow to serve his term at a federal prison in Bastrop.

Judge Wants To See Former News Mogul's Secret Agreement (FINDLAW/AP)

By Mike Robinson, Ap Legal Affairs Writer

AP, October 6, 2006

(AP) - CHICAGO-A federal judge told attorneys for former newspaper baron Conrad M. Black on Thursday to try to get her a copy of a secret financial agreement he made with the Canadian holding company he once ran.

U.S. District Judge Amy J. St. Eve said she wants to review the agreement worked out between Black's attorneys and those of Toronto-based Hollinger Inc. that limits his access to millions of dollars in assets.

The secret agreement has become a battleground in skirmishing between the beleaguered former press lord and prosecutors who say he is trying to maneuver his way out of a promise to secure his $20 million (â,¬15.72 million) bond.

The bond is secured partly with a $35 million (â,¬27.51 million) Palm Beach, Florida, house that has a $10 million (â,¬7.86 million) mortgage. Black initially had said he would secure the bond by paying off the mortgage but has not and is in default.

If the mortgage company were to foreclose and take possession of the house, the value of the assets securing the bond would be sharply reduced.

Black is charged with plundering millions of dollars belonging to shareholders of Hollinger International Inc., which he controlled through the Hollinger Inc. holding company. He also is charged with misusing company money to bankroll his lavish lifestyle and cheating on his taxes.

Prosecutors told St. Eve on Thursday that Black appears to be claiming he cannot pay the mortgage because the secret agreement has frozen the funds.

While terms of the secret agreement are not known, attorneys said in court Thursday that it would keep the money in Canada and not allow it to be moved south of the border where it could be used to pay the mortgage.

Black attorney Edward M. Genson said the mortgage company has said it would not foreclose if the mortgage interest alone is paid every month.

Genson said that on Thursday a payment of $1,285,961 (â,¬1,010,896) representing the back interest on the mortgage, had been paid. He said the interest would be paid every month from now on, meaning the bond was effectively secured.

That irked lead prosecutor Eric H. Sussman who said Black had "rewritten at his discretion the mortgage agreement."

"He has contracted his way around having to meet is obligations to the government in court," Sussman told St. Eve.

Genson said he didn't know if he could obtain a copy of the secret agreement but would ask Black's Canadian lawyers if it would be possible.

St. Eve said if she could obtain a copy of the agreement she would not show it to the prosecution.

As for the contents of the agreement, Genson said: "I don't know what it says - and I don't want to know what it says."

Pequot Says S.E.C. Won't Take Action (NYT)

By Gretchen Morgenson And Walt Bogdanich

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

The staff of the Securities and Exchange Commission has notified Pequot Capital Management, a prominent hedge fund run by Arthur J. Samberg, that it will not recommend an enforcement action against the firm or its employees relating to an insider trading investigation, according to a letter sent yesterday by the fund to its clients.

Saying that Pequot was "gratified by the staff's determination," the letter noted that the S.E.C. had not yet closed the investigation. The commission, as is its custom, declined to comment on Pequot's disclosure. The fund has maintained that its trading was proper at all times.

The $7 billion hedge fund and its founder, Mr. Samberg, came under regulatory scrutiny in late 2004, when Gary J. Aguirre, a staff lawyer at the S.E.C., began investigating a number of profitable trades made by Pequot in advance of mergers or other market-moving news. The Pequot trades were flagged by stock exchange surveillance teams and forwarded to the commission.

One focus of the investigation was the hedge fund's July 2001 purchases of shares in Heller Financial, a commercial lender that was acquired by GE Capital for $5.25 billion at the end of that month. While speculation of a possible deal had percolated earlier that year, Heller's stock soared 50 percent the day the merger was announced, producing significant profits for the fund.

Mr. Aguirre has said his investigation into Pequot's trading led to his firing in September 2005, roughly a year after he had been hired.

Last summer, Mr. Aguirre testified to Congress that his investigation into the fund was supported by senior S.E.C. officials until he sought the testimony of John J. Mack, now the chief executive of Morgan Stanley and a friend of Mr. Samberg's.

Mr. Aguirre was fired, he has said, after he lost the argument with his superiors over whether he could interview Mr. Mack, who was chief executive of Credit Suisse First Boston at the time of the Heller takeover. Credit Suisse was one of the advisers in the Heller deal.

The S.E.C. reversed its position and took Mr. Mack's deposition in the case in July. Details of his testimony have not been disclosed.

Jeanmarie McFadden, a spokeswoman for Morgan Stanley, confirmed that the S.E.C. had also advised Mr. Mack that he would not face enforcement action in connection with the Pequot matter. Beyond that, she declined to comment.

"It's exactly what I expected," Mr. Aguirre said yesterday. "The S.E.C. has been pretending to conduct an investigation over the last few months and now they've stopped pretending."

Officials at the Senate Finance Committee continue to investigate the circumstances surrounding Mr. Aguirre's firing in September 2005, shortly after he had received praise for his work on the Pequot matter and a two-step merit pay increase.

The S.E.C.'s decision not to file enforcement actions in the case was first reported yesterday by CNBC.

S.E.C. officials were working against the clock in investigating Pequot, based in Westport, Conn., over its 2001 trades. The period of time that prosecutors have to bring a criminal insider trading case is five years from the date of the transaction in question. Last summer that statute in the Heller case expired.

While the S.E.C. can still bring a civil case seeking disgorgement of illicit profits five years after the transaction, in the past judges have frowned on cases brought that long after the questionable transactions were made.

Hedge Fund Escapes Charges (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

Securities and Exchange Commission staff will recommend that the agency not pursue insider trading charges against $7 billion hedge fund Pequot Capital Management Inc., its management team, and former chairman John J. Mack, according to a letter sent to the fund's investors yesterday and three sources familiar with the investigation.

Regulators had been investigating whether Mack, who now serves as chief executive of investment bank Morgan Stanley, improperly tipped Pequot officials five years ago to a looming merger between General Electric Capital Corp. and Heller Financial Inc.

The investigation became public this summer after former SEC enforcement lawyer Gary J. Aguirre told a congressional committee that he was dismissed last year for pressing to interview Mack under oath. A different agency lawyer ultimately deposed Mack a few weeks after the hearing.

Arthur J. Samberg, founder and chairman of Pequot, said in his letter addressed "to clients and friends" that regulators had not formally closed the two-year-old investigation but that all signs pointed to its quick end. Jonathan Gasthalter, a spokesman for the fund, declined to comment further, as did SEC spokesman John Nester.

The investigation of Pequot, whose headquarters are in Westport, Conn., was one of several the agency is conducting into the trading practices of hedge funds, lightly regulated investment pools designed for wealthy and sophisticated investors. Earlier this year, a federal appeals court invalidated a rule that would have required hedge funds to open their books for inspection and to provide basic information to the SEC. Administration officials are studying hedge funds, which have multiplied rapidly and which now appeal to public pension funds and retail investors, not only the financial elite.

SEC enforcement chief Linda Chatman Thomsen told the Senate Judiciary Committee last week that insider trading by hedge funds is "an area of significant concern to the commission." Thomsen testified that the agency had brought five such cases against hedge funds or their advisers in the fiscal year that ended last week.

But without e-mails, documents or an outright admission by someone involved in a case, insider trading charges can be difficult for regulators to prove.

Mack, a longtime friend of Pequot's founder who for a time served as chairman of the fund, had for months denied through a Morgan Stanley spokeswoman that he engaged in wrongdoing. A Morgan Stanley representative declined to comment on the apparent resolution of the probe. The sources who spoke about the status of the investigation spoke on condition of anonymity because it has not been completed.

Bring On The Bears (NYT)

By Richard Sauer

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076475

Arlington, Va.

SHORT sellers occupy a position in the stock market like that of predators in nature: necessary but unloved. Corporations, which like to see their stock always rising, despise these traders, who borrow shares and sell them in the expectation that the price will fall soon and they'll make a profit. There are signs, however, that these vilified traders might be coming into a measure of respect for the critical balance they provide in a market frequently dominated by the puffery of companies and sell-side analysts.

The short sellers' skeptical scrutiny of companies they feel are overpriced has led them to uncover many of the major financial frauds of recent years. Yet they continue to be burdened by a regulatory scrutiny of their own actions that springs more from rumors than fact. In the 1930's, short selling was hobbled by restrictions intended to prevent the "bear raids" many thought then (but few think now) underlay the market collapse of 1929. These included the "uptick rule," which prohibits short sales when the price of a stock is in decline.

In an unusual (and laudable) effort to measure whether a long-lived regulation actually works, the Securities and Exchange Commission recently completed a pilot program to suspend the uptick rule for a third of the stocks on the Russell 3000 index and compare their performance to stocks still subject to the rule.

At a meeting of prominent economists held by the commission last month, consensus held that price restrictions on short selling were a regulatory anachronism of no benefit to the market. Stocks freed from the uptick rule had shown no greater vulnerability to momentum selling than the control group. A few panelists, in fact, uttered the heresy that bear raids are now so uncommon that they no longer need be of concern to regulators.

No such view was expressed, however, regarding the flip side of the bear raid: the "pump and dump," a scheme in which someone promotes a worthless stock he owns, then sells it as gullible investors fall for the promotion. Panelists noted that these schemes remain commonplace, particularly among small-cap stocks, with fax and spam e-mail messages joining more traditional methods to tout toxic stocks.

They also suggested that the first line of defense against such schemes has not been the S.E.C., which acts slowly when it acts at all, but rather the much disdained short seller. By putting their money where their mouths are, short sellers are the only market participants with an incentive to deflate bubbles and inject pessimistic information into the market.

As an enforcement lawyer at the S.E.C., I received from short sellers early warnings on certain companies that led to the capture and return to investors of hundreds of millions of dollars taken by stock frauds. Such information came from no other source — certainly not from institutional stock analysts, whose failures of objectivity were made notorious by the Attorney General Eliot Spitzer of New York. Representing short-biased hedge funds as a part of my practice as a private lawyer, I continued to be impressed by their ability to spot stock frauds in the early stages.

But if short sellers are friends to the S.E.C., the commission has been no friend to short sellers. The agency has saddled short sellers with trading restrictions and has looked the other way when companies have taken potentially illegal actions to silence short sellers' criticism.

One of the tools of the pump-and-dump scheme is the "short squeeze," in which companies contrive to goose their share prices or restrict the supply of stock that can be lent out for shorting, thereby increasing the cost of maintaining a short position. The S.E.C. and the courts have recognized that such activities can constitute market manipulation. Yet the S.E.C. has shown so little interest in remedying such abuses that companies blatantly promote actions explicitly intended to force the wholesale covering of short positions. Average investors are also taken for a ride when a company's share price spikes as a result of a short squeeze.

In addition, the S.E.C. staff has been willing, indeed eager, to pursue investigations against short sellers based on complaints from companies that the shorts have said mean things about them. One recent case made national news: the S.E.C. staff sent subpoenas to financial journalists suspected of using short sellers as sources for their articles — as if that were somehow improper.

These investigations seem never to lead to enforcement actions against established funds, suggesting that shorting a stock and then spreading false rumors about the company is not a common investment strategy.

The number of short-biased funds is in decline. Those still operating are less likely than before to bring contrarian information about companies to the attention of regulators and the press, in part because of the S.E.C.'s stance toward a group that should actually merit its gratitude, and also because of the recent trend among troubled companies to sue those who have the temerity to short their stock.

This is not to propose a program of affirmative action for short-sellers, or to deny the possibility that misconduct can occur. But the S.E.C. can and should take a more balanced approach toward the only actors in the marketplace who share its interest in exposing financial fraud.

It can begin by jettisoning the antiquated uptick rule. It should view with greater skepticism companies that attribute their woes to conspiracies by short sellers. It should take appropriate enforcement action against companies that retaliate against critics through defamation campaigns and manipulative short squeezes.

Finally, Congress should provide the S.E.C. with discretion to pay bounties, similar to those available in insider trading cases, for tips resulting in successful financial fraud cases. This would give some degree of recognition to those contrarians who help keep the market honest by flagging problems concealed by companies — and missed by institutional analysts.

Richard Sauer, a former administrator in the Securities and Exchange Commission's enforcement division, joined the management at a short-biased hedge fund this week.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Watchdog Group Disputes FBI's Claims On E-Mails (WP)

By Dan Eggen

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

The watchdog group that first provided the FBI with suspicious e-mails from then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) said yesterday that FBI and Justice Department officials are attempting to cover up their inaction in the case by making false claims about the group.

Law enforcement officials said the allegations by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW) are without merit, and they stood by allegations that the group had refused to provide some information to the FBI.

The dispute is the latest controversy this week for CREW, a liberal-leaning group that has come under attack from House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and other Republicans because it has received money from a foundation funded by liberal financier George Soros.

CREW held a news conference Monday to announce that in July it had provided the FBI suspicious e-mails between Foley and a former House page. The group criticized the bureau for not taking more aggressive action and asked Justice Department Inspector General Glenn A. Fine to investigate the FBI's handling of the case.

Law enforcement officials said then that the e-mails did not provide enough evidence of a possible crime to warrant a full investigation. In the e-mails, Foley praises the physical attributes of one page and asks another teenager for his picture.

In subsequent days, unidentified Justice and FBI officials told reporters that the e-mails provided by CREW were heavily redacted and that the group refused to provide unedited versions to the FBI. One law enforcement official -- speaking on the condition of anonymity to discuss an ongoing investigation -- also told The Washington Post the FBI believed that CREW may have received the e-mails as early as April and that the group refused to tell the FBI how they were obtained.

Melanie Sloan, CREW's executive director, said copies of the original e-mails she sent to an FBI agent show those assertions to be wrong. Sloan said the agent called to confirm receipt of the e-mails and to ask if one of the parties was Foley.

Sloan said the group sent unedited e-mails to the FBI because "we wanted them to commence an investigation. We're sort of outraged that they're saying anything differently." The group has asked Fine's office to look into the FBI's assertions.

Justice Department spokesman Brian Roehrkasse declined to comment on that issue but defended the FBI's handling of the original e-mails: "The e-mails, while inappropriate, did not contain a criminal predicate to allow the FBI to move forward in an investigation."

Gonzales Discusses FBI's Congressional E-mail Inquiry (MPR)

By Elizabeth Stawicki, Minnesota Public Radio

Minnesota Public Radio, October 6, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told a business group in Minneapolis Thursday that the Bush Administration has aggressively enforced the Americans with Disabilities Act. The ADA bars discrimination aimed at people with disabilities. Later speaking

Minneapolis, Minn. — Gonzales showed no surprise when reporters at a press conference asked him about the FBI's investigation into former Congressman Foley, rather than the Americans with Disabilities Act;

"I'm shocked that you would ask me about that question in Minnesota," he joked.

Gonzales deftly fielded questions about whether the FBI has launched an investigation into Foley's, and whether the congressional leadership took part in covering up Foley's behavior. Gonzales would say only that the FBI is in the preliminary stages of the investigation and that House Speaker Dennis Hastert is cooperating.

When questions turned to whether the FBI had knowledge in July of Foley's activity, Gonzales responded this way.

"There was some information received by the (Justice) Department in the summer and this is all going to be looked at. We're going to be looking at everything that's related to this investigation and to ensure that if there's any criminal activity, any criminal wrongdoing, appropriate steps will be taken by the Department of Justice," he said.

The Attorney General also took a question about the Bush Administration's warrantless surveillance program. A Detroit federal judge ruled the program unconstitutional. But on Wednesday, a federal appeals court ruled the Bush adminstration could continue its program while the president appeals:

"The president believes it's a very important program. It's been important for securing the national security of our country. It's a limited program targeted at communications with Al-Qaeda and members of Al-Qaeda."

Gonzales came to Minneapolis to tout a Department of Justice report about governmental enforcement of the ADA, which bans discrimination based on disability. Congress passed the ADA in 1990 under George Bush Sr.'s administration. The report says that during the last five years, Justice Department has resolved 1800 out of 2000 cases through mediation rather than going to court.

Gonzales said the department forced governmental and private employers to comply with the law by aggressive enforcement and public education:

"We've made good progress in ensuring that the American dream is available to everyone in this country, no matter their physical condition, their race, their religion. We have an obligation as government officials to create an environment where the American dream is available to everyone."

Gonzales' spoke to the U.S. Business Leadership Network, which promotes employing persons with disabilities.

Ethics Panel Begins Inquiry Of Foley Scandal (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely And Kevin Johnson

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The House ethics committee launched an investigation Thursday into former congressman Mark Foley's lurid Internet communications with teenage pages to determine whether the situation was handled properly by House leadership.

Amid signs that the Foley scandal is broadening, the normally secretive committee announced it has issued nearly four dozen subpoenas for documents and testimony. Chairman Doc Hastings, R-Wash., said the committee will interrogate members and officers of Congress as well as staff.

“Our investigation will go wherever the evidence leads us,” Hastings said, declining to mention by name anyone who will testify.

The announcement came as House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., took responsibility for a scandal that could threaten his party's control of the House. Some Republicans, such as Rep. Roy Blunt of Missouri, have criticized Hastert for not being more alert to warnings about Foley's inappropriate friendships with pages.

“The buck stops here,” said Hastert, quoting former Democratic president Harry Truman. Still, Hastert insisted he has no intention of stepping down as his party's House leader.

“I haven't done anything wrong,” he said at a news conference outside his office in Batavia, Ill.

Hastert has been on a media blitz to retain his post in the face of calls for his resignation from conservatives such as Richard Viguerie.

The ethics committee no longer has jurisdiction over Foley, a Florida Republican, because he resigned from Congress last week. Instead, the panel will focus on whether members of Congress or its employees mishandled reports that Foley had sent overly friendly e-mails to a page.

“The American people, and especially the parents of all current and former pages, are entitled to know how this situation was handled,” Hastings said.

Members of a four-person investigating subcommittee, evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, expressed a determination to move swiftly.

“We're talking about a matter of weeks, not months,” said Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif.

Meanwhile, Hastert tried unsuccessfully to win Democratic support for an examination of House page security by former FBI director Louis Freeh.

Brendan Daly, a spokesman for House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, said the California Democrat objected to the former FBI director's appointment because “the page program isn't the problem.”

Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said that the speaker still hopes to enlist Freeh but that the former FBI director wants a commitment of “bipartisan cooperation” before agreeing to the assignment.

Though he is out of the ethics committee's reach, Foley faces the possibility of prosecution for illegal sexual contact with minors.

In another development: A former page, now working on the gubernatorial campaign of Republican Rep. Ernest Istook, has retained a lawyer. Lawyer Stephen Jones said he is representing the page in matters related to his work as a page and in reference to Foley.

FBI agents in Washington interviewed Kirk Fordham, a former Foley aide who has said he warned top Hastert staffers of Foley's contacts with pages at least two years ago. Fordham was “forthcoming,” his attorney Timothy Heaphy said.

Foley's offices, here and in Florida, are now run by the House clerk. They remain open to constituents, though a reporter who stopped by the Washington office, dominated by a large tank of colorful tropical fish, was shooed away.

Steps are being taken to preserve potential evidence. Salley Collins, a spokeswoman for the House Administration Committee, said officials are in the process of complying with “every request made” by the Justice Department. This week, the department asked House officials to secure Foley's computers, documents and archives.

To facilitate the investigations, Hastert announced the creation of a toll-free hotline for pages and parents to phone in tips about concerns and possible abuses. The number of the tip line is 866-348-0481.

Hastert canceled an appearance at a Monday fundraiser for Republican congressional candidate Joy Padgett, an Ohio state senator, but remained upbeat at his Illinois news conference.

“I am going to run, and presumably win, in this election,” Hastert said. “And when we do, I expect to run for leader — for speaker.”

Inquiry To Look At House, Not Foley (WP)

By Charles Babington

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

The House ethics committee launched a wide-ranging investigation into Congress's handling of information about a Florida lawmaker and teenage pages yesterday, as Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) vowed to keep his job, saying, "I haven't done anything wrong."

The ethics panel approved nearly four dozen subpoenas for documents and testimony from House members, officers and aides. Its leaders said they plan to complete the inquiry in a matter of weeks, but not necessarily before the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

"Our investigation will go wherever the evidence leads us," Chairman Doc Hastings (R-Wash.) told reporters at the Capitol. The committee is evenly divided between the two parties, and Hastings and Rep. Howard L. Berman (Calif.), the top Democrat, promised to conduct an impartial investigation into the House's handling of warnings about the conduct of then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

The committee's inquiry will proceed in tandem with investigations by the FBI and Florida officials. Unlike those agencies, the ethics committee has no jurisdiction over Foley, who resigned last week as ABC News was publishing sexually graphic electronic messages between him and teenage former congressional pages. Hastings said his committee will focus on the "conduct of House members, officers and staff related to information concerning improper conduct involving members and current and former pages."

Democrats and some Republicans have accused Hastert and his leadership team of brushing off early indications of a problem -- including what they called an "over-friendly" e-mail that Foley sent to a Louisiana boy in 2005 -- that might have led investigators to find the explicit instant-message exchanges that had occurred in previous years. Two high-ranking House Republicans have said they told Hastert about that e-mail, and another lawmaker says he told Hastert's staff.

Kirk Fordham, Foley's former chief of staff, said this week that he repeatedly alerted Hastert's staff in 2003 to complaints that the Florida lawmaker was showing inappropriate interest in male pages, who are high-schoolers spending a semester or two working for Congress. The FBI spent more than three hours yesterday interviewing Fordham.

Some Republicans said they are most concerned about Fordham's assertions. Scott Palmer, the speaker's top aide, has denied the allegations and spent much of Wednesday night rummaging through old e-mails and files to determine whether he ever corresponded with Fordham, a source close to Hastert said. Palmer, who was described as very emotional, told Hastert that Fordham's assertions are false, the source said.

Hastert's office has been on edge. Deputy Chief of Staff Mike Stokke, who handles politics for the speaker, has offered to resign, two sources close to Hastert said, and several aides have expressed frustration that Ted Van Der Meid, the top counsel in the office, did not do a better job monitoring the Foley situation. Hastert did not accept Stokke's resignation offer, the source said.

Hastert, addressing reporters in Batavia, Ill., reasserted that he knew nothing of complaints about Foley's behavior until the day the Floridian resigned last week. The speaker rejected calls for his resignation by a handful of conservative groups, saying: "I haven't done anything wrong, obviously. And we need to come back." At the same time, he said, "We're taking responsibility, because ultimately, as someone has said in Washington before, the buck stops here."

Hastert suggested that Democrats may have known about the lewd instant messages and leaked them for partisan advantage, but he said he had no evidence.

Hastert had hoped to announce the bipartisan appointment of former FBI director Louis J. Freeh to look into ways to improve the page program, in which teenagers live in a Capitol Hill dorm and attend a special school. But when he called Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) early in the afternoon, she declined to go along with the plan.

Pelosi saw the Freeh proposal as a ploy to burnish the GOP's image, aides said. She told the speaker that investigators should examine whether existing rules and procedures were followed before the House considers new rules, the aides said.

At the ethics committee's news conference, Hastings said he thinks Hastert "has done an excellent job" as speaker but added that as committee chairman he would be able to render impartial judgments on the Foley affair.

The committee has a stormy history, in part because Hastert replaced key members in early 2005 as the panel was investigating then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Tex.). The committee was essentially paralyzed, but public furor over the Foley scandal forced it into action on a high-profile issue.

The four-person subcommittee handling the Foley matter consists of Hastings, Berman, Judy Biggert (R-Ill.) and Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio). Berman said that "we are dealing with a fundamental institutional issue" concerning the handling of information and warnings about Foley.

As he had done before, Hastert described the Foley chronology yesterday in ways that some Republican colleagues challenge. "Could the Page Board have handled it better?" he said. "In retrospect, probably, yes."

But only two of the Page Board's six members -- three lawmakers and three staffers -- knew anything about the e-mail to the Louisiana boy. Among those kept in the dark were Reps. Shelley Moore Capito (R-W.Va.) and Dale E. Kildee (D-Mich.). They have said they should have been brought into the decision-making process earlier this year.

Hastert was feistier in a Chicago Tribune interview published yesterday. "The people who want to see this thing blow up," he said, "are ABC News and a lot of Democratic operatives, people funded by George Soros," a major contributor to liberal causes. "I saw Bill Clinton's adviser Richard Morris was saying these guys knew about this all along."

Morris is a former Clinton consultant who was been sharply at odds with the former president for years. Hastert offered no proof for his assertions, and Democrats called them absurd and laughable.

High-ranking House Republicans, after challenging Hastert's handling of the Foley matter in recent days, issued statements of support yesterday.

President Bush called Hastert last night to offer his support. "He's saying at this point that the speaker should not resign," spokesman Tony Snow said.

Meanwhile yesterday, a 26-year-old Atlanta man says Foley began sending him sexually suggestive messages and invited him to his Washington home after he served as a congressional page nine years ago. Tyson Vivyan said Foley began sending him online instant messages a month or two after his nine-month stint as a page ended in June 1997. Foley entered Congress in January 1995.

Vivyan's account appears to show the earliest exchange of suggestive messages reported so far between Foley and former pages. Vivyan said he played along at first, thinking it was someone he knew. After weeks of peppering the anonymous message sender with questions, he said he figured out who it was and refused to engage in the sexual banter that Foley tried to instigate.

"I had absolutely no sexual interest in him. He was a man twice my age," said Vivyan, who added: "I don't call my self gay, I don't call myself straight."

Vivyan, who is divorced, said he found the congressman's behavior "morally reprehensible" but tried to maintain a platonic professional relationship in which they talked about legislation and "votes on the Hill."

He said that in 1999 Foley invited him and another former page over to his home for pizza. Vivyan said they went and "everything was completely platonic and nonsexual."

Also yesterday, ABC News reported that three more former congressional pages have come forward to reveal what they call "sexual approaches" over the Internet from Foley. The pages served in the classes of 1998, 2000 and 2002, ABC said, and they do not want their names used.

Panel Vows Hard Look At House Page Scandal (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

WASHINGTON, Oct. 5 — Leaders of the House ethics committee on Thursday promised a thorough investigation into the circumstances surrounding former Representative Mark Foley's electronic messages to Congressional pages and approved nearly four dozen subpoenas for an inquiry they said would take "weeks, not months."

"The American people, and especially the parents of all current and former pages, are entitled to know how this situation was handled, and we are determined to answer their questions," said Representative Doc Hastings, Republican of Washington, who is chairman of the panel.

Mr. Hastings said that the committee, which is evenly divided between Republicans and Democrats, would question lawmakers, House officers and staff members and "go wherever the evidence leads us."

The committee, which had been paralyzed by partisan conflict until recently, no longer has jurisdiction over Mr. Foley, who resigned from Congress last Friday.

The panel can, however, investigate whether lawmakers failed to take adequate steps to protect pages and whether they and staff members properly pursued the initial report of Mr. Foley's e-mail messages to a Louisiana page whose parents were alarmed by their content.

"First of all, we have to establish the facts," said Representative Judy Biggert, Republican of Illinois, who will conduct the inquiry with Mr. Hastings and two Democrats, Howard L. Berman of California and Stephanie Tubbs Jones of Ohio. "And the facts will lead us to who — if there is someone — who perhaps did a cover-up."

The ethics committee action came just before Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, whose handling of the matter has been severely criticized, made an appearance in his north-central Illinois district, where he said he accepted responsibility for the way accusations involving Mr. Foley were investigated while restating that he would not resign.

Mr. Hastert had been prepared to announce that he was naming a former F.B.I. director, Louis J. Freeh, to lead a study into the security of the Congressional page program but dropped the plan because Democrats balked when told about it.

Mr. Hastert and his allies were hoping his acceptance of responsibility could begin to turn the tide in a controversy that has become a threat to Republican control of the House.

Representative Joe L. Barton, Republican of Texas and chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, circulated a letter of support that compared Mr. Hastert's position to that of the defenders of the Alamo.

"Today, our speaker, Dennis Hastert, is suddenly surrounded by a besieging army, but of a different sort," said Mr. Barton, who urged his colleagues to stand with the speaker. "It is not a military army, but a political and ideological army of the left, demanding his unconditional surrender."

Other Republicans raised new concerns about Mr. Hastert, particularly after Kirk Fordham, a senior Congressional aide who once worked for Mr. Foley, said Wednesday that he had warned Scott Palmer, Mr. Hastert's chief of staff, that Mr. Foley was acting inappropriately with pages well before the first e-mail surfaced. Mr. Palmer denied that.

"I'm very concerned with the news reports from last night that indicate leadership in the House of Representatives, including Speaker Hastert, may have had advance knowledge of this wrongdoing," said Representative Jeb Bradley, Republican of New Hampshire. "If these allegations prove true, Speaker Hastert should resign."

In a sign that a Justice Department inquiry is moving ahead, Mr. Fordham and his lawyer, Tim Heaphy, appeared briefly before reporters on Thursday. Mr. Fordham said nothing while Mr. Heaphy said Mr. Fordham had answered questions from the F.B.I.

"He can't comment further," Mr. Heaphy said, because of the inquiry.

The F.B.I. was also checking reports that one or more of the pages Mr. Foley had communicated with had, as a joke, pretended to respond in kind to Mr. Foley's suggestive instant messages, said government officials who were briefed on the case.

Aides to the minority leader, Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, said the speaker called her earlier Thursday to advise her of his idea to bring in Mr. Freeh. The aides said Ms. Pelosi objected, asserting that the issue was not the future of the page program but whether Republicans reacted properly to Mr. Foley's contacts with a former page.

Ms. Pelosi herself said Mr. Hastert, in his remarks on Thursday, again said that the initial complaint had been handled by the House page board when only its Republican chairman and the person who was then clerk of the House had been involved rather than the full board, including the Democratic member.

"They still don't get it," Ms. Pelosi said.

DOJ_NMG_0076481

Mr. Hastert also said Thursday that the head of the board, Representative John Shimkus, Republican of Illinois, had confronted Mr. Foley over the Louisiana e-mail and "asked him if there were any other messages."

"He said no," Mr. Hastert said.

On Monday, Mr. Hastert said he did not know whether Mr. Shimkus had pressed Mr. Foley on messages to others. Mr. Shimkus, in an interview on Wednesday with The Chicago Tribune, said he did not ask Mr. Foley about other messages.

The ethics committee would not disclose the intended recipients of the subpoenas. Mr. Hastings said he hoped those sought would cooperate voluntarily "because we believe that most of these individuals share our desire to get quick and truthful answers to the questions that are being asked by so many Americans."

The ethics panel had been the center of a partisan fight after Mr. Hastert proposed changes in 2005 that Democrats said were intended to gut the panel in retaliation for a series of rebukes to Tom DeLay, who was then the majority leader. But Mr. Berman, who was named senior Democrat on the panel this year when his predecessor was forced to step aside, said he and Mr. Hastings worked well together.

"We have ideological and philosophical differences," Mr. Berman said, "but on this committee and for purposes of this investigation, we are going to put those partisan considerations totally aside."

Some groups called on the ethics committee to bring in outside counsel to handle the inquiry as it has done in some cases involving Congressional leaders. But Mr. Berman and other panel members expressed confidence that they could conduct a credible investigation.

"My reputation is too important to put it aside for purposes of some friendship," said Ms. Tubb Jones, a former judge and prosecutor.

Ethics Committee To Probe Foley Scandal (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

The House ethics committee yesterday opened an investigation into the congressional page scandal, vowing to follow the evidence and spare no one based on politics as it approved "nearly four dozen" subpoenas for members, Capitol officials and staffers.

"The American people, and especially the parents of all current and former pages, are entitled to know how this situation was handled, and we are determined to answer their questions," Rep. Doc Hastings, Washington Republican and chairman of the committee, said yesterday. "We pledge to you that our investigation will go wherever the evidence leads us."

The committee of five Republicans and five Democrats voted unanimously during an emergency meeting yesterday morning to approve dozens of subpoenas for documents and testimony related to former Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, the page program and the steps taken by Republican leaders after the parents of a former page complained about e-mails Mr. Foley had written their teenage son, Mr. Hastings said.

Moments after the investigation was announced, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, flatly dismissed calls from some conservatives that he resign the top House position for not investigating the situation more swiftly and thoroughly when he first learned of Mr. Foley's contact with the former page.

"I'm going to run, presumably win this election," he told reporters gathered in his hometown of Batavia, Ill. "And when we do, I expect to run for leader -- for speaker."

Mr. Hastert began his remarks on a note of contrition. "I'm deeply sorry that this has happened, and the bottom line is that we're taking responsibility," he said. "Ultimately, as someone has said in Washington before: The buck stops here."

But by the end of his remarks, he again denied any wrongdoing.

Mr. Hastert also announced the creation of a confidential toll-free hot line -- 866/384-0481 -- for information about abuses related to the congressional page program.

President Bush spoke last night with Mr. Hastert, thanking him for making a clear public statement and taking responsibility for the situation. The president said he appreciated that when House leaders learned of the lurid instant messages, they took swift action to persuade Mr. Foley to resign, and called for an investigation. He also reiterated his support for the speaker.

Meanwhile, the FBI continued its preliminary investigation into the matter. Yesterday, investigators interviewed Kirk Fordham, a former Foley staffer who resigned this week amid charges he tried to keep from the public some of the most salacious Internet messages Mr. Foley sent teenage boys. Upon resigning Wednesday, Mr. Fordham told reporters that House Republican leadership officials knew more about Mr. Foley's behavior much earlier than they are acknowledging.

Mr. Fordham and his attorney appeared briefly before news cameras yesterday to say that he had testified but declined to comment further.

The parents appear to support for the most part the Republican leadership's version of when they learned of the Foley matter and how they responded, according to the statement.

After learning of the suggestive e-mails last fall, Rep. Rodney Alexander, Louisiana Republican, contacted the family, they said.

"He explained that his office had been made aware of these e-mails by our son and that while he thought the e-mails were overly friendly, he did not think, nor did we think, that they were offensive enough to warrant an investigation," they said, according to the statement.

The parents asked that Mr. Foley be ordered to stop contacting their son but, wanting to avoid a "media frenzy," they also asked that the matter be dropped.

The matter will be closely reviewed by the ethics committee, both Democrats and Republicans on the panel promised.

"I wanted no part of an incumbent protection agency," Rep. Howard L. Berman, California Democrat, said of joining the committee earlier this year. "We all have strong partisan feelings, we have passionate concerns about issues, we have ideological and philosophical differences, but on this committee and for purposes of this investigation, we are going to put those partisan considerations totally aside, as we have seen and witnessed from the chairman during the past five and a half months."

During the ethics committee press conference, Mr. Hastings said, "I think the speaker has done an excellent job."

Asked whether that assessment might not taint his objectivity during the upcoming probe of how Mr. Hastert handled the Foley matter, Mr. Hastings paused for a moment.

"Listen, I don't want to get into all of that," he said. "We are here to talk about what the ethics committee is going to do regarding the incidents that happened in the last week, and that's what we want to focus on."

Questions also were asked about whether Rep. Judy Biggert, an Illinois Republican on the committee whose district borders Mr. Hastert's, could remain objective.

"It makes no difference," she said. "The evidence will lead us, as the chairman said, to find the facts as they stand and take action that is needed."

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi said she is "pleased" that the committee is investigating the "cover-up" of Mr. Foley's electronic dalliances.

"I expect that the Republican members, officers of the House and staff will be questioned under oath so that this scandal will be resolved fairly and quickly," she said.

Earlier yesterday, Republican aides said Mr. Hastert intended to ask former FBI Director Louis J. Freeh to evaluate the page program and make recommendations for how to improve it. But, the aides said, Mrs. Pelosi nixed the proposal.

"The speaker reached out to Democrat Leader Pelosi and shared with her that Louis Freeh would be a great choice to strengthen the security of the House page program," said one House Republican leadership aide. "Pelosi rejected the idea because she wanted to focus attention on the investigation."

Mr. Hastert's future all week has been in question with calls for his resignation coming from the right. But by yesterday, those doubts appeared to clear.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, and House Deputy Whip Eric Cantor, Virginia Republican, both issued statements supporting Mr. Hastert.

"Calls for Speaker Hastert to resign are ridiculous," Mr. Cantor said. "Speaker Hastert is an honest man who would never put a child in harm's way. Of that, I am confident, as I am of his leadership."

House Ethics Panel Moves To Probe Foley Case (SCRIPPS)

By Lisa Hoffman, Scripps Howard News Service

Scripps Howard, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - Opening a new investigative front in the Mark Foley sex scandal, the House ethics panel Thursday authorized a barrage of nearly 48 subpoenas for witnesses and documents, while, back home in Illinois, the besieged House speaker vowed to keep his post.

After a two-hour, closed-door meeting, the bipartisan House ethics committee announced a unanimous decision to cast a wide net across the House of Representatives to examine a swirl of allegations surrounding the case of the former Florida GOP lawmaker and his X-rated e-mails with young male congressional pages.

"Like all Americans, we are ... appalled at the revelations of highly improper communications," panel chairman Rep. Doc Hastings, of Washington state, told reporters.

He and the top Democrat on the committee, Rep. Howard Berman of California, promised an expeditious probe, with results expected within weeks. In an ironic coincidence, the panel met in a room just three doors down in the Capitol building from the House pages' locker room.

In Batavia, Ill., House Speaker Dennis Hastert, whose own actions are certain to form a central part of the ethics probe of Foley's conduct and GOP leaders' responses, promised to cooperate in the investigation.

Hastert said the committee should focus on the source of transcripts of sexually graphic Instant Message conversations between Foley and the young men, which first surfaced publicly last Friday. A six-term House lawmaker and member of the GOP leadership, Foley, 52, abruptly resigned that same day.

Hastert and other Republicans are suspicious that Democrats leaked the salacious messages to influence the coming elections. But The Hill newspaper Thursday reported that a former House Republican staffer was the one who first shared the documents with the news media.

The speaker has been urged to resign his post by several angry GOP lawmakers but also defended by many more. He quashed rumors of an imminent announcement that he was stepping down. Instead, he said he was willing to take the blame for whatever lapses occurred.

"The bottom line is, I am taking responsibility for it because ultimately the buck stops here," Hastert said. Even so, he added, "I haven't done anything wrong."

He also said he wants to appoint a prominent figure to lead an examination of the congressional page program, which brings high school students from across the country to serve as messengers for lawmakers and learn about Congress first hand. A suggestion that former FBI Director Louis Freeh could be recruited was nixed by House Democrats, according to the Associated Press.

Meanwhile, a skirmish between the FBI and one of the Foley whistleblowers erupted Thursday over how seriously the federal agents took transcripts of suggestive conversations between Foley and one of the pages, whose parents ultimately reported their desire last year to the page's House sponsor that the communications end.

Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, a self-described "progressive" advocacy group, said it gave the FBI the transcripts in July after interpreting the messages as a classical ploy by a sexual predator on the prowl for an innocent young victim.

CREW executive director Melanie Sloan said that the FBI spoke to her once thereafter but never again. On Monday, her group called on the Department of Justice to probe the FBI's failure to investigate.

News reports this week quoted unnamed FBI officials as saying Sloan had given them copies of e-mails with pertinent information, such as the name of the recipient, blacked out. The officials also said CREW ignored a request to give the FBI more information.

Sloan called the FBI account a "cover-up story" to mask its inattention to the matter, and said the documents she forwarded were not blacked out. CREW never refused to provide anything to the federal agents, she said, and blasted the FBI for "lying."

Several telephone requests for comment from the FBI and the Justice Department were not returned.

Republicans On Panel Have Ties To Hastert (USAT)

By David Jackson And Matt Kelley

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Both Republicans on the House ethics subcommittee investigating the Mark Foley scandal have financial ties to Speaker Dennis Hastert, whose handling of the former congressman's lurid Internet messages to House pages is under scrutiny.

Ethics Chairman Doc Hastings received $2,500 during the 2000 campaign from Hastert's political action committee, Keep Our Majority, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, which tracks money in politics. The six-term Washington Republican, who became ethics chairman last year, will lead the Foley investigation.

Rep. Judy Biggert of Illinois received $6,000 from Hastert's PAC and $2,000 from Hastert's own re-election fund during the 2002 campaign, according to PoliticalMoneyLine.

Biggert, whose district neighbors Hastert's, said personal relationships and financial ties will not affect the investigation: “I think that all of us on this committee were chosen because we are thought to be fair.”

Fred Wertheimer, president of the watchdog group Democracy 21, said the Hastert contributions undermine the subcommittee's credibility. “They should have brought in an outside counsel,” he said.

Berman, who is in his 12th term, is the top Democrat on the full ethics committee. Berman recently replaced Rep. Alan Mollohan, D-W.Va., on the ethics panel. Mollohan stepped down amid charges that he funneled federal money to home-state foundations and increased his own wealth. He has denied wrongdoing.

Tubbs Jones is a former municipal and county judge in Cleveland and served as the elected Cuyahoga County prosecutor.

Ethics members have a job to do "regardless of relationships," she said. "My reputation is too important to put it aside for purposes of some friendship."

The panel will be aided by William O'Reilly, the committee's staff director and counsel.

Chairman Of House Ethics Committee Faces Daunting Task (MCT)

By Les Blumenthal

McClatchy Newspapers, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - As the chairman of the House of Representatives ethics committee, Rep. Doc Hastings finds himself at the center of the congressional page scandal and allegations that Republican leaders, including House Speaker Dennis Hastert, may have handled the case improperly.

After a rough start, Hastings seems to have found his footing as the chairman of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct. But Hastert, R-Ill., picked the Washington state Republican for the post and Hastings has been a longtime supporter of the speaker.

"It's an extremely difficult task for him," Norm Ornstein, a respected political analyst with the American Enterprise Institute, a policy-research center, said of Hastings' role in the looming investigation. "If he doesn't do it the right way it will destroy him."

A low-key and loyal Republican from a central Washington state district in which he consistently rolls up margins of more than 60 percent, Hastings announced Thursday that his committee had launched an investigation and would issue four dozen subpoenas. He declined to say whether Hastert would be among those subpoenaed.

Hastings said the committee had decided not to hire an outside counsel as it had in its investigations of two previous speakers, Democrat Jim Wright and Republican Newt Gingrich.

"We are going to do what we feel we are charged to do," said Hastings, who'd flown back to the capital from his district this week as the scandal deepened and the pressure grew on Hastert to contain it with the November elections approaching.

The ethics committee usually acts in secret. But Hasting and the other committee members held a news conference to announce their investigation.

Asked whether he personally supported Hastert, Hastings said, "I think the speaker has done an excellent job."

Asked whether he questioned the speaker's leadership, Hastings said, "Listen, I don't want to get into all of that. We are here to talk about what the ethics committee is going to do regarding the incidents in the last week, and that's where we are. That's what we want to focus on."

Hastings was named the chairman of the committee in February 2005 after Hastert declined to reappoint Rep. Joel Hefley, R-Colo. Hastert also removed the two other Republican members of the committee who along with Hefley had voted twice to admonish then-House Majority Leader Tom DeLay for ethical lapses.

Over the next 16 months, a partisan stalemate stymied any new committee investigations, including new allegations involving DeLay. Hastings and West Virginia Rep. Alan Mollohan, then the top Democrat on the committee, were at loggerheads over a number of issues, including the makeup of the committee staff.

Earlier this year, Mollohan stepped down from the committee under his own ethics cloud and was replaced by Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif.

Since then, the committee, which is divided equally between Republicans and Democrats, has launched four investigations, including one involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

Berman said Thursday that when he was appointed he made it clear that he didn't want to be part of an "incumbent protection agency," and that he and Hastings had been working well together over the past five and a half months. He said he expected that committee members would set aside their "strong partisan feelings" in conducting the new investigation.

Ornstein, who earlier had been highly critical of Hastings, said the committee had improved since Berman was appointed.

"Hastings started very badly, helping to emasculate the committee," Ornstein said. "I think that has changed. We now have a functioning committee."

Ex-page Says He Got Messages From Foley (AP-Y)

By Greg Bluestein

AP, October 5, 2006

Tyson Vivyan's account appears to show the earliest exchange of suggestive messages reported so far between Foley and teens who had served in the Capitol page program. Previous accounts placed the earliest contacts in 2003.

Vivyan, 26, told The Associated Press that Foley began sending him instant messages about a month or two after his nine-month stint as a page ended in June 1997.

Vivyan, who gave interviews this week to other media, said he never met Foley personally during his stint as a page, other than brief greetings while working in the cloakroom beside the House chamber where members take breaks.

A few months later, he said, he started getting instant messages via computer from a person with the screen name MAF54, which has been linked in news reports to Foley. He said he wasn't sure who it was, but the person knew his name and physical description. He said the person asked personal questions, such as his sexual orientation.

Vivyan said he figured the person had to be on Capitol Hill, and began looking up initials in a congressional guide. He said that when he found Foley's initials — MAF, born in 1954 — he realized who it was.

"It was almost surreal. Not only was I conversing with a congressman in a personal manner, I was conversing in a sexual manner," Vivyan said.

After he guessed it was Foley, the person continued to contact him. Vivyan said he tried to turn the talk to politics. Foley would often stop talking and contact him a week later with suggestive messages.

Vivyan also said he was invited to Foley's brownstone in Washington. Vivyan said he didn't want to go alone, so brought a fellow page with him. He said they had pizza and soft drinks, and nothing sexual happened.

Foley, 52, resigned Friday. He has since entered an alcohol rehabilitation facility at an undisclosed location. Through his lawyer, he has said he is gay but denied any sexual contact with minors.

Vivyan said he was nominated as a page by Rep. John. J. Duncan, R-Tenn. Don Walker, Duncan's deputy chief of staff, confirmed Thursday to the AP that Vivyan was a page from Duncan's district.

"We did not get any complaints form him while he was a page or after he was a page or anytime thereafter until Monday," Walker said. "As soon as we learned of it we turned it over to the authorities."

Vivyan said he was interviewed this week by the FBI. FBI spokesman Stephen Emmett in Atlanta declined comment.

Three More Former Pages Accuse Foley Of Online Sexual Approaches (ABC)

By Brian Ross, Rhonda Schwartz & Maddy Sauer

ABC News.com, October 5, 2006

Three more former congressional pages have come forward to reveal what they call "sexual approaches" over the Internet from former Congressman Mark Foley.

The pages served in the classes of 1998, 2000 and 2002. They independently approached ABC News after the Foley resignation through the Brian Ross & the Investigative Team's tip line on ABCNews.com. None wanted their names used because of the sensitive nature of the communications.

"I was seventeen years old and just returned to [my home state] when Foley began to e-mail me, asking if I had ever seen my page roommates naked and how big their penises were," said the page in the 2002 class.

The former page also said Foley told him that if he happened to be in Washington, D.C., he could stay at Foley's home if he "would engage in oral sex" with Foley.

The page told ABC News he was interviewed this week by FBI agents who had a six-page list of questions about Foley and the exchanges.

The second page who talked with ABC News, a graduate of the 2000 page class, says Foley actually visited the old page dorm and offered rides to events in his BMW.

"His e-mails developed into sexually explicit conversations, and he asked me for photographs of my erect penis," the former page said.

The third page interviewed by ABC News, a graduate of the 1998 page class, said Foley's instant messages began while he was a senior in high school.

"Foley would say he was sitting in his boxers and ask what I was wearing," the page said.

"It became more weird, and I stopped responding," the page said.

DOJ_NMG_0076486

All three pages described similar instant message and e-mail patterns, with remarkably similar escalations of provocative questions.

"He didn't want to talk about politics," the page said. "He wanted to talk about sex or my penis," the page said.

The three new verbal accounts are in addition to two sets of sexually explicit instant messages provided to ABC News by former pages.

An online story on the Drudge Report Thursday claimed one set of the sexually explicit instant messages obtained by ABC News was part of a "prank" on the part of the former page, who reportedly says he goaded the congressman into writing the messages.

"This was no prank," said one of the three former pages who talked to ABC News today about his experience with the congressman.

ABC Mistakenly Releases ID In Page Probe (AP-Y)

AP, October 5, 2006

ABC News' fleeting, inadvertent publishing of a computer screen name enabled a blogger to track down and make public the supposed identity of a former congressional page who traded salacious messages with former Rep. Mark Foley.

In breaking the story of the now-burgeoning scandal, the network last Friday posted on its Web site a series of instant message exchanges between Foley and the teen-ager. The name of the page was not included.

But in one exchange the network inadvertently left the victim's screen name on. It was quickly discovered and removed, replaced by a version with the name redacted.

However, ABC said Thursday that a blogger was able to retrieve the deleted file. The blogger, known as "Wild Bill' from the "Passionate America" site, went on a computer detective mission he describes in detail on his site to discover the name.

"To be clear, no one visiting our Web site would have simply stumbled on the old version," ABC News spokesman Jeffrey Schneider said. "We thank the blogger and (Matt) Drudge for bringing this to our attention."

ABC has taken additional steps to make sure no one can access the deleted messages, he said.

Victims Say Foley Should Name Abuser (AP-Y)

By Brian Skoloff

AP, October 5, 2006

Former Rep. Mark Foley's refusal to identify the clergyman he says molested him as a boy is reckless and could put other children at risk, say victims' advocates and a former priest who knows the ex-congressman.

If Foley has information about a child molester, especially one who is still living, he should come forward with that immediately, they say.

"To simply say, `I can't tell you the name,' in my judgment, that's despicable," said William Brooks, a former Roman Catholic priest at Cardinal Newman High School in Lake Worth where Foley was briefly a student in 1969. "It casts a dark cloud of suspicion over all the clergy who worked during those days. I just think it's wrong."

The Florida Republican abruptly resigned last week over sexually explicit Internet communications he had with teenage boys who worked as pages on Capitol Hill. He has since gone into rehab for treatment of alcoholism and "other behavioral problems."

Earlier this week, Foley's attorney, David Roth, announced that his client was molested between the ages of 13 and 15. He declined to identify the clergyman or the church, but Foley is Roman Catholic. Roth also said that Foley was gay, something that friends had known but the lawmaker had kept secret from the public.

Roth said that the announcements were part of Foley's "recovery" and that Foley would not disclose the name of the alleged abuser until after he is released from treatment, in 30 days, at the earliest.

"If this perpetrator is still alive, then there's a very good chance that he's still molesting minors," said Anne Barrett Doyle of the Web site BishopAccountability.org, which tracks clergy abuse cases.

Roth declined to comment Thursday.

Mark Serrano of the Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests, or SNAP, echoed the call for Foley to reveal his abuser. He said it was a "great tragedy" that Foley did not reveal this sooner, when he could have worked on behalf of those abused by clergy in his capacity as a congressman.

"As a clergy abuse survivor, it angers me because Congressman Foley, of all people, should know the trauma and pain and anguish that comes from the effects of child sexual abuse," he said.

The accusations have also cast a wider shadow over the Diocese of Palm Beach, which in the past 10 years has seen two bishops admit to molesting boys, and a third accused of abuse. Authorities also recently issued arrest warrants for two priests accused of misappropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars at a Delray Beach church.

Foley was an altar boy at Sacred Heart Catholic Church in Lake Worth and attended Cardinal Newman High School for his freshman year before transferring to Lake Worth High School.

His father was an assistant football coach at Cardinal Newman, and the Foley family was deeply involved in the church, often having priests at their home, said Joan Arsenault, whose children attended school with Foley.

"They were friendly with the priests," Arsenault said Thursday.

The Palm Beach Diocese has declined to comment on any aspect of the accusations, given that Foley has not said where the abuse occurred.

Watch What You Write! IM Conversations Can Linger For Years (AP)

By Anick Jesdanun, Associated Press

AP, October 6, 2006

NEW YORK -- Instant-messaging conversations, though quick, aren't always fleeting.

Rep. Mark Foley's salacious chats with teenage pages emerged along with e-mails last week, as the Florida Republican abruptly resigned. ABC News, which broke the story, has said former pages were the source of the revelations about IMs from 2003.

Most likely, the pages who corresponded with Foley either manually saved messages or used IM software with built-in logging capabilities, allowing time-stamped chat sessions to be kept indefinitely on one's computer. The programs vary in whether the features are initially on or off and how well they notify users.

``Computers are really, really good at saving things, unlike a dumb telephone," said Richard M. Smith, an Internet security and privacy consultant at Boston Software Forensics. ``If you don't want something to get out, don't put it in any computer form at all."

Chat programs from Yahoo Inc. and Microsoft Corp. are among those with logging capabilities. Microsoft's installs with the ``off" button initially selected, while Yahoo's automatically records chats but clears them when a user signs off (users can choose to turn it off or record forever).

AOL Instant Messenger, the most popular IM service in the United States, doesn't offer logging in its current consumer versions but does in its business-oriented AIM Pro software. AOL's service also can be accessed by Trillian and other third-party software with built-in logging.

Computer-indexing programs such as Google Desktop also have options to retain chats on a personal computer. Some computers also may have keystroke-recording programs secretly installed by a boss or a spouse.

Google Inc. offers users the ability to store such conversations online, so they can be accessed just like e-mail. You need a password to see conversations, although Google and other service providers typically disclose such information to law enforcement when issued a subpoena or court order.

Time Warner Inc.'s AOL, Yahoo and Microsoft all say they do not retain chat sessions at all. Once a message is sent, it should exist only on the sender's and recipient's computer.

The Foley investigation comes as Attorney General Alberto Gonzales seeks a federal law requiring that Internet providers preserve customer records, asserting that prosecutors need them to fight child pornography. However, Justice officials have said that any proposal would not call for the content of IM and other communications to be preserved.

Some employers have software in place to record traffic through their networks, and some business-grade IM systems have centralized logging.

Conversations may also remain on Foley's home or work computers, even if he did not have automated logging. Some computers temporarily store their memory's contents on the disk drive, but the data could take awhile to get overwritten, said Kristin Nimsger, vice president of legal technologies with Kroll Inc.'s Kroll Ontrack.

``Delete does not mean delete, and a hard drive by its very function is going to retain all sorts of information about a person's computer that they may not be aware of," she said.

The Justice Department has ordered House officials to preserve all records in the case.

The tougher part may be proving the messages' authenticity, particularly when the evidence comes from the recipients. Logs are generally plain text files that can be easily altered.

Mark Rasch, a former Justice Department computer crimes prosecutor, said prosecutors must also prove that Foley was on the other end, not someone else using his IM account.

``We've got to prove that the instant-messaging session occurred and that Foley's hands ... (were) on his keyboard," Rasch said.

New Media A Weapon In New World Of Politics (WP)

By John F. Harris

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

At first glance, three uproars that buffeted American politics in recent weeks have little in common.

Former congressman Mark Foley (R-Fla.) ended his political career over sexually charged e-mails to former House pages. Sen. George Allen (R-Va.) stumbled over his puzzling use of the word "macaca" and his clumsy response to revelations about his Jewish ancestry. Former president Bill Clinton had a televised temper fit when an interviewer challenged his terrorism record.

All three episodes, however, were in their own ways signs of the unruly new age in American politics. Each featured an arresting personal angle. Each originally percolated in the world of new media -- Web sites and news outlets that did not exist a generation ago -- before charging into the traditional world of newspapers and television networks. In each case, the accusations quickly pivoted into a debate about the motivations and alleged biases of the accusers.

Cumulatively, the stories highlight a new brand of politics in which nearly any revelation in the news becomes a weapon or shield in the daily partisan wars, and the aim of candidates and their operatives is not so much to win an argument as to brand opponents as fundamentally unfit.

In interviews, figures as diverse as Clinton, Vice President Cheney and White House strategist Karl Rove spoke about their experiences navigating the highly polarized and often downright toxic political and media environment that blossomed in the 1990s and reached full flower in recent years. Their comments, and those of their associates, underscore just how dramatically changes in media culture have influenced the strategies and daily routines of leading political figures.

Cheney said he often starts his day by listening to radio host Don Imus, whose trash-talking style has given him legions of fans and made his show a frequent stop of politicians. Cheney's wife, Lynne, people close to her say, is an avid consumer of Matt Drudge's online Drudge Report, which often either breaks or promotes stories with a salacious angle and in recent days has bannered every new disclosure in the Foley case.

Rove said he has benefited on occasion from the new-media echo chamber. When he gave a speech last year saying liberals want to give terrorists understanding and therapy, he delighted when Democrats howled in protest. This guaranteed that the story would stay alive for days. "I was sort of amused by it because it struck me, well, they're just simply repeating my argument, which was good," he said.

Clinton -- who regards Rove with a mixture of admiration and disdain as the most effective modern practitioner of polarizing politics -- said in an interview that he has become fixated on the problem of how Democrats can learn to fight more effectively against the kind of attack President Bush's top political aide leveled. Associates of the former president said he thinks that Democrats Al Gore in 2000 and Sen. John F. Kerry (Mass.) in 2004 lost the presidency because they could not effectively respond to a modern media culture that places new emphasis on politicians' personalities and provides new incentives for personal attack.

While the Foley and Allen episodes burned Republicans, Clinton said in an interview earlier this year that he thinks the proliferation of media outlets, as well as the breakdown of old restraints in both media and politics, on balance has favored Republicans. Without mentioning Gore or Kerry by name, he complained that many Democrats have allowed themselves to become unnerved and even paralyzed in response.

"All of this is a head game, you know. . . . All great contests are head games," Clinton said. "Our candidates have to get to a point where they don't allow other people to define them as either people or as political leaders. Our people have got to be more psychologically prepared for it, and there has to be more distance between them and these withering attacks."

Associates said he regards this as his most important advice to his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), if she runs for president in 2008.

In any generation, the disclosure of Foley's sexual overtures to teenage boys would have been a big story and ended his public career. But it was the confluence of new media trends and a trench-warfare mentality pervading national politics that turned the story into a round-the-clock furor.

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), fighting for his career amid allegations that he did not respond properly when told of Foley's e-mails, has gone to conservative media outlets to make his case. On Rush Limbaugh's radio show, Hastert agreed when the host said the Foley story was driven by Democrats "in some sort of cooperation with some in the media" to suppress turnout of conservative voters before the Nov. 7 elections.

Limbaugh offered no evidence. But the same accusation was leveled in Hastert's interview with Hugh Hewitt, another prominent conservative radio host and blogger, who said the speaker is a "target right now of the left-wing media machine."

Those comments are a reminder that a changed media culture that creates new perils for politicians also provides new forms of refuge. For a full generation on the conservative side, and more recently among liberals, ideologues have created a menu of new media alternatives, including talk radio and Web sites. New media have also elevated flamboyant political entrepreneurs such as Ann Coulter on the right and Michael Moore on the left to prominent places in the political dialogue. New media platforms make criticism of traditional "mainstream media" part of their stock in trade.

This development usually ensures that any politician in trouble can count on some sympathetic forums to make his or her case. It often ensures that any controversy is marked by intense disagreement over the basic facts or relevance of the story, and obscured by clouds of accusation over the opposition's motives.

Clinton benefited from this phenomenon during his recent showdown with Fox News. Appearing on a network that many liberals regard as enemy terrain, he said interviewer Chris Wallace and his bosses were distorting his terrorism record to carry water for conservatives.

Kerry advisers think the most important factor in his loss was the group Swift Boat Veterans for Truth, which attacked his war record. The group initially received scant attention in old media outlets, but its accusations were fanned by the Drudge Report, Fox News and other new media platforms. By the end, the accusations dominated coverage in both old and new media.

Each time a similar episode occurs, it is often covered as an isolated and even eccentric event. But Clinton, in an earlier interview, said his party should understand that the ideological and financial incentives among politicians and media organizations mean that every election cycle will feature such episodes -- and it should plan accordingly.

But he said Democrats of his generation tend to be naive about new media realities. There is an expectation among Democrats that establishment old media organizations are de facto allies -- and will rebut political accusations and serve as referees on new-media excesses.

"We're all that way, and I think a part of it is we grew up in the '60s and the press led us against the war and the press led us on civil rights and the press led us on Watergate," Clinton said. "Those of us of a certain age grew up with this almost unrealistic set of expectations."

Few conservatives would make a similar miscalculation. Many of the first generation of new media platforms, including Limbaugh's show and Drudge's Web site, first flourished because of a conviction among conservatives that old media were unfair.

All this has given Republicans a comfort and skill at using new media to political advantage that most Democrats have not matched. At the Republican National Committee, leaking items to the Drudge Report is an official part of communications strategy.

During the 2004 campaign, current and former RNC staff members said, opposition research nuggets on Kerry were almost always leaked first to the Web site. Sometimes they were trivial -- such as the fact that Kerry got expensive haircuts at the Christophe salon -- other times they were controversial quotes from his days as a Vietnam War protester. All together, these and other items contributed to Kerry losing control of his public image.

Ken Mehlman, the RNC chairman and head of Bush's reelection campaign, said his operatives leaked to Drudge because it inevitably drove wider coverage, including to old media organizations: "He puts something up and they have to follow it."

Last year, a delegation of RNC officials flew to Miami Beach, where Drudge lives, for a dinner at the Forge steakhouse to introduce the Internet maven to Tim Griffin, the party's new opposition research director.

One of those who salutes the changing landscape -- with as much passion as Clinton deplores it -- is Cheney, who said he considers the breakdown of what he called an old media "monopoly" as among the most favorable trends of his years in politics. He said the change requires politicians to grow a thicker skin. Once while shaving, he heard Imus referring to someone as "Pork Chop." Only after a few minutes did he realize the host "was talking about me. I'm Pork Chop. And I laughed like hell."

"Sometimes it's pretty trashy," he said of new media's rise. "But I guess I'd put the proposition that there's more time and opportunity for policy discussions and debate than there used to be."

The next several weeks -- in which Republicans will bear the heat of an intense media-driven scandal in the Foley case -- may test Cheney's faith in that proposition.

Tides Of Confusion Have Washed Up Mark Foley (WSJ)

By Daniel Henninger

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

Is this Mark Foley thing really happening?

I woke up early the other morning after a bad dream about Muslims routinely blowing up and torturing other innocent Muslims. You know the world has turned upside down when your dreams spill over with real problems and your working hours are filled with the most fantastic stories.

It's hard to believe that the Foley/instant message/congressional-page/GOP meltdown story has run for a week. Other than the slaughter in Amish country, is anyone aware of anything else of note in the world that happened the past seven days? Dive deep enough beneath the Foley flotsam and you discover reports that North Korea may be preparing to conduct an underground nuclear test. China and South Korea are at this hour trying to forestall the Hermit Kingdom's nuke test and no doubt could use an expression of support and outrage from the American political establishment. Sorry, they're busy reading Congressman Foley's 1995 email traffic.

We see also where Europe's envoy to Iran, Javier Solana, threw in the towel after "endless hours" of talks with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who on Wednesday told a crowd screaming "Death to America" that sanctions wouldn't stop Iran from enriching uranium. Whatever. The big news in Washington yesterday morning was that the House Ethics Committee sat down "behind closed doors" to think about Mark Foley.

We know when we're beaten. Bowing to the gods of the news cycle, let us undertake the great questions of the moment. Where does post-modern American ethics place Mark Foley's homosexuality on a scale of 1 to 10 -- a 1 being just another gay guy and a 10 being a compulsive, predatory sex offender? What might fall in between seems to have confused Denny Hastert, two newspapers, one TV network and the FBI. In the event, Mr. Hastert, as the point man, is being driven from office for having failed, in hindsight, to recognize the obvious.

On this score, Mr. Hastert has our sympathy. There is much in American life that doesn't seem "obvious" anymore. Call it the transgendering of reality.

This compulsion to ambiguity is the reason that both the politicians and the reporters writing about the Foley affair have been describing what the congressman did as "inappropriate." Inappropriate is the word you use when describing behavior that falls on the scale between 3 to 7. Mark Foley seems to be the kind of guy who runs up a high phone bill calling 1-800-SEX-GUYS. That might have qualified as a 10 some 50 years, but not anymore. Former Congressman Gerry Studds had sex in 1973 with a House page. He said it was consensual. Even now, this is a 10. In Florida, doing a 10 probably earns you a johnboat trip to the swamps. But in Mr. Studds's Massachusetts district, it earned him five more trips to Congress.

Mark Foley is on his way to oblivion after his 15 minutes of infamy. As luck would have it, the originator of the increasingly true prediction that in the future everyone would be famous for 15 minutes, Andy Warhol, was the subject of an excellent American Masters documentary a few weeks ago. It was impossible to watch this unsparingly honest account of Warhol's career and the era spawned from the 1960s onward without thinking about the culture we inhabit today.

Andy Warhol didn't create the culture we have today. He was merely among the first to recognize that the magic carpets were arriving, and always a fast learner, he knew how to ride them. Whatever older, earthly restraints on personal behavior existed, they were falling away fast back then. You could get away with things. So you did. And did. And did.

As a result, we live now in an era awash in cultural confusions. The tides bring in weird phenomena, like the Mark Foley story, leave them on the beach overnight, then drag them back out to sea before there's time to make much sense of what we saw. As often as not, we don't even try. The Web and digital technology have ramped up the cultural velocity to warp speed. MySpace, YouTube -- the once-bright line between the private and public spheres has evaporated.

This has had an effect on the way we think, or don't. Clarity -- thinking clearly -- is harder than ever to achieve, because clarity assumes a degree of general social agreement about things. For instance, time was that most people would agree that putting a crucifix in urine and calling it art doesn't qualify as anything but bad thinking. But no, we had to have a big argument over that. At the end of her current stage act, Madonna makes herself the central figure in a crucifixion scene. No problem. Most reviewers simply describe it, and move on.

Challenge over the past 40 years became a more powerful social value than clarity. One of the byproducts of challenge is that you don't have to think very much -- about the point or the consequences. Just do it. The act of challenge is its own justification. And one of the byproducts of constant challenge is aggressive confusion. Another seer of the Sixties, Bob Dylan, saw what was happening by 1967: "There's too much confusion here, I can't get no relief." Denny Hastert, meet the joker.

Looking back again at Ric Burns's Warhol documentary, it is hard not to see in retrospect the inexorable dominance over time of the cultural frivolousness that emerged in those years. Politics is especially vulnerable. A political culture -- the politicians and their attendant media -- that would allow itself to set aside everything else to spend a week with the Mark Foley "scandal" is frivolous. They look like dupes.

So the Foley comet hurtles forward, no doubt into the weekend, like some black star sucking all of Washington's loose debris into its vortex. Within hours of convening yesterday, the Ethics Committee issued nearly four dozen subpoenas. An 866-number "tipline" has been opened to solicit -- if one may use that word -- more page complaints about Mr. Foley or . . .

By midafternoon yesterday, a rumor emerged that in fact Mark Foley had been pranked by the House pages. It is the first plausible thing I've heard in seven days. Four weeks from the election, I have an idea: Let's fire the Members and replace them with the pages. We could do worse. We are.

GOP Bigotry That Backfired (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

Let's deal with the circumstance that dares not speak its name: How much of the Mark Foley scandal's impact is due to the fact that he's a gay man who preyed on young boys?

The basic story line -- powerful man exploits children -- would be the same if Foley were straight and underage girls had been the subject of his lurid attentions. But would the intensity of the scandal be the same? Would there be all this unseemly finger-pointing and hand-washing among the House leadership? Would Dennis Hastert be fighting to keep his job; would Christian conservatives be so apoplectic; would the whole Republican Party look as if it were on the verge of a nervous breakdown?

I doubt it. There would still be a scandal, but I think Foley's now-acknowledged homosexuality was crucial in turning a crisis for the party into a potential catastrophe. In a perfect world that wouldn't be the case, but you might have noticed there's not a lot of perfection in Washington these days.

It's tempting to put it all down to hypocrisy. The Republican Party has gone to such lengths to demonize homosexuality that it must pain the leadership to reveal that such a thing as a gay Republican congressman could even exist. The party has stigmatized gay people as "them," not "us" -- as a class of people whose "lifestyle" is unsavory and whose committed relationships must never be recognized, lest the republic instantly crumble to dust.

There had been warning signs about Foley's enthusiastic interest in young male pages for years, and the inaction of House leaders is just about impossible to explain -- either they ignored the situation, which would be an act of stunning cynicism, or they genuinely didn't know about it, which would suggest woeful incompetence. Not an attractive choice of stories to tell for a party that preaches so much about moral standards and personal responsibility.

Still, I don't think hypocrisy alone is enough to explain why the Foley mess is such a big deal. I think it goes deeper.

One of the central tenets of anti-homosexual doctrine is the notion of "recruitment" -- that adult gay people lure young people into homosexuality as a way of increasing their numbers. The most extreme anti-gay activists perceive a full-fledged conspiracy. The Traditional Values Coalition, a group whose homophobia can only be called rabid, goes so far as to claim that, after being enticed into sexual acts, the "young 'initiates' into the strange world of homosexuality are to be trained to reject the moral beliefs of their parents."

This is complete bunk, of course -- most new research has tended to support the idea that homosexuality is more a matter of nature than nurture, and in any event the notion of an organized "recruitment" drive is far beyond ridiculous.

There are people, though, who are not consciously bigoted against gay people but who find homosexuality difficult to comprehend. There aren't many things more primal and specific, after all, than an individual's sexual desires. For some people who have no base of knowledge about gayness -- and, often, whose pastors routinely denounce homosexuality from the pulpit as a sin -- the basic idea of recruitment, without all the paranoid conspiracy trappings, seems to explain the inexplicable.

Foley's lawyer explained the former congressman's behavior by saying that Foley was drunk and, by the way, had been molested by a clergyman when he was in his early teens. Was he laying the foundation for a possible legal defense? Or does Mark Foley, until this week still at least nominally closeted at age 52, actually believe that's why he's gay?

In any event, the recruitment myth helps explain why social conservatives, who make up perhaps the most loyal and energetic segment of the Republican Party's base, are so up in arms. And that outrage, in turn, helps explain why the party has been so frantic all week, so uncharacteristically slow to come up with a game plan for responding to the scandal. Social conservatives were already grumbling that the Republicans talk a good game but never get around to addressing their core issues. Now comes this.

In pre-feminist times, people thought of young girls as particularly delicate and vulnerable. We worried about their being compromised or corrupted by older men. It's fascinating that much of today's America seems to be more viscerally worried about young boys.

Online Gaming Had Ties To US 'super-lobbyists' (FT)

By Stephanie Kirchgaessner

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

PartyGaming, SportingBet and other online UK-listed gaming companies paid millions of dollars to Washington lobbyists linked to Jack Abramoff, the notorious super-lobbyist, to help them thwart US anti-gambling legislation.

Mr Abramoff's highly public fall from grace and conviction on criminal corruption charges this year – and the downfall of many of his associates – opened the door for the passage last weekend of a law that he and the companies staunchly opposed.

The passage by Congress of the Unlawful Gambling Enforcement Act has drawn accusations of US protectionism and the suggestion that the law was driven through by conservative Republicans.

However, lobbying records analysed by the Financial Times show that the companies were closely connected to Mr Abramoff and his team – the same men whose political ties, for years, played a central part in helping insulate the gambling industry from laws and regulations.

The demise of Mr Abramoff and his colleagues substantially weakened the gambling companies' political hand in Washington, paving the way for the bill's passage.

SportingBet spent $2.2m from 1998 to 2005 lobbying Washington lawmakers on issues involving online gaming, according to figures compiled by the Center for Public Integrity, which tracks lobbying, and other public filings.

Among other lobbyists, the company hired Tony Rudy, the former aide to ex-congressman Tom DeLay, and Neil Volz, a former congressional chief of staff. Mr Rudy has pleaded guilty to bribery charges in connection to the Abramoff scandal, while Mr Volz has also pleaded guilty to bribing Congressman Bob Ney, his former boss. SportingBet declined to comment.

PartyGaming, the largest online gaming website, initially declined to disclose who its lobbyists in Washington were, but when presented with evidence it acknowledged that the company was and is currently represented by Gibraltar-based International Interactive Alliance (IIA), a company that formerly had close ties to Mr Abramoff.

Although most of the public scrutiny of Mr Abramoff's wheeling and dealing in Washington has been centred on his work on behalf of Native Americans' gambling interests, records show that the IIA, which hired Mr Abramoff in 2003, was a lucrative client of the former lobbyist. Over one and a half years, the IIA paid Mr Abramoff's firm, Greenberg Traurig, $1.3m for Mr Abramoff's services. In all, the IIA has spent at least $1.9m on its lobbying campaign, and continues to be represented by Greenberg Traurig.

When asked directly whether PartyGaming lobbied in Washington through the IIA, a spokesperson for the company initially defended the IIA by saying it was an "industry group" with high standards.

"It has not been lobbying like the horseracing industry in that it has not put money into congressional races. [Instead, it uses] good old-fashioned talking to people and presenting the arguments," a spokesman said.

But in the exhaustive investigations into Mr Abramoff by Republican Senator John McCain, there is evidence that the IIA had a particularly close relationship with Mr Abramoff.

In 2003, the IIA transferred $1.25m to Greenberg Traurig, Mr Abramoff's former firm. According to congressional testimony, the payment was later passed on to KayGold, a company Mr Abramoff controlled.

Asked about the payment, PartyGaming said: "Jack Abramoff's actions made the IIA one of his victims. Hindsight is easy, if we knew what we know now, then we wouldn't have even taken Jack Abramoff out for a cup of coffee."

An Old World Close To A New World Horror (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

NICKEL MINES, Pa., Oct. 5 — As is customary in Amish tradition, guests brought food, not flowers. A hymn was read in 16th-century German, but there was no singing. The dead were laid in simple pine coffins and dressed in homemade white dresses, symbolizing purity. Two sermons were given, both in Pennsylvania Dutch.

Three days after a grisly attack on an Amish schoolhouse here, funerals were held Thursday for four of the five girls killed by a gunman who wrote of being forever changed by the death of his newborn daughter and driven over the edge by fantasies of sexually assaulting young girls. A truck driver, he was paid to collect the milk of local dairy farmers. Instead, he took their children.

The services were a somber close to a New World horror visited upon an Old World people. The first began at 9 a.m. in the woodworking shop of the father of a victim, Naomi Rose Ebersol, 7.

"We are here facing the unexpected," said one of the two Amish pastors who spoke and whose remarks were relayed by a Mennonite minister who attended, David Nissley. "We know and believe that these girls are in heaven with the Lord Jesus Christ." The man said the pastor read from the Book of Matthew about the importance of innocence.

"Unless you become like these little children, you cannot enter the kingdom of heaven," the pastor said, emphasizing the need for the faithful left behind to regain the purity and innocence threatened by the killings.

After the 90-minute service, about 300 men with long beards and women in white bonnets climbed into their black and gray buggies and clip-clopped in quiet procession to Bart Amish Cemetery. Along the way, they passed the house of Charles C. Roberts IV, the 32-year-old killer.

A few hours later, a similar ceremony was held in the barn of the family of the oldest victim, Marian Fisher, 13, who told Mr. Roberts during the attack on Monday to kill her and spare her classmates. And in late afternoon, the service for Mary Liz Miller, 8; and her sister Lena Miller, 7, started. Another victim, Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12, is to be buried Friday.

Mr. Roberts shot a total of 10 young girls. One was taken off life support on Tuesday and brought home to die, officials said. Two others remained in critical condition and two in serious condition.

At times, the tragedy was overpowering. On Wednesday, a stone-faced deputy county coroner, Amanda Shelley, described for reporters the blood on the walls of the one-room schoolhouse where the rampage occurred. But her composure dissolved when she mentioned a sign hanging beneath the chalkboard. It read, "Visitors Brighten People's Days."

Rita Rhoads, a midwife who delivered two of the victims, said that in the gatherings, in which coffins were open, young mourners were encouraged to touch the bodies.

"It is part of the realization that the person is no longer in the body," said Ms. Rhoads, a Mennonite who has attended many Amish funerals. "It's part of the reality of life."

In Georgetown, not far from the shooting, no one knew what to say about the man whose inconceivable actions were made only more confusing by his last words. Mr. Roberts, who ended his siege by killing himself, wrote in a suicide note that he was tormented by memories of molesting two young relatives 20 years ago. The police later interviewed the two women they suspected had been his victims, and both said they had never been sexually assaulted.

The news media intrusion was only one element preventing even a semblance of closure for this insular community, whose members have been comforting the family of the girl expected to die and traveling to Philadelphia and Hershey to visit the four wounded girls who remain hospitalized.

"This is an awful time because it keeps coming," said Philip W. Furman, an undertaker in Leola who serves the Amish community.

But the strain of having hundreds of reporters, photographers and their high-tech equipment descend on an area that often seems as if it is from an earlier century was apparent.

"I'd just as soon not give you any information about our culture to send out to the world," said Ammon Fisher Jr., who helped his father carve tombstones for the girls. 'What good does that do?"

Driving on Mine Road in Georgetown, an Amish man in his 20's swerved his large mule-drawn hay cutter toward a crowd of reporters. "We all wish you would just pack up and leave," he told one.

Yet, when asked about the killings, most people here seemed focused on forgiveness, faith and a determination to move forward.

"You think about them, you cry about them, you pray for them," said Lizzy Fisher, an Amish grandmother who is close to several great-grandparents of the slain girls. "And then you have to let go of things you can't explain."

Asked whether anyone in the community felt angry about the killing, Ms. Fisher seemed aghast.

"Oh, no, no, definitely not," she said shaking her head vigorously, standing behind a screen door at her house along Bachman Town Road in Ronk. "People don't feel that around here. We just don't."

Barbara Beiler, a friend of a pregnant teacher who was in the classroom but was released by Mr. Roberts, said the woman, whose name has not been released, had told her, "Even when the gunman was in the room, she felt like there were angels present."

"These are people," Ms. Beiler said, "with unshakable faith."

A Plain And Profound Farewell (WP)

By Joshua Partlow And Raymond McCaffrey

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

BART TOWNSHIP, Pa. Oct. 5 -- The train of wagons passed through town three times on the same grim errand. And still they were not done burying the girls.

The funeral processions for four of the five Amish girls killed in their schoolhouse left their homes in Bart Township on Thursday and moved down the same narrow streets to the small fenced-in graveyard on a little rise amid the fields.

The black-clad men and women, girls and boys, in the wagons did not stop and barely turned to look as they rolled past the flag at half-staff outside the post office and the crude sign taped to the sawhorse in a driveway: "Our thoughts and prayers to all the families."

The wagons, following the hand-crafted wooden coffins, kept going past the home of the man who caused the bloodshed -- Charles C. Roberts IV, or "Charlie" to his friends -- who bound 10 girls and shot them with bullets and buckshot Monday before shooting himself.

Few people but reporters and camera crews turned out to witness the somber parades. The morning broke cold, and a brisk wind ruffled the cornstalks and blew leaves off the trees. But town resident Jacquie Hess felt she had to watch.

"It's hard to accept what has happened," she said, standing outside the homes of Roberts and other relatives. "I feel sympathy for them. I feel sorry for them that it happened this way, that they lost children, also."

Hess is the aunt of Roberts's wife, Marie, and she is one thread in the close weave between killer and victims. Her family, including Charles Roberts, drove the trucks that carried the milk from the dairy farm of the Fisher family, who had three daughters at the school the day Roberts shot it up. One of the daughters escaped, another was wounded, and the third -- 13-year-old Marian -- was killed. She was buried Thursday.

In the classroom Monday, Marian was among those students who asked that Roberts kill her first and spare the younger girls, according to Rita Rhoads, a Mennonite nurse and midwife who delivered two of the girls buried Thursday. She cited an account from one of the survivors.

Marian's sister Barbie Fisher, 12, who was hospitalized, told relatives she recognized Roberts as the milk truck driver when he entered the school. According to Rhoads, she said Roberts talked to the students about himself and his anger at God -- an anger police said was partly fueled by the loss of his firstborn infant daughter nine years ago.

"He asked them to pray for him," said Rhoads, who has emerged as a leading spokeswoman for the Amish community.

Barbie said that the girls asked Roberts, 32, why he could not pray himself, but instead of praying, Roberts tied up the girls, who never screamed despite knowing their fate, Rhoads said.

"They just stood there with courage," she said.

Police said that Roberts might have been planning to sexually assault the girls but that there is no evidence he did so.

The day after the shooting, Hess, the aunt, visited Marian Fisher's father to offer her condolences.

"They were very caring and felt that we had a harder part to go through than what they did. And they had told us that there was no hard feelings, that all was forgiven. That we just keep pushing forward and asking God to help us get through it," Hess said.

Marie Roberts was invited to Marian Fisher's funeral, Hess said, but Hess didn't know if Roberts planned to attend. In addition to Marian's service, funerals were held for Naomi Rose Ebersol, 7, and sisters Mary Liz Miller, 8, and Lina Miller, 7. The funeral for the fifth slain girl, Anna Mae Stoltzfus, 12, was planned for Friday. Hess said there are no set plans for Roberts's funeral.

One additional child, who was not identified, had been taken off a ventilator, according to Rhoads, the midwife.

"The family was interested in taking the child home," she said. "It appeared to doctors as if she would die."

Most of the funeral ritual, from the services inside the homes to the burials, was blocked from public view by Pennsylvania State Police troopers intent on preserving the families' privacy.

A typical Amish funeral is set in the family home or barn and will include long sermons in German, along with German hymns from the 16th and 17th centuries that sound much like Gregorian chants, said Ervin R. Stutzman, vice president of Eastern Mennonite University in Virginia and dean of its seminary. He was raised Amish.

"There is a strong emphasis on what God's will is, that people are in a better place now. That God's will has allowed this kind of thing," Stutzman said.

There is typically a short service at the grave site, and mourners often participate in throwing dirt onto the coffin, he said.

"Even for just processing the trauma of something like that, it's very, very powerful," said Earl Zimmerman, a religion professor at Eastern Mennonite University who has attended Amish funerals. "It brings the community together."

The Amish deceased are usually buried in white, after the admonition in the New Testament's Book of Revelations: "He that conquers shall be clad thus in white garments." By custom, the grave is dug by hand by Amish friends and relatives.

As the first procession of 34 buggies passed down Georgetown Road on Thursday, a neighbor who declined to give her name began to cry.

"You learn a lot from [the Amish], how they deal with things," she said. "It's just amazing. It's not just words."

Randy Fischer, 52, who flew in from Minnesota to be with the Roberts family, said he had difficulty reconciling the man he had known with what he had done.

"I remember Charlie as a good man, a kind man, a man that loved his wife and family," Fischer said. "We may never know what truly caused him to snap."

"It's just a real sad situation all around," he said. "This is our own little 9/11."

Threat Shuts All Culpeper Schools (WP)

By Karin Brulliard, Lori Aratani And Tom Jackman

DOJ_NMG_0076495

CULPEPER, Va. -- The call came in to the Culpeper County communications center at 11:31 Wednesday night. The caller spoke in vague terms and named no buildings. But his threat, authorities said, was clear: Schools would be bombed.

By Thursday morning, school officials had shut the county's eight public schools, three private schools and four day-care centers, keeping more than 7,000 students out of the classroom for the entire day. Local and federal officers swept into the rural county, about 70 miles southwest of Washington, to comb each campus for explosives but turned up nothing suspicious.

Although it is not unusual for the region's school systems to receive bomb threats, Culpeper's response was. After a recent rash of small-town shootings that made it clear that any school could be targeted -- including an attack Monday on a Pennsylvania schoolhouse that left five Amish girls dead and five others wounded -- jittery school officials are acting with heightened vigilance to protect students and reassure parents.

Across the region this week, several superintendents visited schools and drafted letters advising parents to use crime tip lines and to talk to their children about school violence. School officials dispatched additional police to campuses and reviewed school security plans. In Front Royal, Va., a vehicle roaming the parking lot of a middle school was deemed suspicious by officials, prompting a 34-minute lockdown of all county schools. The all-day, countywide school closure was a first for Culpeper.

"With what's going on in our country today . . . the timing just really raises the alert," Culpeper Sheriff H. Lee Hart said. Culpeper public schools will be open Friday, schools spokeswoman Marla McKenna said Thursday night. She did not know whether private schools and day-care centers would be open.

"Naturally, every parent is concerned when something like this happens," said Brian Edwards, spokesman for the Montgomery County school system. "It's a reminder that we have to work every day to maintain a safe school environment."

The amplified attention to security comes after three recent incidents of school violence nationwide. On Monday, a gunman in Bart Township, Pa., lined up 10 girls at the blackboard of an Amish schoolhouse and shot them, killing five. On Sept. 27, a man took six teenage girls hostage at a school near Bailey, Colo., sexually assaulted them, then shot and killed one girl. Last week, a teenager in Cazenovia, Wis., fatally shot his school principal.

Bomb threats are phoned in occasionally to schools or district offices -- often during testing periods, officials said -- and police said they analyze each call to determine whether it is a credible threat, although the response varies by school system. In Alexandria, for example, if police think a bomb threat during school hours might be credible, "we quietly lock the school down, we send a lot of officers, and we do a comprehensive search" with bomb-sniffing dogs and other bomb detection devices, Sgt. Tom Magyar said.

In the District schools, unspecific bomb threats typically result in staff members making detailed walk-throughs before opening schools, said Theodore C. Tuckson, chief of school security in the District. Although he did not know the specifics of the Culpeper threat, Tuckson said he was "kind of surprised that they closed the whole system."

Although high-profile events often prompt systems to reassess their plans, school officials said, most planning occurs over time.

Working with police, area school systems have developed and honed sophisticated school violence emergency plans over several years, the byproduct of the bloody 1999 Columbine school shootings, the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and the 2002 sniper shootings, which paralyzed the region. State laws in Virginia and Maryland require such plans.

"What you do is you train continuously in preparation for what you hope never occurs," said John White, spokesman for the Prince George's County school system. "When these kinds of random acts of violence happen somewhere else, you hopefully can learn something from the response there in order to respond even quicker if you're put in that situation."

Some safety measures are high-tech. Fairfax and Arlington police have used digital cameras to photograph their county schools' classrooms, hallways and exteriors. Technicians link those photos to school maps, then copy them onto compact discs so officers can quickly prepare themselves before entering an unfamiliar area during a crisis, according to a publication by the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

Fairfax police used the technology in a mock siege staged at Centreville High School, in which officers were tasked with tracking down two armed men who were shooting inside the school, according to the chiefs association. Fairfax police declined to comment on their tactics or technology.

School officials there also use aerial photographs of schools and surrounding neighborhoods to map out ways to respond to threats. The system also has begun to add electronic locks at all elementary and middle schools. Staff members enter with key cards, and visitors must be buzzed in by a receptionist, who can see them on a video monitor.

Other techniques are simple. At several area school systems, police officers and marked cars are regularly stationed at high schools and some middle schools. Most schools require visitors to sign in at the main office and wear prominent tags while on campus. Schools also regularly drill students and teachers on what to do in emergencies. At Severna Park Middle School in Anne Arundel County, anyone entering the front door must get past a table staffed all day by parent volunteers.

Even with all the safety efforts in place, the recent spasm of violence has left some with a sense of helplessness.

"I don't know if having a table there makes us feel better or not," said Steve Anstett, president of the school's parent teacher organization. "The governor of Pennsylvania, he said something about random acts of violence, things you can't do anything about. And I understand exactly what he meant."

Kenneth S. Trump, a school security consultant in Cleveland, said he has received many e-mails recently from school principals asking how to obtain federal grants to improve their security. But he also sounded a warning: In his travels, he said, he has come across many schools that drafted emergency plans after Columbine but never updated, practiced or read them.

Seven years after Columbine, Trump said, he hears local officials say, "We never thought it could happen here."

In Culpeper, where some schools sit across the road from cornfields, parents echoed that sentiment Thursday.

At the Frost Cafe on Main Street, homemaker Kristi King sat in a booth with her visiting mother and her three school-age sons, who happily dined on pancakes and home fries for lunch at an hour they usually would have been at their desks. The decision to call off school was fine with King.

"Safety is a big issue," she said.

But she acknowledged that she was shocked Thursday morning when she tried to drop off her children at school and was turned away by officials talking about explosives.

"It's a little bit scary to think about what could have happened," King, 31, said. "It's coming further and further out of the city."

Schools Close After Bomb Threat (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

A bomb threat in Culpeper County, Va., forced officials yesterday to close area schools and cancel classes for thousands of students as police swept through buildings searching for an explosive device.

By late afternoon, investigators had found nothing harmful in any of the schools.

"You simply can't be too cautious," Culpeper County Schools Superintendent David A. Cox said yesterday morning. "The safety of our students and our employees is our No. 1 concern."

Officials said classes will resume today.

The threat was phoned in to the county's Emergency Operations Center at about 11:30 p.m. Wednesday. The caller did not mention a specific school, but did talk about blowing up schools, officials said.

"The individual had a lengthy conversation, and in this conversation he said he was going to blow up schools," county Sheriff H. Lee Hart said. "We do not know which schools, or his plans. We don't know a lot about this individual."

Sheriff Hart would not say whether authorities have a suspect but said they are following several leads.

Classes were canceled for 7,263 students at the county's eight public schools. Seven private schools and day care centers also closed.

The threat "didn't identify any specific school as a target, which is the rationale between closing all schools public and private," schools spokeswoman Marla McKenna said. "But it was definitely a bomb threat."

Culpeper Sheriff's officials were receiving assistance from Virginia State Police, the FBI, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives and other local agencies in searching the buildings and investigating the threat.

State police spokesman Sgt. F.L. Tyler said the agency provided resources including explosive-detection dogs, bomb disposal technicians and special investigative agents to assist the county sheriff's office.

"We're just providing assistance," Sgt. Tyler said. "They're handling the investigation."

The threat in Culpeper, which is about 70 miles southwest of the District, comes after a spate of deadly school shootings across the country over the past 10 days.

On Monday, milk-truck driver Charles Carl Roberts IV, 32, killed five girls and himself in a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Nickel Mines, Pa. Last Friday, 15-year-old Eric Hainstock fatally shot his principal at a school in Cazenovia, Wis.

On Sept. 27, Duane Morrison, 53, sexually assaulted six girls at a Colorado high school and held them as human shields for hours before fatally shooting one girl and then himself.

"The timing, what's going on through our country, is of real concern," Sheriff Hart said at a press conference yesterday.

Threats, weapons on campuses and rumors of violence have sparked alarm at other schools across the country. On Wednesday, six students at Pikesville High School in Baltimore County suffered minor injuries after being hit with shots from a pellet gun.

In Culpeper County, Mrs. McKenna said school officials likely would have made the decision to shut down the system even without the surge in school shootings.

"Even without all the recent episodes of school violence, we would have taken this threat seriously," she said. "I think the same determination would have been made."

Feds Name Web Site For Slain UND Student (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- A national sex offender database has been named for a slain University of North Dakota student whose mother worked for a new law to protect against child predators.

The Justice Department on Thursday announced the designation of the Dru Sjodin National Sex Offender Public Web Site. The site provides information about sex offenders throughout the country.

Sjodin's mother, Linda Walker, spent the last two years persuading lawmakers to pass the bill that includes the database. That portion of the bill is known as "Dru's Law."

Alfonso Rodriguez Jr., a convicted sex offender from Crookston, Minn., was found guilty in federal court of kidnapping resulting in Sjodin's death. A jury sentenced him to death last month.

Walker said after the trial that "Dru's Law" is a step in the right direction, but more work needs to be done to protect women and children.

"I think it has to stay in the forefront of our nation's agenda," she said.

Push On For Statewide Strategy On Gangs (MANUL)

By Stephen Beale

Manchester (NH) Union Leader, October 6, 2006

Bedford – New Hampshire law enforcement officials said yesterday they want a statewide plan to combat gang activity before it becomes a serious problem in the state.

"There's a little here and we're trying to address it before it becomes worse," said Thomas Colantuono, the U.S. Attorney for New Hampshire.

His office and the Department of Health and Human Services hosted the first state conference on gang prevention yesterday at the Wayfarer Conference Center in Bedford that drew about 300 law enforcement officials from across New Hampshire to hear talks on strategies they can use to clamp down on gangs.

Colantuono said that most gang activity is concentrated in cities like Manchester and Nashua, but it is popping up in other communities such as Dover, Rochester, Salem, and the Seacoast in the summer. He said the problem has been steadily increasing during the several years that he has been U.S. Attorney.

"What we hope will come out of today is the beginnings of a state strategy," Colantuono said.

That strategy will be a broad-based approach that will include law enforcement officials, community groups, and social services, said Clyde Garrigan, an assistant U.S. Attorney in New Hampshire.

"It is a wide-ranging effort to reduce gang violence," Garrigan said. "Simply prosecuting people, simply arresting people isn't a long-term solution." Community organizations, officials at the conference said, can help reduce the appeal of gangs to youths, while effective social services can remove many of the economic incentives that drive them to organized crime.

Garrigan is the state coordinator for Project Safe Neighborhoods, a $1.5-billion federal program created in 2001 that targets gun crime and emphasizes community outreach efforts.

On Feb. 15, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales launched a new nationwide initiative specifically targeted at gang violence, known as Gang Reduction Through Investigation and Prosecution, or Operation GRIP. Garrigan said that Project Safe would be spearheading the effort in New Hampshire.

"We're trying to get ahead of the problem-nip it in the bud, so to speak," Garrigan said.

The conference yesterday featured experts from the U.S. Department of Justice, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, and other agencies who spoke about gang culture and strategies other cities and states have used against the problem.

"I think it's opening up a lot of eyes among everybody here," Colantuono said of the conference.

Suit Says Neighborhood's Boom Was Built On Mortgage Fraud (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj And Julie Creswell

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

Even by the frothy standards of the housing boom, it was a great deal.

On May 18, 2005, a small Indiana company bought 184 duplex homes in a down-and-out neighborhood in northeast Indianapolis for an average price of $50,000 each.

DOJ_NMG_0076498

Less than a month later, the company, Land Economics, began selling the properties, which were built mostly in the 1940's, for $120,000 apiece to church secretaries, truckers, retirees and factory workers — sometimes as many as three a day to a single individual — all of them 577 miles away in Martinsville, Va. As recently as September 2004, homes in this neighborhood sold in a range of $20,000 to $65,000.

Amid the boom, those details hardly seemed to matter.

A week after the details of those suspicious transactions emerged — and the accusations by lenders and borrowers that they had been defrauded — federal investigators are still trying to sort out the scope of what some are describing as one of the largest cases of mortgage fraud in recent years. Countrywide Financial, which bought the Indianapolis loans soon after they were written, has filed a lawsuit seeking damages from Land Economics, its principals and others involved in the deals. .

The Indianapolis situation may prove to be the most vivid example yet of how the boom in housing has provided fertile ground for mortgage fraud, industry experts and regulators say. Rising home prices served as cover for quick-flip plans and an easy hook to recruit investors.

And the boom created incentives for the mortgage industry not to look too closely. As the appetite for home loans soared on Main Street and Wall Street, the industry came to increasingly rely on networks of independent mortgage brokers, appraisers and other officials to keep the lending assembly line well supplied. All had incentives to minimize hold-ups.

Still, the apparent inability of lenders to spot suspicious transactions is puzzling to some. Information about the value of the homes and the borrowers' modest financial positions could have been easily discovered had someone sought the information.

William A. Birkle, a county assessor in Indianapolis, caught wind of the home sales in the northeast neighborhood, Windsor Village, when a fraud analyst at Wells Fargo Home Mortgage called last year to ask him about them. When Mr. Birkle started looking into the transactions he was flabbergasted at the sales prices.

"It's just the worst neighborhood in my township," he said. "At one point in time, the police barricaded the neighborhood with concrete so there was only one way in and one way out so they could control the drug trade."

The mortgage industry has access to extensive property databases and sophisticated computer models that can flag potentially fraudulent loans.

Industry experts say databases can sometimes provide contradictory information. But they believe that the larger problem is that companies too often rely on the representations of mortgage brokers or correspondent bankers without seeking independent verification.

"It's symptomatic of a faceless origination process," said Arthur J. Prieston, chairman of the Prieston Group, a consulting and insurance firm that specializes in mortgage fraud. "As the industry has matured, we don't have the situation where you walk into the bank and the banker knows you and your family and where you work."

Countrywide, the nation's biggest mortgage lender, disputes that it did not do enough to detect any problems earlier, noting that the bank that originated the loans, People's Choice, was contractually obligated to vet and check the loans.

"Countrywide is a victim in this case," the company said. "We have a zero-tolerance policy against fraud, and dedicate considerable resources toward identifying and investigating possible incidents through our systems, technology and fraud investigation unit."

The system employed by Countrywide and other lenders has undoubtedly delivered a number of benefits by creating new kinds of mortgages, expanding access to credit for minorities and providing a boost to the national economy.

But the benefits have been accompanied by a growing amount of fraud, forcing state and federal regulators to scramble to get ahead of it. The Federal Bureau of Investigation estimates that mortgage fraud totaled $1 billion in 2005, up from $429 million in 2004 but still a tiny fraction of the $3 trillion mortgage business.

In April, the New York attorney general, Eliot Spitzer, announced the indictment of eight people accused of involvement in mortgage fraud that he said cost banks as much as $200 million during the five years the ring operated, primarily in Brooklyn and Queens and in Suffolk County on Long Island. In Atlanta, Chalana McFarland was sentenced last year to 30 years for a flipping operation that netted $20 million from 1999 to 2002.

The most profitable schemes are run by well-coordinated groups and include mortgage brokers, appraisers, real estate brokers and title agents. They require several things: unwitting borrowers, inflated property appraisals and lax oversight.

The person accused in the Countrywide lawsuit of being the mastermind behind the Indiana real estate scheme is Robert Penn, who, with his wife, Tamara Penn, operated a number of real estate holding companies, including Land Economics.

Though estimates vary, people with knowledge of the accusations say the scheme involved at least $40 million in loans, and possibly twice that amount. At least one other mortgage company may have suffered losses in the suspected fraud, which also involved more expensive homes in suburban Indianapolis.

Investors were lured in by a pair of Martinsville residents: Mr. Penn's mother, Beulah Penn, and his sister Sharon Penn. The two encouraged people to participate in what they called a real estate investment club, rushing them through the paperwork and telling them that they were signing loan applications.

Their applications were forwarded to another couple, Robert and Amy Pollard, who worked as loan officers and processors for People's Choice, a unit of People's Trust Mortgage in Kentucky, the lawsuit says.

As a "correspondent" banker, People's Choice made loans using standards and practices prescribed by Countrywide in hopes of selling them to the larger company. At the height of the housing boom, correspondent institutions generated up to 40 percent of Countrywide's loans; they now account for about 35 percent.

In the lawsuit, Countrywide asserts that the Pollards did not follow its underwriting practices. Borrowers were said to have significant bank account balances when in fact, those assets belonged to a company controlled by an associate of Mr. Penn, Countrywide's lawsuit says.

Mr. Penn also relied on appraisers to provide inflated property assessments and title agents to sanction and execute fund transfers, according to the lawsuit.

The Countrywide suit asserts that the company was defrauded of the difference between the true value of the homes and the inflated prices at which the loans were taken out.

In a court filing in mid-September, the Pollards, who declined to comment, denied Countrywide's accusations. Calls to Mr. Penn and his lawyer were not returned.

Douglas Grothjan, who worked at another People's Choice office until 2003, said the company did not monitor or audit branch operations. The company's chief executive, Jerry Connor, could not be reached for comment.

"It should have been mandatory that you take 10 percent of the loans and completely reverify them, order a credit report from a different bureau, an appraisal from a different company, send documentation to the people again," Mr. Grothjan said. "Good brokers do that. Jerry just churned out loans and people."

Most of the homes in Windsor Village were built for sailors and soldiers returning from World War II. The neighborhood is anchored by a former naval air installation that is now home to Raytheon, the military contractor. The neighborhood has a median household income of $27,000, and residents there owned only about 40 percent of its homes, according to the 2000 census.

Mr. Birkle, the assessor for the area, said he had given records for suspicious sales to the Marion County prosecutor's office, which referred questions to the United States attorney's office in Indianapolis. Officials with a federal mortgage fraud task force declined to comment.

As Mr. Birkle remembers it, the local prosecutor felt "we don't have a victim here."

"We didn't have these people from out of town saying, 'We were defrauded'; we didn't have the mortgage company saying, 'We were defrauded.' "

Another mortgage company, Argent, has said that it, too, bought loans in which Mr. Penn and his associates were involved. But it would not say how many it had acquired or when it had become aware of problems with the loans. "We are aggressively pursuing criminal and civil actions," said Chris Orlando, an Argent spokesman.

Mr. Matthews of the state bank supervisors's group said regulators and law enforcement officials deserve some blame for not tightening licensing requirements and pursuing fraud more aggressively. This week, his group and other state regulators said they would establish national standards for registering mortgage brokers, bankers and others.

"Crimes by the pen get a whole lot lighter treatment than crimes with a gun," he said.

Two Indicted In Alleged Walter Reed Kickback Scheme (WP)

By Ernesto Londoã±o

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

A former civilian employee at Walter Reed Army Medical Center and a Silver Spring man who did business with the center have been charged in a kickback scheme, according to a federal indictment unsealed yesterday.

The two-count indictment, handed up in federal court in Greenbelt, alleges that from 1999 to 2004, then-contract specialist Kevin R. Roach was paid to give preferential treatment to bids that Louis Pisani Jr. submitted for two companies. Typically, Pisani paid Roach about 10 percent of the value of the work the companies performed at Walter Reed, authorities said.

One of Pisani's companies, Platinum Contractors Inc., in Silver Spring, received a contract in 1999 worth more than $205,000 to do landscaping at Walter Reed, in the District. The other, Home Sweet Home Moving and Storage Inc., in Hyattsville, was awarded a $16,800 contract in 2001 to move office furniture.

Roach, 45, of Fredericksburg, received kickbacks in connection with other contracts as well, according to the indictment.

Pisani, 40, also sought to unlawfully influence Roach in an effort to win a contract worth as much as $1.2 million, prosecutors said.

Roach was paid in cash and checks and through the use of a Ford F-150 truck, according to the indictment.

Prosecutors are trying to seize $211,296 from the defendants, who are charged with conspiracy to defraud the government and obstruction of agency proceedings. The men face the second charge because they lied to Army investigators about the payments, authorities said.

Attempts to reach the two men at home last night were unsuccessful.

Pisani's business partner at Home Sweet Home, Leon L. Krachyna, is described in the indictment as a conspirator, but he has not been charged in the case. He was convicted of four types of deceptive practices in Montgomery County District Court in 2003, according to the county Office of Consumer Protection.

Whitey Panel Asks: Did Billy Help Brother After Flight (BOSH)

By Laurel J. Sweet, Howie Carr And Peter Gelzinis

Boston Herald, October 6, 2006

Former state Senate President William M. Bulger is caught up in an investigation into why a Senate court officer lied to a federal grand jury probing the 1995 flight of James "Whitey" Bulger.

In a fight that reached the U.S. Supreme Court, sources tell the Herald, prosecutors are actively pursuing whether William Bulger knows anything about a suspected support network that was meant to keep his fugitive brother in money and in "real-time information" about the manhunt for him.

Senate court officer Paul Dooley, Bulger's onetime State House aide-de-camp and campaign worker, has already recanted his false testimony before a federal grand jury, according to sources and court documents. It is unknown what Dooley specifically lied about.

According to court documents, attorney Thomas Finnerty, Bulger's ex-law partner and counsel to both Bulger and Dooley, "directed (Dooley) to commit perjury in testifying before the grand jury."

But it was Finnerty's refusal before a grand jury to tell prosecutors about attorney-client conversations he may have had with Bulger, 72, prior to giving Dooley the illegal guidance in the late 1990s that launched a legal war after the First Circuit Appeals Court ruled last year that Finnerty's communications with Bulger would not be protected in this case.

In his decision to uphold a 2004 U.S. District Court ruling compelling Finnerty to testify, Appeals Court Chief Judge Michael Boudin said, "Learning of the perjury, the government is now investigating the possible involvement of others with that perjury and with other possible crimes."

What Finnerty, a former Plymouth County district attorney, may recall about events surrounding Dooley's grand jury testimony "are matters assuredly of interest to (Bulger), given government suspicions of him," Boudin wrote. He noted, "The compelled testimony of (Finnerty) or other evidence could turn out to vindicate (Bulger) entirely and inculpate someone or no one else."

The attorney-client privilege may be pierced, Boudin explained, "where the client sought or employed legal representation in order to commit or facilitate a crime or fraud."

Boudin found reasonable cause to pierce the privilege between Finnerty and Bulger, while expressly making no finding that Bulger acted wrongfully.

In his failed petition for review to the Supreme Court - where justices earlier this year refused to get involved - Bulger's legal team argued, "The government's ultimate proposition - that (Bulger) used the privileged communications between himself and (Finnerty) to further a crime - could only be arrived at by piling inference upon inference."

It is unknown if Finnerty has broken his silence for prosecutors. He has not been indicted for telling Dooley to lie before the grand jury, an act Boudin called "corrupt." The South Boston resident continues to practice law.

Niles Mayor Indicted In Kickback Scheme (CHIT)

By Matt O'connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, October 6, 2006

Nearly four months after his arrest on corruption charges, longtime Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase was indicted Thursday in federal court for allegedly forcing village businesses to buy insurance from one of his friends.

The kickback scheme involved more than $420,000 in bribes, authorities disclosed.

Two others who were connected to the insurance agency were also indicted, and both are cooperating with authorities against the mayor and expect to plead guilty, U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald announced.

The indictment contained few new details beyond what had been disclosed in the initial charges in June when the mayor was arrested on his 79th birthday at his home in front of his family.

Blase, who has been mayor of the northwest suburb for 45 years, was charged with steering local business owners to buy insurance from Ralph Weiner & Associates in return for kickbacks from the agency for more than 30 years.

The indictment also charged Steven Weiner, 53, president of the insurance agency. Paul Zdon, 61, an employee, was implicated for the first time Thursday.

Weiner's lawyer, Jeffrey Steinback, confirmed that his client is cooperating and expects to plead guilty. Zdon's lawyer, Joseph DiNatale, said he expects his client to plead guilty and that he too has been cooperating with authorities.

Blase's lawyer, Harvey Silets, said the mayor intends to fight the charges and expects to be vindicated.

He plans to remain in office, Silets said.

Blase allegedly acted to benefit the Niles businesses that purchased their insurance through the Weiner agency.

The charges allege that the kickback scheme originated with Weiner's father, Ralph, a close friend of the mayor's, and after the father's death in 2005, Steven Weiner began delivering the monthly kickback checks to Blase.

The Weiner agency allegedly gave secretly about 25 percent of its commissions from the Niles businesses to a shell company controlled by Blase.

The charges allege that Blase, who is an attorney, used the $421,450 in bribes to pay the salaries of two employees at his law firm.

When one of the employees cut back his work schedule, Blase instructed him to share the kickbacks with a Blase relative who was an attorney at Blase's firm.

The indictment charged Blase and Weiner with five counts of mail fraud each. Zdon was indicted on three counts of mail fraud.

According to court papers obtained by the Tribune, Zdon had been secretly tape-recorded by an insider at the insurance agency who cooperated with authorities early in the investigation.

Niles Mayor Indicted In Insurance Scheme (BVND)

The Belleville News Democrat, October 6, 2006

CHICAGO - Four months after his arrest on corruption charges, the mayor of Niles was indicted in federal court Thursday for allegedly coercing businesses in this northwest suburb to buy insurance from his friend.

Mayor Nicholas B. Blase, 79, is charged with leading local business owners to purchase insurance from Ralph Weiner & Associates in exchange for kickbacks from the agency. Blase, who has been mayor of Niles for 45 years, was arrested in June.

The scheme, run over the last 30 years, involved more than $420,000 in bribes, according to authorities.

Two other men with ties to the insurance agency also were indicted.

Both the agency's president Steven Weiner, 53, and employee Paul Zdon, 61, are cooperating with authorities and are expected to plead guilty, according to the U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald.

Weiner's lawyer, Jeffrey Steinback, and Zdon's lawyer, Joseph DiNatale, confirmed in a story posted on the Chicago Tribune's Web site that their clients are cooperating and expect to plead guilty.

Harvey Silets, Blase's lawyer, said the mayor plans to fight the charges and remain in office.

Niles Mayor Indicted On Fraud Charges (CBB)

Crain's Chicago Business, October 6, 2006

(Crain's) — Niles Mayor Nicholas Blase was indicted Thursday on corruption charges, accused of accepting bribes and kickbacks from an insurance agency in exchange for using his position to steer business to the company.

A federal grand jury indicted Mr. Blase, 78, on five counts of mail fraud, according to a statement from the U.S. attorney for the Northern District of Illinois. He had been first arrested and charged in June.

Mr. Blase's lawyer, Harvey Silets of Chicago law firm Katten Muchin Rosenman LLP, said Mr. Blase "feels the charges are unjustified and he will be vindicated."

The grand jury also indicted Steven Weiner, president of Ralph Weiner & Associates of Wheeling, and Paul Zdon, a state-licensed insurance producer with the agency, on charges of mail fraud.

Messrs. Weiner and Zdon are cooperating with the government and are expected to plead guilty, the statement said.

The statement says that according to the indictment, Mr. Blase used his post as mayor to directly and indirectly steer Niles businesses to buy insurance from Ralph Weiner & Associates.

In exchange, according to the statement, Ralph Weiner and later Steven Weiner paid about 25% of the commissions from Niles customers to a shell corporation controlled by Mr. Blase called SMP Insurance Services Inc.

From 1997 to 2006, Ralph and Steve Weiner made and caused payments to SMP of about $421,450, according to the statement. (Ralph Weiner has died.)

The statement says that "as part of the fraud scheme, Blase allegedly took, and failed to take, actions in his capacity as mayor to benefit the interests of Niles businesses that purchased their insurance through the Weiner agency. Blase allegedly provided material information to Ralph and Steven Weiner and Zdon concerning the village's regulation of Niles businesses, and they, in turn, touted their ability to provide access to and receive favors from Blase to potential and existing insurance clients to advance their solicitation and sale of insurance."

Mr. Blase has been mayor of Niles since being first elected in 1961. He also is an attorney, running the law offices Nicholas B. Blase Ltd. in Niles, according to the statement.

A person who answered the phone at Ralph Weiner & Associates' offices referred questions for Mr. Weiner to his attorney, who did not immediately return a call. The person declined to take a message for Mr. Zdon.

$1,500 Check For Governor's Daughter Stirring Controversy In Illinois Race (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

CHICAGO - For months, Gov. Rod Blagojevich has been fending off accusations he bungled government programs and awarded jobs and contracts to contributors and cronies. But suddenly, one issue has cut through the clutter: a $1,500 gift to one of his daughters.

The check came from a lifelong Blagojevich friend, and it arrived soon after the friend's wife got a state job.

The governor has said he is unsure whether it was a birthday gift for one daughter or a christening gift for another, but he insisted it had no connection to the job. At the same time, he acknowledged asking his chief of staff to help the woman.

With just weeks to go before Election Day, the $1,500 check has gotten voters' attention in a way some of the other allegations - involving audits, contracts and bureaucratic procedure - haven't.

"People think, 'My kid never got $1,500; there must be something wrong here,'" said Cindi Canary, executive director of the Illinois Campaign for Political Reform.

Blagojevich, a Democrat running for a second term, got elected four years ago as a reformer promising to clean up state government, but his administration has been mired in controversy for doling out jobs and contracts to the politically connected.

The race is playing out against a backdrop of political corruption, with convictions at Chicago's City Hall, an FBI raid on Cook County's government offices and the recent sentencing of Blagojevich's predecessor, Republican Gov. George Ryan, to more than six years in prison for graft.

Blagojevich's GOP opponent, Judy Baar Topinka, is using the $1,500 check to paint him as corrupt. She is running an ad that shows Blagojevich fumbling to answer questions about the money. And at a recent debate, her supporters held up huge, fake checks and shouted, "Hooray for birthdays!"

While it is not illegal in itself for Blagojevich's family to accept a gift from a friend, it would be if the money was a thank-you for the new job.

The governor's office initially said the check was a gift for his older daughter, Amy, on her seventh birthday in 2003. Blagojevich later told reporters it might have been a gift for his younger daughter, Annie, who was christened about the same time.

Blagojevich said there is nothing odd about his close friend Michael Ascaridis giving such a large gift. At the same time, pleading a faulty memory, he would not say whether Ascaridis has given similar gifts in the past.

Ascaridis has told the Chicago Tribune, which first reported the gift Sept. 10, that the money had no connection to his wife's new state job.

"You can go buy her something, or a gift card or whatever," said Matthew Sardo, owner of a Chicago comic book shop.

Chicagoan Robert Douglas said he doesn't believe Blagojevich, especially given Illinois' tawdry history of political corruption. [continue]

Jeanine Up Creek On Boat? (NYDN)

By Greg B. Smith, Daily News Staff Writer

New York Daily News, October 6, 2006

There's no trace of a love boat in Jeanine Pirro's financial disclosure forms, but there are plenty of signs of her troublesome husband, Albert.

Federal prosecutors subpoenaed Pirro's disclosure forms to make sure she didn't claim ownership of the infamous boat, sources familiar with the ongoing FBI probe said.

Pirro was caught on tape discussing with disgraced ex-NYPD Commissioner Bernard Kerik about planting a bug in the 26-foot "family boat" to catch her husband fooling around in the summer of 2005.

The boat - named Cristine, after the couple's daughter - is in her husband's name, but her lawyer, Paul Shechtman, says it's really co-owned as marital property.

If the boat was technically not her property, investigators theorized that it could bolster their case that onboard intercepted conversations would be illegal - a contention that Shechtman disputes.

Prosecutors sought the financial disclosure records Pirro filed from 1998 to 2005 when she was Westchester County district attorney.

A review of the records obtained under the Freedom of Information Act showed no sign of the boat being owned by Jeanine or Albert Pirro. In fact, there was no evidence of the boat at all.

"I wouldn't have thought it would take a subpoena for financial disclosure records to know that the boat is in his name," Shechtman said.

Shechtman contends that Manhattan U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia's investigation appears to be focused solely on the discussion about planting the bug.

While the boat wasn't in the records, Pirro's financial ties to her husband showed up in numerous ways - even though she repeatedly says "I'm my own woman," and began filing income tax independently of her husband after Albert Pirro's 2000 conviction on tax fraud charges.

She and her husband also have co-owned a time share at an exclusive Marriott resort in Palm Desert, Calif., since 1987.

There's no mention of this on her disclosure forms until 2004. Pirro's campaign spokesman, John Gallagher, said Pirro was not required to show it, but decided to go "above and beyond" what the law requires.

A law firm that employed her husband also helped out in March 2002 when Jeanine Pirro tried her hand as an entrepreneur. She opened up JP Styles Inc., a distributor of homemade jewelry she designed.

The law firm Collier, Halpern, Newberg, Nolletti & Bock handled the incorporation. On her 2003 forms, Pirro noted that her spouse received income from Collier, Halpern. She described the nature of his work as "miscellaneous."

At the time, Albert Pirro's law license was suspended due to his tax conviction. His lawyer, Philip Halpern of Collier, Halpern, did not respond to questions about the nature of Pirro's work for the firm.

Police Search For Suspect In Shooting Of Two Sheriff's Deputies And A Police Dog. (AP)

(AP) A former nurse was sentenced Thursday to life in prison on charges that she killed 10 hospital patients with drug injections because she found them too demanding.

Vickie Dawn Jackson, 40, pleaded no contest on Wednesday and was sentenced after prosecutors presented their evidence to a judge.

Investigators believe Jackson injected the patients through their intravenous lines with a drug normally used to temporarily stop breathing when doctors insert a breathing tube.

FBI agent David Burns testified that the patients had been hospitalized for minor ailments _ including a foot sore, diarrhea or dementia _ and were about to be released.

"In general, they were the kind of patients who needed more care," Burns said at the sentencing. "I think that's probably why. They're verbose. They want this. They're thirsty. It seemed to make her angry."

Authorities became suspicious after nearly two dozen deaths were reported at Nocona General Hospital in late 2000 and early 2001, a stretch of time when the hospital should have seen only five to 10 deaths.

Authorities discovered at least 20 vials of the drug were missing. And officers searching garbage at Jackson's home found a syringe that contained traces of it, Burns said.

Jackson's attorney, Bruce Martin, said Jackson maintained her innocence and pleaded no contest to avoid a trial so her daughter would not be called to testify.

In a statement issued through her attorney, Jackson said she was "sympathetic to the families of the deceased" and "acutely aware that closure for them is necessary, if, indeed, closure can ever come for them."

John Fitch, whose grandmother Dorothy Vanderburg was 79 when she died, said Jackson had taken "the easy way out."

"I wonder if this is your twisted way of thumbing your nose at those of us you have hurt," Fitch said in court. "May (God) have mercy on your soul."

Prosecutors did not seek the death penalty, meaning Jackson would have been sentenced to life in prison if convicted by a jury.

The case was moved from Nocona, 90 miles northwest of Dallas, to this West Texas town because of publicity surrounding the deaths.

Former Newspaper Editor Pleads Guilty To Child Porn (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- The former managing editor of a LaPlace weekly newspaper faces up to 20 years in prison, a $250,000 fine and a lifetime of supervised probation after pleading guilty to two federal counts of possessing child pornography.

Five years is the minimum sentence for the charges to which Leonard Gray, 52, pleaded guilty, U.S. Attorney Jim Letten said Wednesday.

Gray, who worked for L'Observateur, was arrested when he showed up for what he thought would be a sexual encounter with a 16-year-old girl with whom he had exchanged instant messages over the Internet. The girl turned out to be an FBI agent.

Agents used that arrest to get a search warrant for Gray's Waggaman home and computer, where they said they found numerous images of children being sexually victimized.

Letten said Gray, who also worked for The Herald-Guide newspaper in St. Charles Parish, pleaded guilty Wednesday.

FBI To Probe Cissy Stuart Death (TTNJ)

By Kevin Shea

Trenton Times (NJ), October 6, 2006

The FBI has joined the investigation into the 1989 killing of Princeton Borough matriarch Emily "Cissy" Stuart, one of Mercer County's most notorious unsolved murders.

The agency has assigned to the case a top agent, Special Agent John Mulligan, a 19-year veteran and seasoned homicide investiga tor who was the bureau's lead agent probing the murder of Daniel Pearl, The Wall Street Journal reporter who was kidnapped and killed in Pakistan in 2002.

Forensic specialists in Quantico, Va., are examining evidence gathered from the home of the 74-year-old socialite using modern technology, profilers are analyzing the case and agents plan to start reinterviewing witnesses and sus pects.

Bill Evanina, special agent in charge of the Trenton FBI, said the bureau has resources that simply were not available to borough police and the Mercer County Prosecutor's Office the past 17 years.

"We believe we have solid ave nues to pursue in the investiga tion," Evanina said.

The killing of Stuart has baffled investigators since she was found stabbed in the back in the basement of her Mercer Street home on April 4, 1989.

The crime sent a shockwave through the Ivy League town and brought intense media attention. Stuart was active with the Trinity Episcopal Church across the street from her home, was popular in Princeton social circles, and was still active with the Town Topics, a weekly newspaper her husband, Donald Stuart, had founded in 1946 and her son Jeb Stuart edited at the time.

The borough has not had a murder since then.

"To solve this unsolved crime, all of the resources of the bureau are available," Evanina said yesterday. He said testing will include DNA analysis, "to see if any poten tially new DNA evidence exists" and the bureau's famed behavioral sciences unit is working the case.

"We have a list of suspects, of which some date back to (1989), and we are going to revisit them as part of the investigation to see if any new suspects or witnesses arise," he said.

While technically a cold case, the investigation into the murder is far from frozen.

Federico reopened the case in January 2003 while a captain and continues to work on it personally. He was the first officer on scene at the Stuart's Mercer Street home the day her body was found. To this day, the chief keeps a wanted posted from the case in his office for motivation.

In 2004, Federico told The Times, "Things have come up we did not know in '89...Things were discovered in this phase of the investigation that's led us in a direction we had not gone before."

Federico seized an opportunity to enlist the FBI last month when he met Evanina, who was assigned to lead the Trenton office earlier this year, at a meeting of the Mercer County Chiefs of Police Association.

At the Sept. 14 meeting, Eva nina made a presentation about how the Trenton FBI was starting a new violent crimes task force and one of its missions was to work cold case homicides.

Federico perked up, he said yesterday, and approached Evanina after the meeting and told him point blank: "I've got the hottest of the cold cases."

Since then the case has been a hot priority for both agencies, but still a joint endeavor. "We're not taking over the investigation, but we are getting involved to solve a cold case homicide," Evanina said firmly.

"I gladly, gladly, accepted their offer of assistance and hopefully with that partnership we will have a successful conclusion," said Fede rico.

Federico and Evanina declined to discuss the progress of the case in detail but over the years borough police have painted a picture of a sparse crime scene but one that yielded clues.

Stuart was found face down, clothed, stabbed five times across the upper back in a room in her cellar that had been padlocked shut. She was clutching her glasses. No weapons were found and her gardening tools were in neat order.

The door at the top of the basement stairs, in the kitchen, was also locked from the kitchen side with an old skeleton key. Police have theorized that someone familiar with the home locked it.

Investigators believe Stuart was killed two days earlier, April 2, after she was last seen tending to her garden in the rear of her home at about 4 p.m. on an unseasonably warm spring day. Family members searched the home several times from April 2 to the moment she was found, but apparently never went into the basement, police say.

Initially, police investigators fo cused part of their attention on a 22-year-old Haitian immigrant who had been charged with stabbing a Princeton Township woman in her bathtub around the same time. But borough police investigators do not believe any more that he had anything to do with the case.

A reward was posted by the Stuart family that eventually grew to $50,000, but after several years of investigating, which included the use of a linguist and a psychic, police gave back the money in late 1991 and admitted the case was growing cold.

Jeb Stuart sold the Town Topics newspaper in 2001. In 2003, after Federico reopened the probe, Jeb Stuart told The Times he does not speak about the case any more, offering only, "Been there, done that." He could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Emily Stuart also had another son, Charles Stuart, a documentary filmmaker who lived then and now in Massachusetts. He made a film about the unsolved killing, called "My Mother's Murder," that was broadcast on HBO in 1992. He also could not be reached for comment yesterday.

Case Dismissed Against Ex-JonBenét Suspect (USAT)

By John Ritter

USA Today, October 6, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Nearly two months after his arrest as a suspect in one of the USA's most lurid unsolved slayings, John Mark Karr was freed Thursday after prosecutors said they don't have enough evidence to try him on child pornography charges.

Judge Rene Chouteau ordered Karr to be immediately released from jail. He was not in court for the hearing.

Karr was briefly held in the 1996 death of child beauty queen JonBenét Ramsey but was cleared when Boulder, Colo., authorities said in August that DNA tests failed to link him to the crime.

He was extradited to Sonoma County, Calif., last month to face 5-year-old misdemeanor charges of possessing illicit computer images and had been in jail awaiting trial. The sheriff's department admitted it lost original computer evidence, leading to Thursday's dismissal.

The 41-year-old former schoolteacher, who jumped bail in 2001, ended up in Thailand, where he was arrested Aug. 16.

“Hasn't this been a colossal waste of the taxpayers' money,” said Laurie Levenson, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles.

Levenson says Karr now becomes “a headache” for law enforcement. “What I think everyone recognizes is that this guy on some level is a threat,” she says. “He's a threat, but he's not yet a criminal.”

The apparent mishandling of evidence between Karr's 2001 arrest and his return to California “probably happens more often than people think,” Levenson says. “It's an embarrassment, but it usually doesn't happen in a case under the limelight.”

Karr's lawyers had tried to get the charges thrown out and were asking the judge to bar evidence when prosecutors said they couldn't establish when the child porn images had been downloaded on Karr's computer.

"The impression that we've had all along is that the prosecution had every intention of getting this case to trial, regardless of the evidence," said defense lawyer Robert Amparan. "I am pleasantly surprised by them having done the right thing."

Even if Karr had been convicted of the charges, he likely wouldn't have served any additional time. Prosecutors admitted as much. Karr had spent six months in jail after his 2001 arrest before fleeing.

"We probably will hear from him again in some way or another," Levenson says. "Either the criminal justice system will initiate it or he will."

Thai authorities took him into custody after he wrote e-mails and made telephone calls describing how he was with JonBenét in her home when she died.

"Here's a guy who thrived at the world's attention," Levenson says. "It's very hard for me to believe that he's just going to go back to obscurity."

Judge Dismisses Porn Charges Against Former JonBenet Ramsey Suspect Karr (FINDLAW/AP)

By Kim Curtis, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 6, 2006

(AP) - SANTA ROSA, California-A judge dismissed child pornography charges Thursday against John Mark Karr, the former suspect in the murder of child beauty queen JonBenet Ramsey, after prosecutors said they did not have enough evidence to take the case to trial.

Sonoma County Superior Court Judge Rene Chouteau ordered Karr released immediately, bringing an end to his two-month odyssey in the U.S. criminal justice system after he was extradited from Thailand on suspicion of killing the 6-year-old beauty queen.

Karr, 41, was returned to California last month to face the five-year-old pornography case after DNA evidence cleared him of killing the girl in her Boulder, Colorado, home in 1996.

The misdemeanor pornography case fell apart almost as quickly, as investigators admitted losing vital computer evidence that was seized from Karr in April 2001 when he was working as a substitute teacher in Sonoma and Napa counties.

Defense lawyers tried unsuccessfully to get the charges dismissed and were seeking to have evidence barred from trial when prosecutors said they could not establish when the child porn images had been downloaded on Karr's computer.

"The impression that we've had all along is that the prosecution had every intention of getting this case to trial, regardless of the evidence," said defense lawyer Robert Amparan. "I am pleasantly surprised by them having done the right thing."

Prosecutors acknowledged that if Karr were convicted he would not have served any additional time in jail, because he spent several months behind bars awaiting trial in 2001. They said they were seeking to have him register as a sex offender.

Karr fled the state after being released from jail and had been on the lam until his arrest in Bangkok, which caused a sensation when he told reporters he was with JonBenet when she died.

Karr, who moved to California from Alabama with his wife and three sons, first came to the attention of Sonoma County officials after an informant told authorities about alarming e-mails he had been sending her.

Investigators looked at Karr in connection with the unsolved 1997 murder of 12-year-old Georgia Moses, whose body was found dumped along a highway in Sonoma County, Karr's lawyers said.

His arrest led school officials to strip him of his teaching credential, and his marriage ended in divorce later that year.

Serial Rapist Preying On Ariz. Reservation (USAT)

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, October 6, 2006

A serial rapist posing as a police officer has attacked at least 11 young women, mostly teenagers, on the Fort Apache Indian Reservation in Arizona.

The rapist, wearing a dark shirt and hat emblazoned with "POLICE," stopped each of the victims as they walked between two housing projects and told them they were under arrest, says Warren Youngman, assistant special agent in charge of the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) office in Phoenix.

He then restrained their hands and "took them to a remote area where he told the victims they were going to be met by a police car," Youngman says.

The assaults all took place between 10 p.m. and 2 a.m. The first was in March. The most recent occurred Sept. 6. All but one of the victims were juveniles, Youngman says.

Collette Altaha, a spokeswoman for the White Mountain Apache Tribe's vice chairwoman, Margaret Baha-Walker, says the attacks have raised fears on the reservation, which is near the New Mexico state line. “A lot of people are doing things differently,” she says. “I know of women who don't go on walks anymore. They're sticking close to home.”

Some parents aren't letting their children go out unless they're in groups or supervised, she says.

When the BIA learned about the attacks from tribal police in August, it created a special task force of police officers and federal agents to investigate, says Chris Chaney, deputy director of BIA's Office of Justice Services. The BIA is offering a $10,000 reward for information leading to an arrest or indictment.

The victims have described the rapist as a Native American man age 20 to 40. Investigators don't know if he belongs to the White Mountain Apache Tribe or if there are other victims who have yet to come forward.

Chaney says Native Americans suffer disproportionately from sexual assault. The rate of rape and sexual assault for the general public is two per 1,000 people, he says. For Native Americans, it's five per 1,000.

Residents of the reservation have become less trusting of police because of the nature of the attacks, Youngman says. “The community is cautious of people identifying themselves as officers,” he says.

Ohio Law Dodges Statute Of Limitations For Sex Crimes (USAT)

By Sharon Coolidge

USA Today, October 6, 2006

CINCINNATI — People who have never been convicted of a sex offense still could end up on a public registry in Ohio.

A law that went into effect in August targets alleged sex offenders who can no longer face charges or be sued because the time allowed for either action — the statute of limitations — has expired.

The new law allows prosecutors, the state's attorney general or alleged victims to seek to put a person on the registry.

Whoever makes the request must try to present enough evidence to convince a judge that the crime was more likely than not to have occurred. If a judge, after hearing testimony and reviewing evidence from both sides, determines that the abuse is likely to have taken place, then the alleged offender must register with the Ohio Attorney General's Internet Civil Registry.

No other state has a civil registry or is even considering one, said Blake Harrison, a policy analyst with the National Conference of State Legislatures.

The law creating the registry was a substitute for a proposed law that would have allowed people to file lawsuits in old cases that otherwise would have been barred by the two-year statute of limitations.

Hamilton County, Ohio, prosecutor Joe Deters is the first to test the new law.

In September, he filed a motion in Hamilton County Common Pleas Court asking that David J. Kelley, a priest who served at St. Therese the Little Flower in Mount Airy, Ohio, be ordered to register with the state's civil registry.

Kelley, who lives in Nashville, is accused of sexually abusing a student at the Ohio church's elementary school in the early 1980s, according to court documents.

“People deserve to know if they live near sexual offenders,” Deters said. “The statute of limitations may have expired, but this allows for notification.”

A hearing is set for Dec. 6. Kelley, who is on administrative leave from the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, could not be reached for comment.

“This raises a lot of questions for me,” said Jonathan Entin, a law professor at Case Western Reserve University who specializes in constitutional law and civil rights issues. “At least in criminal registries, there is some sort of formal determination a person committed a sex offense.”

Survivors Network of those Abused by Priests (SNAP), a group that lobbies for abuse victims' rights, supported the bill that would have extended the statute of limitations because hundreds of people who have claimed priests abused them as children are unable to file lawsuits or pursue criminal charges.

“I don't think it will work, and it won't deter the abuse,” Christy Miller, SNAP's Cincinnati co-leader, said of the new law. “These people won't be financially responsible, and they're not criminally responsible. All that will happen is their name will go on a list that nobody will see because nobody knows about it.”

The registry's creator, state Rep. Bill Seitz, said he knows it is controversial but said it accomplishes the same goal as retroactively extending the statute of limitations.

The Ohio ACLU's legal director, Jeff Gamso, called the civil registry troubling.

“It is a dangerous, troublesome law,” Gamso said. “This is punishment without the protection of a criminal proceeding.”

Jurors Urged To Heed Farmers' Market Witness Accounts (LAT)

By John Spano

DOJ_NMG_0076508

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

Jurors today were urged to believe dozens of Santa Monica residents who saw George Weller repeatedly turn the wheel, hit the brakes and accelerate as his car plowed through a farmer's market three years ago.

If Weller could see and steer, he could have stopped before killing 10 pedestrians, Deputy Dist. Atty. Ann Ambrose said in closing arguments in Weller's trial for 10 counts of vehicular manslaughter with gross negligence.

The prosecution of Weller, now 89, closed this morning in the courtroom of Los Angeles County Superior Court Judge Michael Johnson.

The defense in the three-week trial contended that the elderly man committed only "pedal error" — hitting the accelerator when he meant to hit the brakes — which caused unexpected acceleration and panic so extreme that he could not reverse course before leaving almost 1,000 feet of carnage along Arizona Avenue.

"The defendant is charged with driving his vehicle in a grossly negligent manner, for whatever reason," Ambrose said. She said the cause — pedal error, or running from a minor accident, as some witnesses testified — is unimportant.

Jurors should determine "what could he do on that day, what did he do on that day and what he failed to do as he drove to that market and through that market in taking the lives of ten victims."

"Whether or not you believe pedal error is the best explanation, it is only an explanation," Ambrose said. "The law doesn't say you can kill 10 people if you did it because you weren't paying attention because you stepped on the wrong pedal."

Ambrose projected large pictures of the dead and dying victims at the death scene, interspersed with the expression, "OOPS!", to reinforce her point that Weller committed a crime.

Defense lawyer Mark Overland was scheduled to close this afternoon, following a taut, well-organized prosecution presentation in which Ambrose urged jurors to trust their neighbors. She suggested that eyewitnesses at the market are more reliable than experts who only studied reports on the incident after the fact.

Ambrose liberally quoted a bevy of witnesses who said Weller was intent, calm, unconcerned and dismissive as he stood on the sidewalk after his car came to a stop .

In a statement hours later to police, Weller apologized and expressed concern for the victims, but "his attitude was one of complete indifference," Ambrose argued.

He spoke knowing at least eight persons had died.

"He's relaxed, he laughs, he laughs out loud at different times," Ambrose said. "He says 'those poor, poor people,' but he spends much more time talking about what [epithets] people called him."

"He spent more time reminiscing about the building of the 101 Freeway than he does about the people he left on the street, bloodied."

In a major victory for the prosecution, Johnson ruled that jurors will be allowed to reach a verdict on felony manslaughter, as well as the lesser crime of misdemeanor manslaughter. The former requires a finding of gross negligence, but the latter only common negligence or carelessness.

A lawsuit filed by a group of victims suffered a setback last summer when a judge ruled that the city of Santa Monica was not liable for alleged substandard security at the market.

Weller's $500,000 in auto insurance has been made available for victims, as well as more than $5 million in insurance coverage on several other public entities involved in the market's operations at the time of the tragedy.

Time To Judge The System In Domestic Violence (WT)

By Adrienne Washington

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

"You'd think that after everything that has happened in the county with domestic-violence cases that judges would take a little more time to think about these things more carefully," says an "outraged" Denise C. McCain, executive director of the Family Crisis Center of Prince George's County.

Ms. McCain was reacting to yet another death of a Prince George's County domestic-violence victim, who reportedly sought help from the court system before her boyfriend killed her and then himself this week.

"It's nonstop. It's unbelievable," Ms. McCain said. "I'm completely at a loss for words."

Not really. She found plenty with which to vent.

Ironically, Ms. McCain and Prince George's County State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey were on their way to appearances Wednesday morning to promote this weekend's public events highlighting Domestic Violence Awareness Month when they were confronted with the latest tragedy.

Jackie M. Lewis, 57, was killed by her boyfriend, Arthur Comer, 57, who then killed himself after calling 911 to come to the home the couple shared in Fort Washington, police reported.

Based on reports about the protective orders she unsuccessfully sought, Miss Lewis had tried to get Comer to leave because she was so frightened for her safety that she couldn't sleep.

As in other highly publicized cases in the county, Miss Lewis sought protective orders that were denied by District Court Judge Crystal D. Mittelstaedt six weeks ago. This plea for help was rejected twice by the judge, who has been on the bench for little more than a year.

Here's the rub: Another judge wrote on the first temporary peace order that he granted in August that Comer was "to be removed from [Miss Lewis'] home immediately." Yesterday, Mr. Ivey said he had not read the orders, but he cautioned against a rush to judgment about Judge Mittelstaedt's ruling. She has not commented publicly.

However, Mr. Ivey suggested that state legislators may want to reconsider changing the legal standards required for issuing protective orders and to find ways to make the judicial process easier for domestic-violence victims and their advocates.

"This is clearly a tragic situation," Mr. Ivey said. "We need to make a careful review to see if things could have been done differently to avoid this." For starters, Mr. Ivey and Ms. McCain agree, more resources should be made available to victims, including someone to help them navigate the system.

To deny the orders and then "send them out in the street without helping them to develop a safety plan is irresponsible," Ms. McCain said.

Domestic-violence incidents in Prince George's, second in the state only to Baltimore, have become such a hot topic that this month's issue of Essence -- a magazine geared primarily to black women -- published "The Secret Shame of Prince George's County."

The article presents a negative portrayal of the county, comparing its designation as the most wealthy enclave of blacks in the country with its high domestic-violence rates.

But Ms. McCain says the county, especially under the leadership of Mr. Ivey, may be a victim of its own efforts to address this issue, which was once swept under the rug.

The increased numbers of domestic-violence calls and cases can be attributed to more victims feeling safe enough now to come forward given the county's initiatives to reduce this problem.

After the brutal death of Ernestine Bunn Dyson, who was killed at her Oxon Hill home in March 2003 in a murder-suicide -- hours after her estranged husband's court appearance on domestic-violence charges -- county officials formed a task force that made recommendations that were put into place to help women and men seeking refuge from volatile relationships.

Mr. Ivey's office now has a prosecutorial unit devoted to domestic-violence cases. The sheriff's department instead of the police department handles all such calls now, and there is a special court to handle cases.

To further their public awareness efforts, Mr. Ivey has enlisted the help of the faith community with this month's Project Safe Sunday campaign, which begins this weekend. With more than 800 churches in the county, the prosecutor is asking them to devote at least one sermon to the topic of domestic violence.

Today, for example, Mr. Ivey and Yvette Cade -- the woman who was badly burned last October when her estranged husband doused her with gasoline and set her on fire -- will discuss domestic violence with a coalition of churches at the First Baptist Church of Glenarden.

Mr. Ivey was so upset by Mrs. Cade's case that he took the rare step of being the co-prosecutor.

Tomorrow morning, Ms. McCain's organization, which provides what little shelter the county offers for abused homeless women, expects about 300 people to participate in its annual 5K walk from their administrative offices at 3601 Taylor St. in Brentwood to the courthouse in Hyattsville.

"We can't keep [domestic violence] behind closed doors anymore," she said.

In view of this week's tragedy in Fort Washington, Ms. McCain expressed concern that cases are still not taken seriously in the criminal justice system. They need to "dig deeper, ask more questions" rather than accept what's presented on the surface, she said.

Most of all, Ms. McCain wants judges held accountable for what happens to domestic-violence victims. Insensitive judges such as Richard A. Palumbo, who was forced into retirement after the Cade case, "don't get it," as Ms. McCain said.

But Mr. Ivey acknowledges that throughout the judicial and legislative systems, "We still have work to do."

Ms. McCain asked, "What's it going to take? More women like Jackie Lewis losing their lives?"

For more information about the Family Crisis Center walk, call 301/779-2100 or go to www.familycrisiscenter-pgco.org. For more information about Project Safe Sunday, call 301/952-3933. The national hot line for domestic violence is 800/799-7233.

Emergency Medical Settles Probe Of Ambulance Billing (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Cary O'Reilly

Bloomberg, October 6, 2006

Oct. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Emergency Medical Services Corp., a supplier of ambulance services in 36 states, agreed to pay $9 million to settle U.S. claims it gave discounts to medical facilities in exchange for referrals.

The settlement relates to allegations that a unit of the Greenwood, Colorado-based company offered discounts to Texas hospitals in exchange for referrals on ambulance transports of patients being discharged, which were billed to Medicare.

The Justice Department sued AMR, accusing it of unlawfully providing the discounted transportation from 1994 through 2001. Under terms of the settlement, AMR will enter into a corporate integrity agreement to prevent such activity in the future.

``Illegal inducements corrupt the integrity of the Medicare program by freezing out competitors, masking the true costs of services, and misdirecting program funds,'' said Assistant U.S. Attorney General Peter D. Keisler, in a statement.

The settlement arose out of ``whistleblower'' lawsuits filed in 2000 and 2001 by two former AMR employees, Daniel Block and Adam Wightman. Under the False Claims Act, private individuals or firms can file suit on behalf of the government and may share in the recovery. As a result of today's settlement, the two men will receive $1.62 million.

The incidents investigated at Emergency Medical's American Medical Response unit occurred before 2002 when it was under different ownership, Emergency Medical said in a statement.

``AMR cooperated fully with the government during the course of its inquiry into prior conduct of the company,'' Chief Executive Officer William Sanger said. ``We believe it is in AMR's best interest to put this matter behind us.''

Sanger has been making acquisitions to expand in the markets for ambulance services and emergency room staffing. The company completed the acquisition of Air Ambulance Specialists, a manager of medical transport services on airplanes, in July.

Emergency Medical, which posted net income of $18 million in the six months ended June 30, said it set aside money for the settlement in previous reporting periods. A ``significant portion'' was indemnified by AMR's prior owner, it said.

Shares of Emergency Medical fell 5 cents to $16.40 in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange. They have risen 25 percent since the company first sold stock in December.

AP, October 6, 2006

DALLAS — One of the nation's largest ambulance providers is paying the federal government more than $9 million to settle charges that it offered kickbacks to Texas hospitals in exchange for referrals, the Justice Department said Thursday.

Two former employees who raised allegations against the ambulance company will get $1.62 million in the settlement.

The government alleged that Greenwood Village, Colo.-based American Medical Response provided or offered inducements to Texas hospitals in contracts known as "swapping arrangements."

The arrangements gave discounts to the hospitals in exchange for referrals for transporting patients who were being discharged, the Justice Department said. The ambulance rides were billed to Medicare.

"Illegal inducements corrupt the integrity of the Medicare program by freezing out competitors, masking the true costs of services, and misdirecting program funds, among other things," said Assistant Attorney General Peter D. Keisler of the department's civil division.

American Medical Response said it didn't admit wrongdoing and that the company's prior owner agreed to pay "a significant portion" of the settlement.

Chairman and Chief Executive William A. Sanger said the company was pleased to settle the matter and had cooperated with the government.

Shares of American Medical's parent, Emergency Medical Services Corp., fell 5 cents, to $16.40, in trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

Two former employees of the ambulance company will share in the settlement. They filed whistleblower lawsuits in 2000 and 2001.

Under the federal False Claims Act, private individuals or firms can sue on behalf of the government and share in the recovery.

AP, October 6, 2006

(AP) - TOKYO-A Tokyo court on Thursday rejected an appeal by the U.S. government seeking compensation from Japanese companies over the alleged rigging of bids in dozens of construction projects at a U.S. Navy base.

The Tokyo High Court dismissed Washington's appeal against 13 Japanese construction companies, upholding a lower court decision in 2002 that the U.S. government failed to prove the contractors were selected as a result of bid-rigging, a court spokeswoman said on condition of anonymity, citing protocol.

The U.S. government initially filed the lawsuit in 1994 with the Tokyo District Court against 53 Japanese construction companies, demanding 680 million yen (US$5.7 million; â‚¬4.5 million).

Washington accused the companies of inflating costs for nearly 100 construction projects at Atsugi base, southwest of Tokyo, by allegedly rigging bids from 1984 through 1990. The U.S. later dropped its claim against most of the companies after reaching separate settlements.

The Japanese contractors had denied the allegations.

Bid-rigging scandals constantly surface in Japan, which has long been criticized for virtually excluding foreign competitors from public works projects.

In a separate case, another court in July sentenced a Japanese defense official to 18 months in prison and two others to suspended sentences for rigging bids on construction projects at U.S. bases in 2004-2005.

Disability Rights In The Middle Of Difficult Journey (MINNST)

By Dan Browning, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 6, 2006

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says disability rights have come a long way, but not nearly far enough.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales praised executives attending a Minneapolis conference on disabled workers Thursday for recognizing the skills and marketing opportunities in the disabled community.

The Justice Department is committed to ensuring that everyone has an opportunity to succeed, regardless of "the circumstances of birth or the challenges of life," said Gonzales, who grew up poor in Texas.

Considerable progress has been made since the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) was signed in 1990, Gonzales told about 300 people attending the ninth annual conference of the U.S. Business Leadership Network at the Marriott Hotel. "But we are not done by a long shot."

The group promotes best employment practices and job opportunities for workers with disabilities. More than 400 disabled high school and college students attended a career fair Wednesday at the conference center. Gonzales praised company mentors for recognizing a good opportunity.

"You appreciate the business case for tapping into the disability market and bringing on board qualified men and women whose abilities and perspectives will help your businesses succeed," he said.

And he congratulated the students for their fortitude, commitment to excellence and dedication to getting the kind of experience that will help them contribute to the community.

Gonzales said he wanted to remind everyone about the kind of people they were there to help. Justin Tokioka, a 10-year-old, profoundly deaf boy whom everyone calls Pono, played second base on a community baseball team in Lihue, Hawaii.

"Pono had excelled at second base with the assistance of a sign-language interpreter in the dugout," Gonzales said. "But when he traveled to the state all-star's tournament last summer, Pono was told the tournament rules prohibited the team from having an interpreter in the dugout.

"I could tell you from my experience playing baseball as a young boy that even something that might seem so small can make a tremendous difference in a young boy's life," Gonzales said.

The Department of Justice negotiated a settlement in August with Pony Baseball Inc., which has about 3,500 leagues nationwide. Pono played in the all-star tournament this summer, Gonzales said. "He played very well."

U.S. Gets Agencies To Adapt For Disabled (AP)

By Joshua Freed, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 6, 2006

In nine of every 10 cases, the Justice Department forced government agencies and businesses to comply with federal disability laws during the past five years by using mediation and not imposing penalties.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Thursday that 1,800 complaints out of 2,000 cases involving the Americans With Disabilities Act had been settled through mediation. The department's civil rights division also settled 151 such cases against state and local governments.

"We have accomplished this through an aggressive program of enforcement and public education," Gonzales said at the annual conference of the U.S. Business Leadership Network, which promotes employment of people with disabilities.

Gonzales cited as an example the case of 10-year-old Justin Tokioka, a deaf baseball player from Hawaii who played second base with the help of a sign-language interpreter in the dugout. Justin, nicknamed Pono, was told he could not use a sign-language interpreter during a tournament last year. The youth baseball association running the tournament finally agreed to allow him the use of one.

"I can tell you, from my own experience playing baseball when I was young, that even something that might seem so small can make a tremendous difference in a young boy's life," Gonzales said.

The cases were pursued under a Bush administration initiative to improve the access that people with disabilities have to theaters, sport venues, hotels and other destinations where large numbers of people gather.

It is also taking steps to ensure more cities and counties make their public spaces and services accessible to disabled people. Those include making cuts into sidewalk curbs for wheelchairs, allowing guide dogs for the blind in shelters and installing test telephone systems for deaf people making 911 calls.

In Hennepin County, Minn., which includes Minneapolis, local officials agreed to provide a sign language interpreter for deaf people who are undergoing chemical dependancy treatment and other programs. Anne Arundel County in Maryland agreed to improve services for the deaf and hard of hearing in its two jails.

The report did include a few cases in which offenders faced penalties, including one where movie theater chain AMC Entertainment had to pay $100,000 in damages to customers discriminated against because of access problems.

The carrot-and-stick approach had some wishing for a little more stick, though.

"I think there's room for more enforcement, but I'm very pleased with the cases they have taken," said John Kemp, a Washington lawyer who has worked on disabilities law for more than 30 years and heard Gonzales present his report.

Family Of Man Killed After Deputy Shooting Wants Investigation (AP)

By Phil Davis, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 6, 2006

The family of a man who killed a Polk County sheriff's deputy and was subsequently riddled with 68 bullets called on Florida Gov. Jeb Bush Thursday to order an independent investigation of the shooting.

Nine SWAT officers fired a total of 110 bullets at 27-year-old Angilo Freeland last week after he fatally shot a Polk County deputy and his dog and wounded another deputy after fleeing from a traffic stop.

"This is not about a lawsuit. Nobody is suing anybody," the family's attorney, Grady Irvin, said at a Thursday afternoon new conference. "What this is all about is this death is uncommon in the means and manner by which Mr. Freeland died - 68 bullet holes. His family just wants to put this issue to rest and they want a search for the truth, that's all."

An Orlando-based civil rights group also on Thursday called on U.S. Attorney Alberto Gonzales to look into the circumstances surrounding Freeland's death.

Irvin said race isn't an issue in the shooting. But he was concerned by Polk County Sheriff's Grady Judd's tough talk to reporters before and after Freeland's death.

"I suspect the only reason 110 rounds was all that was fired was that's all the ammunition they had," Judd said after Freeland's death. "We were not going to take any chance of him shooting back."

Freeland's mother, Janice, and two siblings, Nikki and Corey, stood beside the lawyer in a Tampa law office, but made only brief remarks.

"On behalf of our family, I would like to publicly express our sympathy for the losses of the families and the people of Polk County have suffered," she said. "We do not condone the killing of anyone. Any wrong committed by my son does not have the blessing of me and my family. All we want is for all questions surrounding why this happened to be answered."

Irvin said the family had not seen Freeland's body, which was picked up from the morgue Thursday, because it was so badly mangled by the bullets.

"There were bullet holes everywhere," Irvin said, noting one of Freeland's hands was shot off. "They were in his head. In his face. I understand he had perfect teeth. Those were unbelievable when I saw them."

Kristy Campbell, a spokeswoman for Gov. Bush, said the office had not received any request from the Freeland family late Thursday. She said it would be "premature" for the governor to order an investigation while the Polk County Sheriff's Office and the Florida Department of Law Enforcement are still reviewing the shooting.

On Sept. 28, Deputy Vernon "Matt" Williams, 39, and his dog were shot while pursuing Freeland, who fled from a traffic stop. Deputy Doug Speirs, also 39, was shot in the leg moments later during an exchange of gunfire with Freeland.

Williams was shot eight times, including one shot fired at close range to his temple and another behind his ear, authorities said. Diogi was shot once.

Freeland also traded shots with Lakeland police officers.

The shootings triggered a massive manhunt with more than 500 officers converging on the area from around the state. The all-night manhunt ended almost 24 hours later when a SWAT team fatally shot Freeland 68 times.

Authorities later said the nine SWAT officers fired a total of 110 rounds at Freeland. He had been hiding under a log not far from where Williams was killed a day earlier.

Williams was mourned by more than 4,500 people at his funeral Tuesday.

Case Goes To Justice Department (WP)

City Targets Latinos in Crowding Enforcement, Complaints Allege

Federal housing officials who claim that a campaign by Manassas against crowded housing has illegally targeted Hispanic families have turned their investigation over to the Justice Department, saying the city has failed to adequately settle complaints.

"We made an extensive effort to resolve the matter, but it was unsuccessful," said Bryan Greene, the deputy assistant secretary for enforcement and programs at the Department of Housing and Urban Development. "We conducted a full investigation and attempted to conciliate with many parties involved, which included many individuals, civil rights groups and the City of Manassas. In the end, conciliation has failed."

The investigation focused on anti-crowding measures initiated by the city over the past two years. Those included a hotline that allowed residents to anonymously file a complaint about neighbors they suspected of violating city ordinances and a measure passed by the City Council in December that essentially banned extended family members from living together by narrowing the legal definition of "family." That ordinance was repealed in January under threats from civil rights groups and concerns about a federal investigation.

Although HUD cannot bring charges against a municipality under the Fair Housing Act, it can forward cases to the Department of Justice for possible litigation if the agency's investigation does not produce an agreement "and provide relief to the aggrieved people," Greene said.

Eleven complaints have been forwarded to the Department of Justice -- eight from Manassas residents, two from civil rights organizations and one from HUD, Greene said. The complaints allege that Manassas has illegally targeted the city's growing Hispanic population for selective enforcement of its zoning laws.

Greene said HUD opened its investigation in January after published reports detailed the city's anti-crowding efforts, which included an enforcement officer who made visits at night to homes and informed residents that aunts, uncles, cousins and other extended family members could not share the same residence, regardless of whether occupancy limits had been exceeded.

Greene said HUD has sent letters to city officials and others involved notifying them of the decision, but city manager Lawrence D. Hughes said officials have yet to receive notification and could not comment.

"We didn't realize conciliation had failed," Hughes said.

"I'm not sure how they draw conclusions like that," he added. "We just need to see what HUD communicates to us and where the process goes from here."

Manassas City Attorney Robert W. Bendall told the city council last week that the investigation had stalled because a changing cast of investigators was going over similar ground and repeating questions. Bendall was unavailable yesterday for comment.

Lawyers who have been monitoring the case said that HUD's decision was a "serious" matter.

"An investigation of this magnitude will certainly get the attention of the [Department of Justice] and means it's more likely that they will proceed with a lawsuit," said Kent Willis, executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Virginia, one of the groups that threatened to sue the city after it passed its anti-crowding ordinance.

DOJ_NMG_0076514

"If the judge or jury determines that the City of Manassas conspired to discriminate against Latino families, the punitive damages could be hefty."

Willis added that a federal lawsuit also raised the possibility that individual parties could bring civil suits against the city.

According to HUD, 342 complaints were made to the city's "overcrowding hotline" before the investigation began, and more than half turned up no violations.

Of the 145 calls that resulted in violations, 71 percent involved families with Hispanic surnames, although only 15 percent of the city's population is Hispanic, according to 2000 Census data.

Department of Justice spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said the agency would review the case and determine how to proceed but would not comment on the possibility of a federal suit.

EEOC Moves To Stem Decline In Disabled Workforce (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission plans to sponsor educational events and seminars aimed at reversing the steady decline in the number of federal employees with severe disabilities.

The agency this week launched a special section on its Web site (http://www.eeoc.gov/initiatives/lead), where announcements and information on federal hiring of the disabled will be posted. The initiative -- Leadership for the Employment of Americans With Disabilities, or LEAD -- will be headed by EEOC Commissioner Christine M. Griffin .

"In order to improve the overall employment rate for people with targeted disabilities, we have to begin with the federal government," Griffin said in a statement. "Congress directed the federal government to set the example for all other employers. Our example needs improvement."

People with severe disabilities have dropped to less than 1 percent of the full-time federal workforce, according to data released by the EEOC in June. Targeted disabilities include blindness, deafness, paralysis, mental retardation, mental illness, convulsive disorders, and distortion of limbs or the spine.

About 10 percent of U.S. residents have a severe disability, according to the Department of Health and Human Services.

From fiscal 2001 to 2005, disabled federal employees left the government at more than twice the rate at which they were hired, the EEOC said.

Data suggest that federal employment of the disabled peaked in fiscal 1994, when there were 31,337 such employees in government. By 2005, the number of severely disabled workers had dropped to 24,086, the EEOC said. The federal workforce has remained relatively stable, at about 1.8 million, over the past two decades.

Experts do not know what accounts for the decline, in part because of a lack of research and data. Some suggest that more disabled workers are retiring, as the baby-boom generation leaves the workforce. Some think that federal hiring practices work against the disabled, and some think the private sector has opened more doors to the disabled over the past decade.

The EEOC said LEAD will try to increase awareness among federal hiring officials about the drop-off in employment of the disabled and educate agencies on how to use special rules to bring the disabled on board.

LEAD also will seek to educate job applicants with severe disabilities on how to apply under the special rules.

Focus groups will be set up with federal hiring officials, managers and experts to explore the issue of declining employment of the disabled, the EEOC said.

The 1973 Rehabilitation Act banned discrimination against people with disabilities in federal hiring and required agencies to develop affirmative-action plans to hire and promote more people with disabilities.Retirements

Robert F. Lake , an airspace specialist for the National Guard Bureau, retired Oct. 1 after 30 years of federal service.

Rosemarie Tolson , a technology specialist with the Transportation Department's office of the inspector general, will retire Oct. 13 after 36 years of federal service. She spent 32 years at the State Department in various offices.

Tim Twinam , a program manager and contracting representative for technology at the CIA, retired Sept. 29 after 31 years of federal service.Talk Shows

Mark Maxin and Chris Kuczynski , experts on the 1990 Americans With Disabilities Act and the 1973 Rehabilitation Act, will be the guests on "FEDtalk" at 11 a.m. today on Federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

David Bowen , chief information officer at the Federal Aviation Administration, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

State Ban On Same-Sex Marriage Upheld (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0076515

By Maura Dolan
The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — A state appeals court today upheld a ban on same-sex marriages, ruling that only the Legislature or voters can change California's traditional definition of marriage.

"Courts simply do not have the authority to create new rights, especially when doing so involves the definition of so fundamental an institution as marriage," Presiding Justice William McGuiness wrote for the majority.

"The time may come when California chooses to expand the definition of marriage to encompass same-sex unions," he added. "That change must come from democratic processes, however, not by judicial fiat."

Justice J. Anthony Kline, in a dissent, complained that the ruling diminished "the humanity of the lesbians and gay men whose rights are defeated."

The ruling is expected to be appealed to the California Supreme Court.

Gay Marriage Dealt Defeat In California (AP-Y)

By Lisa Leff
AP, October 5, 2006

A state appeals court upheld California's ban on gay marriage Thursday, a critical defeat for a movement hungry for a win after similar losses in two other states.

In reversing the March 2005 ruling of a San Francisco trial judge, the 1st District Court of Appeal agreed with the state's attorney general, who argued it is up to the Legislature, not the courts, to change the traditional definition of marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

"We conclude California's historical definition of marriage does not deprive individuals of a vested fundamental right or discriminate against a suspect class," the court said in a 2-1 decision. "The time may come when California chooses to expand the definition of marriage to encompass same-sex unions. That change must come from democratic processes, however, not by judicial fiat."

The justices, in their 128-page opinion, noted that California's ban on same-sex marriage does not discriminate against gays and lesbians because of the state's strong domestic partner law, which gives registered couples most of the same rights as married spouses in California.

The ruling does not guarantee, however, that same-sex couples will not ultimately be able to get married in California. Gay marriage advocates said beforehand that they would appeal to the California Supreme Court if the intermediate court did not decide in their favor.

"Though we are disappointed, we always knew this issue was going to be decided by the California Supreme Court," said Molly McKay, a spokeswoman for Marriage Equality USA. "We believe that the California Supreme Court will enforce the constitutional guarantee of equality under the law and strike down the discriminatory barriers denying same-sex couples access to civil marriage."

Opponents of gay marriage praised the decision.

"This is a victory for the right of the people of California to make fundamental policy decisions through democratic processes," said Monte Stewart, President of the Marriage Law Foundation, a Utah-based group that opposes same-sex marriage. "It is also a victory for society's most consequential social institution, and that is marriage."

In 2004, Massachusetts became the first state to legalize same-sex marriage after gay and lesbian couples in that state successfully sued for the right to wed. In the aftermath of that change, 19 states passed constitutional amendments barring gay marriage. Another 26 have statues limiting marriage to a man and a woman. Connecticut and Vermont allow civil unions.

Thursday's ruling came three months after the appeals court heard six hours of arguments in as many related cases — four of them filed by the city and lawyers for 20 couples seeking the right to wed, and two brought by groups that want to maintain the status quo barring same-sex unions.

The lawsuits arose out of the 2004 same-sex marriage spree that San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom ignited when he instructed city officials to issue marriage licenses to gay and lesbian couples. Hundreds of couples from across the country flocked to City Hall to marry, but groups opposed to gay marriage persuaded the state Supreme Court to invalidate the licenses.

"This is a disappointing second round in what we've always known is a three-round fight," San Francisco City Attorney Dennis Herrera said of Thursday's ruling.

In March 2005, San Francisco Superior Court Judge Richard Kramer ruled that the state's existing marriage laws violated the civil rights of gays and lesbians by denying them "the basic human right to marry a person of one's choice" and by discriminating on the basis of gender and sexual orientation.

Following Kramer's decision, the Legislature last year became the first lawmaking body in the nation to legalize gay marriage. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger vetoed the bill, saying it was up to voters or the courts, not lawmakers, to settle the contentious issue.

With a gubernatorial election next month, Thursday's ruling is sure to put the issue squarely back in the state's political arena. The bill's sponsor, Assemblyman Mark Leno, plans to reintroduce the measure to allow gay marriage at the end of the year.

California Court Upholds State's Ban On Same-Sex Marriage (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 5 — In the latest turn to a long and winding legal fight over same-sex marriage, a California appeals court on Thursday upheld the state's ban against it.

The 2-to-1 decision, which reversed a lower court's finding that the ban violated the California Constitution, said the plaintiffs in the case were asking the courts "to recognize a new right," a step it said only the Legislature or the voters could take.

"Courts simply do not have the authority to create new rights," said the decision, written by Justice William McGuiness, "especially when doing so involves changing the definition of so fundamental an institution as marriage."

Justice J. Anthony Kline dissented, taking issue in part with the majority's contention that because of domestic partnership laws, same-sex couples had rights comparable to those of married heterosexuals.

Domestic partnership and marriage are inherently unequal, Justice Kline said.

Dennis Herrera, the city attorney for San Francisco, said that the decision was a disappointment but that the city and other plaintiffs would appeal to the California Supreme Court.

San Francisco threw one of the first punches in the gay-marriage battle in February 2004, when Mayor Gavin C. Newsom directed the city's clerk to begin issuing marriage licenses for same-sex couples. The move was almost immediately challenged in court.

Those challenges were upheld in 2004 by the State Supreme Court, which said Mr. Newsom had overstepped his authority but which stopped short of ruling on the constitutionality of state marriage laws, including a 2000 ballot measure, Proposition 22, that defined marriage as the union of man and a woman.

A decision on the constitutionality of the laws was not long in coming, however. In April 2005, Judge Richard A. Kramer of San Francisco County Superior Court ruled that limiting marriage to people of the opposite sex impinged on a fundamental right to marry, and declared the ban unconstitutional.

Like previous decisions, Judge Kramer's ruling was immediately appealed. It was this appeal that led to Thursday's decision.

Groups opposed to gay marriage characterized the appellate court's ruling as a "crushing defeat to the same-sex-marriage agenda."

In a statement, Matthew D. Staver, the founder and chairman of Liberty Counsel, which argued the case for an anti-gay-marriage group, said: "The marital union of a man and a woman uniquely fosters responsible procreation, contributes to the continuing well-being of men and women, to society, to children and to the state. Same-sex relationships by definition and nature cannot constitute marriage."

The mood among supporters of a right to same-sex marriage, meanwhile, was still optimistic, despite a series of earlier legal setbacks around the nation, including defeats at the high-court level in New York and Washington State and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's veto of a bill, adopted by the Democratic-controlled Legislature, that would have lifted California's ban.

Jon W. Davidson, legal director of the gay rights group Lambda Legal, said the organization had always believed that the issue was bound for the State Supreme Court.

"Many of these cases around the country have been very close," Mr. Davidson said. "It's hard to know for sure what the California Supreme Court would do, but I think we would get a fair shake there."

Voter ID Laws Target The Vulnerable (USAT)

By Annette Fuentes

USA Today, October 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076517

The Voting Rights Act of 1965 came to life at a time when laws in the Jim Crow South disenfranchised African-Americans. Earlier this year, Congress and President Bush renewed the legislation, and so it will continue to protect the franchise for America's most vulnerable citizens.

But a movement is afoot at the state and federal level that threatens the essence of that law with backdoor approaches to suppress voter participation. Voter ID laws are at the heart of this strategy.

The House just passed a bill to require government-issued photo IDs to vote in the federal election in 2008. The Senate has yet to act on it. At the state level, 24 voter ID laws have been adopted — 13 of them in the past four years.

Voter ID foes argue that these laws affect poor, minority, elderly and young voters who are least likely to possess the kinds of documentation needed to obtain an ID. That includes birth certificates, which many seniors might no longer possess, and driver's licenses, which many without cars don't have.

Proponents of voter ID laws cite fraud in their calls for reform. But how widespread is voter fraud? There is little documentation, but a 2005 study by a commission on election reform headed by former president Jimmy Carter and former secretary of State James Baker offered some evidence. “While election fraud is difficult to measure, it occurs,” the commission said. The report stated that the Justice Department had investigated 180 reports of election fraud since 2002, which resulted in convictions of 52 people for “a variety of election fraud offenses, from vote buying to submitting false voter registration information and voting-related offenses by non-citizens.”

Out of the millions of votes cast in federal elections, that's hardly cause for alarm. Judges in several state courts seem to agree that voter IDs would cause more harm than good. On Sept. 19, a Georgia Superior Court judge tossed out that state's voter ID law as a violation of the state's constitution, which has no such requirement. Five days earlier, a Missouri circuit court judge voided that state's law, saying it placed an unconstitutional burden on voters because the ID wasn't free.

And then there's the issue of the day: immigration reform. Even anti-immigrant sentiment has driven at least some of the voter ID movement. In Arizona, a 2004 law was partially directed at illegal immigrants.

Electoral reforms clearly are needed, and that includes voting machines not vulnerable to tampering or miscounts. But voter ID laws are just a distraction from the real challenges to electoral integrity.

His Last, Best Cause (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

Damu Smith looked handsome in his coffin.

His face, with its high cheekbones and sharp jaw, seemed full again. His hair had a soft sheen, having been freshly oiled and woven into small, braidlike twists by his beautician at the funeral home the night before. His unblemished skin was the brown of a honey graham cracker.

The women who loved him most sat on the wood pews at the front of Plymouth Congregational United Church of Christ, a few steps from where he lay. His sweetheart, Adeleke Foster, lovingly touched his face one last time. His sister, Sylnice Williams, dabbed at tears until her tissue was soaked. His 13-year-old daughter, Asha, stared blankly ahead with sad, dry eyes.

In his final days, as he underwent grueling chemotherapy, Smith said he was fighting for Asha -- "I've got to see the man she marries," he cried. But in the end, he was no match for colorectal cancer -- or his own failure to seek medical treatment.

Smith, 54, like many other black men, died before his time. Black men have a life expectancy of 69 years, six years less than white men and far shorter than men of other ethnic group. They are more than twice as likely to die from cancer as white men, according to the National Cancer Institute, and nine times as likely as white men to die of AIDS. They suffer from lung disease, heart disease, hypertension, stroke, diabetes and other chronic illnesses in disproportionate numbers that alarm health-care professionals.

"From cradle to grave, African Americans have the worst statistics in almost every area of health," said Khan Nedd, founder of the Grand Rapids African American Health Institute in Michigan.

At the funeral, Monique Harden of Louisiana lauded Smith's social activism, crediting him with stopping two major corporations from building chemical plants in historic black communities between Baton Rouge and New Orleans, a stretch of highway nicknamed "Cancer Alley" because of its high cancer mortality rate, possibly caused by emissions belching from chemical refineries there.

But Harden left an important anecdote out of her eulogy. One day in 2001, as she and Smith drove along Cancer Alley, he told her about stabbing pains in his stomach. Harden practically begged him to see a doctor. Smith politely brushed her off. "He told me I was right, said that he should do it, the way a person says 'Yeah, right, I should quit smoking,' " Harden recalled days after the funeral.

By the time Smith was tested -- four years after Harden's plea -- it was far too late. Colorectal cancer had developed to its most advanced and lethal stage. Doctors told him there was nothing they could do. They gave him three months to live.

In March, six weeks before his death, Smith had admitted that Harden was right. The pain in his stomach was almost certainly cancer, he said. He should have seen a doctor rather than attribute the cramps to stress.

"Stupid self-diagnosis," he said.

Smith took only a bite or two. He could no longer easily digest food. He would suffer through the night. The day before, during a hospital visit, his doctor gave him grim news about his cancer. Tumors had spread from his colon to his liver and were moving toward his lungs.

Faced with this prognosis, Smith desperately wanted his death to matter as much as his life had. He sipped ginger tea in the low restaurant light and talked to a reporter who he allowed to chronicle the last weeks of his life. It would be his final activist effort. He wanted his story -- this story -- to serve as a cautionary tale, a warning to other black men to seek regular medical care: "Go to the doctor. Get your colon checked. Get a colonoscopy."

Smith knew this warning might be delivered from his grave.

* * *The Father's Story

Sylvester Smith was dying. Colorectal cancer had eaten away his 6-foot-5-inch, 250-pound body until he was practically skin and bone. His son Damu, who rushed home to St. Louis in 1981 to be with him during the last moments of his life, could hardly believe his eyes.

"Man, it was bad," Smith said. "He was in grueling pain."

Growing up in the tough Carr Square Village housing project, Smith idolized his father, one of the city's few black firefighters. At age 5, when Smith answered to his given name, Leroy Wesley, he organized a water-bucket brigade, scurrying around a neighborhood where drugs were sold and fights broke out between rival gangs, so that he could be a good Samaritan like his dad.

When Sylvester divorced Smith's mother, Vernice, father and son grew apart, but they still kept in touch, sharing conversations whenever they could.

On his deathbed, Sylvester was in constant agony, and full of regrets. He wished he had done more to prevent cancer. His diet wasn't as good as it should had been.

His son vowed that he would learn from his father's remorse. He refined his own strict diet, shunning red meat, poultry and dairy products. He embraced clean living, eating organic vegetables, drinking only filtered water. His holistic, vegetarian lifestyle became his health-care plan.

Here and there, acquaintances questioned whether Smith's diet and lifestyle were enough. Cancer is a killer that is known to stalk its victims through the family bloodline, hiding in DNA.

Gail Christopher, an acquaintance of Smith's, talked to him when they both won a free trip to a New Mexico health resort in 1994.

"I learned about his family history and his fear of disease," she said. "He was very afraid of dying, even then, of something horrible."

Smith felt that medicine and drugs were inferior to a carefully constructed diet using natural foods.

Christopher, who went on to become executive director of the Health Policy Institute at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, admired Smith's devotion to pure living, but offered some friendly advice.

"You can't diet cancer away," she said.

* * *Early Warnings

He ignored it. There was too much to do; there were too many injustices to fight.

He had been shuttling back and forth between Baton Rouge and New Orleans for almost 10 years. Often, he was so busy that he did not sleep. "I would drive down the road on the Louisiana coast at 3 in the morning, slapping the side of my face, blasting the radio, trying to stay awake," he recalled.

As an organizer for Greenpeace USA, Smith was responsible for rallying residents in Cancer Alley against the Japanese chemical company Shintech and Shell Oil Co. It was one of the few jobs he held that offered medical coverage. Smith could afford to see a doctor to check out the mysterious pains in his gut. But he didn't.

DOJ_NMG_0076519

After Shintech and Shell abandoned their plans to build chemical plants, Smith became a premier black environmentalist. He left Greenpeace and founded the National Black Environmental Justice Network, linking black people to what was virtually an all-white movement. The move also meant he no longer had health insurance.

When the United States invaded Iraq, he started an antiwar group, Black Voices for Peace. He also hosted a talk show on WPFW public radio called "Spirit in Action."

As his stature grew, so did the stomach pains.

"They would come about every six weeks, but when they came, they really came," he said.

One day in Pittsburgh in 2003, as he prepared to deliver a speech to hundreds of people, the pains cut through his soul.

"I leaped up in the air," he said. "They kept coming. I had to act like nothing was happening."

Mindful of the disease that killed their father, Smith's younger brother, Leslie, got a colonoscopy in 2003. Doctors use the procedure to probe deep into the colon, searching for cancerous polyps. It was surprisingly painless, Leslie told his brother. You should get tested.

"He said it only takes you a few minutes, so go ahead and do it," Smith recalled. Once again he brushed off the advice.

"I did get my prostate checked," he said. "I did do that."

The prostate exam was a step forward, but it was a stutter-step.

* * *'I Need to See a Doctor'

By the beginning of 2005, Damu Smith's stomach was tied in knots. When he used the bathroom, he would bleed. He lost his appetite, shed pounds, noticed a reddish tint in his stool.

"I need to see a doctor," he said to himself in February. "Something's wrong."

He scheduled a colonoscopy at Providence Hospital. It cost $760, cash he didn't have.

But, Smith often found money to attend speeches and demonstrations, even those halfway around the world.

In March, he came up with enough money to send himself and a companion, the Rev. Carolyn Boyd, to Israel, where demonstrators planned to protest that nation's treatment of Palestinians. The colonoscopy, he thought, could wait.

"I said just let me go on this trip, and I'll handle it when I come back," Smith recalled.

He barely made the flight. He called Boyd on her cellphone as she sat on the plane at Reagan National Airport. His voice sounded weak on the other end of the line.

"I don't know if I'm going to make it."

But he did, stepping into the cabin at the very last minute, struggling to stand on his own. On the way to his seat, Smith leaned heavily on Boyd.

On a hot, dusty street in Bethlehem, Smith drifted away from the main group of protesters and slumped on a nearby car. The thud of his fall brought people scampering toward him, some praying loudly as he convulsed on the ground.

Smith might have died in the Holy Land if a nurse had not been in the protest group. She shoved candy and other sweets down his throat to raise his blood sugar as an ambulance roared toward them. The source of Smith's stomach pain was discovered by Palestinian doctors.

"They told me Damu had cancer of the rectum, cancer of the liver and cancer of the colon," Boyd said. "They couldn't bear to tell him. They told me to take him home."

Boyd kept quiet as well. She didn't know how to break that kind of news. She thought it would be better for her friend to hear it from doctors in the United States. Boyd relentlessly pressed Smith to get tested when they arrived in Washington.

"You have Stage IV colon cancer," the examining doctor said. "It doesn't look good."

A second doctor chimed in.

"I know you didn't ask me," he said, "but people with your condition only have about three to six months to live. You should get your things in order. Don't sleep on this."

Smith gritted his teeth, curled himself into a ball on the hospital bed and asked to be alone.

"Why me?" he said in the silent hospital room.

* * *Conventional and Holistic

"I'm now very clear," he said. "You have to use conventional medicine, too. You can't know what's lurking inside of you. I didn't make going to the doctor part of my lifestyle."

Psychologists, sociologists, health-care professionals and economists all proffer reasons why black men shun doctors. They lack insurance. They don't want to be seen as weak. Doctors are insensitive. Fear. Ignorance. Irresponsibility. Racism. Distrust of the medical system born of injustices such as the Tuskegee syphilis experiment, in which, to study the progression of the disease, doctors allowed it to grow untreated in mostly illiterate black sharecroppers between 1932 and 1972. In the end, 128 men died of the infection.

In addition to his reliance on his healthful diet, Smith indicated that fear was a factor. "I have to be honest with you, I used to think about going to get a checkup and I'd say to myself, 'I don't want to find out anything bad,' " he told a reporter for the Washington Afro-American three months after his diagnosis.

In his final weeks, Smith would not address the question head-on when anyone dared to ask. As he battled cancer, he did not want to dwell on past mistakes. He used the power of positive thinking to gracefully manage the pain.

But his inner eye wasn't blind. The past played over and over in his head. In a rare moment at La Tomate on a frosty night in March, about six weeks before he died, he shared some of his thoughts.

"It's not that I'm macho, or that I think I'm invincible," Smith said. "I actually thought that living the healthy lifestyle I was living, it would take care of me, help me through everything."

"Had I gone to the doctor when she said . . .," he started to say, but the sentence trailed off.

* * *After 11 Months

It was cold, white and sterile in the boxy examination room at Johns Hopkins Hospital where Smith sat, but he seemed oblivious to his surroundings.

He lifted his shirt and gingerly stroked the right side of his stomach, just under the ribs, the way a pregnant woman sweetly rubs her swollen belly.

"I can feel them," Smith said softly to himself. "I can feel them growing."

He was talking about the tumors.

It was now 11 months since his cancer diagnosis. He had undergone radiation treatments, chemotherapy, MRI scans and blood tests. Holistic doctors gave him vitamin shakes to drink and other forms of care.

His medical bills surpassed $400,000, an amount he couldn't hope to pay. Add more CAT scans, MRI images, blood tests, lab results, radiation and chemotherapy, and the cost could balloon even higher.

Smith had Medicaid, but that barely made a dent in what he owed. Friends held fundraisers in Washington and Atlanta that brought in about $70,000 -- not nearly enough.

Bill collectors were after him. One day in April, Smith answered the speakerphone in his Adams Morgan apartment and heard a voice yell on the other end of the line: "Sir, we need to talk to you! You need to resolve this . . ."

He coolly dropped the phone on the hook. "He doesn't have to talk to me that way," he said. Debt was the least of his problems.

Smith was still stroking his stomach when Wells A. Messersmith, his cancer specialist, strolled into the examination room around 3:30 p.m.

"How are you feeling, man?"

It was a rhetorical question. The patient did not look well. He had jaundice because of his failing liver. His eyes were as green as the meat of a lime. He weighed about 150 pounds, about eight pounds lighter than the previous week.

"I have a lot of pain in my abdomen," Smith said, holding up his shirt. "I have dry mouth." He was afraid to eat. "I know when I eat there is going to be so much pain and discomfort," he said.

There was good news, the doctor said. The chemotherapy was working. There were no more tumors in Smith's rectal area.

But other news was far worse. Smith was right about the tumors. They were growing and spreading. On the long drive home to Washington, he finally talked about the possibility of his death.

"I guess the point is that my life is in imminent danger," he said. "I can't play around. What's happening to me right now can kill me sooner rather than later."

Messersmith knew that death would likely come sooner.

"I feel sad knowing that this probably could have been prevented," he said in April, a week after his consultation with Smith, who waived his doctor-patient privilege so that Messersmith could talk about his cancer. "He really should have been screened at age 50."

* * *A Daughter's Perspective

Asha Moore Smith strutted into her father's bedroom and folded her teenage body into a narrow space between the bed and a window covered by thick, leafy houseplants. She kicked back in socked feet until they were almost parallel with her almond-shaped head. Using a remote, she flicked on the TV.

DOJ_NMG_0076521

On popped one of her favorite cartoons, "The Grim Adventures of Billy and Mandy," a show about a little girl and boy who can force the Grim Reaper, complete with hooded robe and scythe, to be their personal servant, cleaning their bedrooms, washing dishes and performing funny magic tricks.

Her father lay on the fluffy double bed, face up, barely moving. Their trips to the park had stopped, and there were no more happy excursions to Disney World and Disneyland.

Asha, an eighth-grader, hardly seem to care, as long as she was near her dad. "My dad still does stuff with me," she said. "It's not like he has cancer and he doesn't do anything with me."

On the bed, he struggled to sit up, exhausted by both the illness and its treatment, which felt just as bad. Smith endured the pain without complaint, sometimes with a smile, but it was clear in those last days that his condition was worsening.

A circle was closing. Twenty-five years ago, Smith saw his father lying on a bed much like the one he was on. And now Asha was watching her father die.

Sometimes when they were together, she took stock of his illness with a child's curious mind.

"Daddy, your eyes are green," Asha would say.

"Daddy, I can see your cheeks."

"Daddy, I can see your ribs."

Smith and Asha's mother, Lynn Moore, thought long and hard about how to tell their only daughter that her father had cancer.

They decided to tell her the truth, leaving out the ugly details.

"As I recall, we were at the hospital, at Providence," Smith said, voice weak.

Asha lowered the sound of the television set.

"No," she said, "it was here." She looked at him with searching eyes. "Don't you remember?"

Asha was right.

Later, she tried to recall what Smith told her about the stages of cancer the way some kids try to recite the alphabet.

"There are five stages," she said, "and you were somewhere in the middle, at Stage III. That was not as bad. That is curable."

"I told her that people with Stage IV cancer live for years," Smith said. "It's not a death sentence."

What Asha wanted to know, he said, was 'Am I going to die soon?' " "I'm still here, right?" he said.

Asha nodded.

A short time later, Smith drifted off to sleep, and Asha turned up the sound on a cartoon where a little girl could boss death around.

* * *In the End

On a captivatingly pretty spring morning in May, Adeleke Foster arose at 7 and walked into the living room where her boyfriend slept. "Damu," she said softly. He did not stir. "Damu?" she said again, voice rising. "Damu!"

Foster called for an ambulance, and then she called one of Smith's closest friends, Sandy Rattley. Within minutes, dozens of Smith's friends heard the news and rushed to George Washington University Hospital, where doctors tried to revive him.

As he went in and out of consciousness, Smith groggily looked up at Asha, who had hustled to the hospital with her mom. She leaned her ear close to his whispering mouth. "I love you," he said. Minutes later, he faded into a coma.

A call went out all over the city, and by 8 p.m. the waiting room in the intensive-care ward was filled with friends and activists, about 30 people in all.

Dera Tompkins, who shared Smith's love for protest and reggae music, reminisced about the fundraising parties Smith threw. Milagros Phillips, who joined the "Spirit in Action" radio program as a co-host when Smith became sick, talked about how he soldiered on.

They lined the hallway outside Smith's room, going in one by one for a few private last words. Early on the morning of May 5, Smith took his final breath.

J.T. Lawson, a close friend, sped to Washington from Norfolk after hearing the news and arrived too late. He stepped into the room, grabbed a chair and sat near the bed where his friend lay.

"Damu, it's J.T. I know you can hear me," he said. "I'm sorry I'm late. I want you to know that I'm here. And I love you. And I will miss you."

Later, he reflected on Smith, their friendship and why he did not seek medical treatment.

"In black communities, Lawson said, "there's so much negative reinforcement when you tell someone you're going to see the doctor. No one says 'I'm glad you're taking care of yourself.' They say 'Are you okay?' 'Are you sick?' "God forbid you get a colonoscopy," Lawson said. "They ask 'Why you do that?' "

DOJ_NMG_0076522

Another friend, Ayo Handi Kendi, a plain-spoken woman with sage eyes, stood in the hospital waiting room on that somber night.

"Damu was a wonderful man," Kendi said. "He was a very good leader," she said, one of the best she had ever seen. He was different because he truly cared for black people. He wanted to revolutionize their diets, turn them away from fatty foods.

Damu knew about the disparities in illness that afflict black men and worked against them. Which is why his death to her did not make sense.

"You know, we were a little upset with him for not seeing a doctor," Kendi said, keeping her voice low in the hospital waiting room. In a room full of friends and admirers, only Kendi volunteered a plain truth --though it pained her to say it.

"We thought he should have known better."

Freedom Of Expression (WT)

By Clay Calvert And Robert D. Richards

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

Can the nation's public high schools stop students from displaying messages that promote or advocate illegal drug use without violating the First Amendment-protected right of free speech?

That's the gist of the question that the U.S. Supreme Court now is being asked to consider in a case called Frederick v. Morse coming out of the liberal-leaning 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

In this dispute, the 9th Circuit ruled in March in favor of a Juneau, Alaska, high school senior named Joseph Frederick, who unfurled a banner reading "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" while standing on a sidewalk adjacent to school property as the Olympic torch relay passed by back in 2002. The students had the school's permission to be there, under faculty supervision.

In tossing out the suspension given to Mr. Frederick, the appellate court rejected the school's assertion that the suppression of his speech was justified because the banner was "inconsistent with the district's basic educational mission to promote a healthy, drug-free life style."

Although the message on the banner may seem silly and even nonsensical, the Supreme Court should grant the school's motion to hear the case filed in late August by former Independent Counsel Kenneth W. Starr and his firm, Kirkland & Ellis.

In particular, the case should be considered not simply to resolve the question about pro-drug speech in public schools, but perhaps more importantly to resuscitate the high court's moribund and muddled jurisprudence of student free-expression rights.

The Supreme Court has ruled directly only three times in its history in cases affecting student speech rights in public school settings. The most recent of those decisions came nearly 20 years ago, in 1988, and involved a traditional high-school newspaper that was produced as part of the school curriculum.

In the meantime, schools have grappled with a multitude of new problems, including violent on-campus outbursts like that at Columbine High School, technology such as the Internet that provides students with fingertip access to questionable content -- on and off campus -- and a generation of minors that engage, perhaps too early, in both behavior and speech once reserved for the adult population.

In addition, students are now creating their own Web sites and using social networks like MySpace.com to make disparaging remarks about school officials, teachers and fellow students.

In brief, it's totally different landscape today than it was the last time the Supreme Court considered a high-school speech case.

In the absence of any clear guidelines from the nation's high court, federal judges have attempted, with varying results, to balance minors' constitutional rights with the schools' ability to maintain order in the classroom. The lower courts are forced to try to squeeze current controversies into the framework of the trio of Supreme Court precedents -- a task that is far from easy given that most of the new disputes do not fit squarely into those precedents.

In August, for instance, another federal appellate court, the 2nd Circuit Court of Appeals, dealt with a drug-related message case, albeit one with a far more clear political message than the "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" banner.

In particular, the Second Circuit upheld the First Amendment right of a seventh grader in Vermont to wear to school a T-shirt with images of cocaine and a martini glass that, through text and images, accused President Bush of being a "Lying Drunk Driver" and an "AWOL Draft Dodger." The images of drugs and alcohol were meant to impugn Mr. Bush's character, who long ago gave up drinking.

In ruling in favor of the student and what it called his "anti-drug political message," the appellate court aptly summed up the current status of school speech law: "The case requires us to sail into the unsettled waters of free speech rights in public schools, waters rife with shoals and uncertain currents."

The Supreme Court should now begin to settle the choppy seas of speech, and the case of Frederick v. Morse is an appropriate place to begin this difficult task.

DOJ_NMG_0076523

Ultimately, while Mr. Frederick's bong-hits banner may be childish and inane -- he contends the only real purpose of it was to get on TV -- the case nonetheless raises larger issues of free speech, drugs and the authority of public schools that are ripe for review.

ANTITRUST:

Court Doesn't Snuff Out Consumer Antitrust Litigation Over Snuff Prices (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, October 6, 2006

Most of the class action tobacco suits focus on the diseases it causes. But a suit in federal court in Philadelphia adds a new twist: It's a consumer suit brought by Pennsylvania purchasers of snuff and chewing tobacco who complain that the leading manufacturer used its monopoly power to drive up prices.

In the suit, Hunt v. United States Tobacco Co., the plaintiffs are seeking to capitalize on a massive verdict against the nation's No. 1 snuff maker, in which a Kentucky federal court jury awarded $350 million to rival Conwood Co. -- an award that was automatically trebled to $1.05 billion and later upheld by the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

In a decision handed down earlier this month, a federal judge refused to dismiss the consumer suit, rejecting defense lawyers' arguments that the plaintiffs lacked standing to bring an antitrust claim under the Pennsylvania Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Law.

Now the defense team is asking Senior U.S. District Judge Ronald L. Buckwalter to certify an immediate appeal, arguing that the complaint should have been dismissed because there is no "direct relationship" between the plaintiff and the defendants; and that the plaintiffs' claim is essentially an antitrust claim, and antitrust violations do not state a claim under the UTPCPL.

In the Kentucky suit, Conwood, whose snuff brands include Kodiak and Cougar, accused UST Inc., which sells the Skoal and Copenhagen brands, of misleading retailers to secure prime display space for its brands.

Conwood claimed that UST's conduct was aimed at stifling competition, and that its salesmen obscured competitors' brands or removed their display racks altogether.

In the Pennsylvania suit, attorneys Alan M. Sandals and Joseph M. Gordon of Sandals & Associates in Philadelphia, along with Kenneth G. Gilman of Gilman & Pastor in Boston, contend that the same deceptive conduct that was found by the Kentucky jury also caused injury to Pennsylvania consumers.

By engaging in "fraudulent and deceptive conduct" that allowed UST to "monopolize the market for moist smokeless tobacco products," the suit alleges that UST also deceived consumers in Pennsylvania "into paying artificially high prices for such products."

In paying those inflated prices, the suit says, the consumers were relying on "a presumption that they were paying prices set by an efficient market, when in fact they were paying prices artificially inflated by defendants' anti-competitive and deceptive conduct."

According to the suit, UST and its affiliated companies are the world's largest manufacturers of moist smokeless tobacco, enjoying a monopoly share of up to 87 percent of the $1.5 billion market.

That monopoly, the suit says, was maintained "through illegal and exclusionary conduct that has suppressed competition, raised prices, stifled innovation, and reaped hundreds of millions of dollars in profits every year."

In a motion to dismiss, UST's lawyers -- James R. Kahn of Margolis Edelstein in Philadelphia and Margaret M. Zwisler and Charles H. Samel of Latham & Watkins in Washington, D.C. -- argued that the claim was fatally flawed.

Since the plaintiffs purchased smokeless tobacco products from Pennsylvania retailers and not directly from UST, they cannot state a private cause of action under the UTPCPL, the defense team argued.

Buckwalter disagreed, saying the UTPCPL includes a private cause of action for "any person who purchases or leases goods or services primarily for personal, family or household purposes" and who "suffers any ascertainable loss of money or property, real or personal, as a result of the use or employment by any person of a method, act or practice declared unlawful" elsewhere in the statute.

"Strict privity," Buckwalter said, "is not always an element of the private cause of action" under the UTPCPL.

The claim is a valid one, Buckwalter said, because the plaintiff alleges that he purchased a good for personal use and that he suffered an "ascertainable loss of money" as the result of UST's conduct.

DOJ_NMG_0076524

The defense team also argue that since there is no "direct relationship" between the plaintiffs and UST, they cannot establish that they relied on UST's alleged conduct.

But Buckwalter found that the plaintiffs were relying on the UTPCPL's "catch-all" provision.

The state and federal courts in Pennsylvania, Buckwalter found, are "divided as to the governing standard for a claim under the catch-all provision of the UTPCPL."

Some courts, he said, require a plaintiff asserting a claim under the catch-all provision to meet all the elements of common law fraud, while others read the inclusion of the term "deceptive" in the catch-all provision as "creating an alternative, less rigorous level of proof that falls short of actual fraud."

Buckwalter sided with the second camp, finding that "since the UTPCPL should be liberally construed .... and in light of the 1996 amendment to the catch-all provision, this court agrees with prior decisions holding that the catch-all provision does not require a plaintiff to prove all the elements of common law fraud."

As a result, Buckwalter said, the plaintiffs do not need to establish reliance under the catch-all provision.

Finally, Buckwalter rejected the defense argument that alleged antitrust violations do not state claims under the UTPCPL.

Buckwalter found that the defense team was taking too broad a reading of a pair of decisions that rejected the plaintiffs' claims.

"These cases do not state that antitrust violations can never state a cause of action under the UTPCPL," Buckwalter wrote, "but [instead], that antitrust violations can never state a cause of action under the UTPCPL in the absence of fraudulent, deceptive or disparaging conduct committed by a defendant."

Buckwalter concluded that although the complaint "sounds in anticompetitive conduct characteristic of an antitrust violation," the plaintiff "also alleges sufficient fraudulent, deceptive and/or disparaging conduct under the UTPCPL."

As a result, Buckwalter said he "agrees with plaintiff that a plaintiff can allege conduct that is actionable under the UTPCPL regardless of whether the conduct at issue may also give rise to antitrust liability."

Now the defense team has asked Buckwalter to issue a stay and certify an interlocutory appeal.

Since Buckwalter recognized that the courts are divided on the issue of whether the UTPCPL requires proof of reliance, the defense team argues that the case clearly involves "a question of law about which there are substantial grounds for difference of opinion."

An immediate appeal, the defense argues, would promote efficiency since discovery has not yet begun and the plaintiffs have not yet moved for class certification.

"An appellate ruling now," they argue, "would save the parties and the judicial system considerable time and expense."

And a decision from the 3rd Circuit "would provide much needed clarity on the law, removing some uncertainty in assessing the claims in this case, and thereby potentially facilitate a settlement."

ArvinMeritor Sues Eaton (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

TROY, Mich. --Auto supplier ArvinMeritor Inc. on Thursday said its Meritor Transmission Corp. business, along with ZF Meritor LLC, the company's joint venture with Germany's ZF Friedrichshafen AG, filed an antitrust lawsuit against Eaton Corp.

The suit, filed in the U.S. District Court for the District of Delaware, seeks an injunction to stop the Cleveland-based diversified industrial manufacturer from engaging in anticompetitive conduct in the heavy-duty truck transmissions markets. It also asks the court to award triple damages.

The lawsuit claims Eaton has harmed competition in the markets for heavy-duty truck transmissions by limiting consumer choice, eliminating competitive checks on pricing and suppressing innovation, ArvinMeritor said.

The lawsuit also claims Eaton's conduct forced ZF Meritor to cease operations.

ArvinMeritor shares rose 2 cents to $14.42 in aftermarket trading on the INET, after closing up 10 cents at $14.40 on the New York Stock Exchange. Eaton shares closed up 80 cents at $70.50 on the NYSE.

AT&T Faces Key Test Next Week In Bid To Take Over BellSouth (CHIT)

Chicago Tribune, October 6, 2006

CHICAGO - The drive by AT&T Inc. to take over BellSouth Corp. by New Year's will be tested next week when the Federal Communications Commission will either rule on the merger or decide to delay taking action.

Congressional leaders from both houses and both parties have cautioned federal regulators against haste in deciding the fate of AT&T's deal, which could provide a speed bump in what had appeared to be a smooth course.

Last month Kevin Martin, the FCC chairman, circulated a proposed order to his colleagues that would approve AT&T's deal without imposing any conditions, a move interpreted to open negotiations with the FCC's two Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0076525

Following Martin's actions, Republican and Democratic leaders of key committees in the House and the Senate sent letters to the FCC and to the Department of Justice urging delay on AT&T's case until a decision is returned in a federal court case that is reviewing last year's mega-mergers that combined AT&T and SBC Communications Inc. to form the new AT&T and that merged Verizon Communications Inc. with MCI.

That review by U.S. District Judge Emmet Sullivan is required by the federal Tunney Act, under which the courts must examine mergers approved by the Department of Justice to assure they protect the public interest.

In their letters, lawmakers expressed concern that last year's telecom mergers were approved and closed before the Tunney Act review was begun. They suggest regulators should withhold further action at least until the review of the past mergers is completed.

``It's very unusual for lawmakers to intervene in a matter like this at this level," said Shane Greenstein, a professor at Northwestern University's Kellogg School of Management. ``Usually, they discuss things more at a higher policy level."

In their letter, Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, and Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., got very specific, mentioning that when merged, AT&T/BellSouth will hold considerable radio spectrum suitable for wireless broadband.

Because AT&T will be the largest wired phone company in the country and will also own the largest cell phone carrier, Cingular, the senators suggested the company may have little financial incentive to rollout a new broadband wireless service to compete with itself. Requiring the companies to sell their spectrum before approving the merger was mentioned.

``The lawmakers have a legitimate point," said Andrew Klevorn, a partner with the Chicago law firm Eimer Stahl. ``This probably means a delay in approval."

Congress passed the Tunney Act because of concerns dating back to the Nixon administration that the Department of Justice's antitrust lawyers didn't sufficiently protect the public interest when reviewing giant mergers, Klevorn said.

Two years ago, Congress strengthened Tunney by making judicial reviews mandatory rather than voluntary, he noted.

It's not clear when Sullivan may issue his findings on the previous mergers, but Daniel Berninger, an analyst with Tier 1 Research, said the judge's statements so far haven't commended the Justice Department's handling of the matter.

``He's said they've done a crummy job justifying their actions," Berninger said.

Dave Pacholczyk, an AT&T spokesman, said the carrier sees no reason why review of the merger announced last March should be delayed any longer.

``The reasons for the merger are no different now than they were when we announced it," he said. ``The competitive environment is more strenuous, cable companies are jumping into our business, there's a convergence of technologies and networks."

Pacholczyk said that regulators in 18 states have reviewed the merger and approved it without imposing conditions.

``All 18 states looked at the same record we have now before the FCC," he said.

In a research report issued by the Prudential Equity Group this week, Susan A. Lynner and Erin Dwyer wrote they doubt that congressional intervention will significantly delay regulatory approval of AT&T's deal, but they said that it's likely conditions aimed at promoting competition will be imposed.

Jason Oxman, a spokesman for a group opposing the merger, the Competition Coalition, called the matter ``a test of AT&T's political power. It will be interesting to see if that power can overcome bipartisan concerns about harms to the nation in this deal."

Jim Speta, a member of Northwestern University's law faculty specializing in telecom issues, said that ``AT&T has pushed very hard for merger approval. I'm sure that the Justice Department and FCC will listen to what influential lawmakers say, but I couldn't predict what effect it'll have.

Ryanair Makes Hostile EU1.48 Billion Aer Lingus Bid (Update8) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Fletcher

Bloomberg, October 6, 2006

Oct. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Ryanair Holdings Plc, Europe's biggest discount airline, made a hostile 1.48 billion-euro ($1.88 billion) bid for Aer Lingus Plc to combine Ireland's dominant carriers and add long-haul routes to the U.S.

Ryanair acquired a 16 percent stake and offered 2.80 euros a share for the rest of Aer Lingus, 12 percent more than yesterday's closing price in Dublin. The Irish government, owner of 28.3 percent of Aer Lingus, rejected the bid, which comes eight days after the company's initial public offering.

``This is going to be such a huge deal in Ireland that I think they'll have to increase the bribery and pay significantly more," said Mike Powell, a Madrid-based analyst for Dresdner Kleinwort with an ``add" rating on Ryanair shares.

Chief Executive Officer Michael O'Leary said Ryanair would reduce fares at Aer Lingus and acquire planes at lower cost by combining orders. The enlarged group would have 50 million passengers a year, helping it compete with British Airways Plc and its partner Iberia SA, which have 63 million.

``It makes sense to combine the two Irish airlines so that we can compete with the likes of British Airways, Lufthansa and Air France,'' O'Leary said in an interview. ``We can boost Aer Lingus's growth and profits and produce a better return than putting our spare cash on deposit.'' The two carriers will have separate operations and brands, he said.

Shares of Ryanair, founded in 1985 with one 15-seat plane, fell as much as 37 cents, or 4.3 percent, to 8.33 euros and were down 0.6 percent at 3:27 p.m. in Dublin. Aer Lingus surged 15 percent to 2.89 euros.

Government Reaction

Together, Ryanair and Aer Lingus handle about 70 percent of the passengers at Dublin airport. The takeover would face scrutiny from Irish and European regulators. Cathal Hanley, a spokesman for the Competition Authority in Dublin, declined to comment.

``The government is fully committed to competition in the aviation market and it will not be selling its shares in Aer Lingus,'' Irish Prime Minister Bertie Ahern told lawmakers in Dublin today. ``It was always the intention to maintain a significant minority shareholding.''

Aer Lingus's board is considering Ryanair's announcement and urged shareholders ``strongly'' not to take any action until the board makes an announcement, the company said in a statement.

Ryanair on Sept. 29 raised its full-year profit forecast and ordered an additional 32 Boeing Co. planes. Discount airlines are expanding in Europe, with a 24 percent share of the market compared with 5 percent in 2001. Ryanair has introduced a new base at Bremen, Germany, and expansion of the Barcelona-Girona base in Spain in the past two weeks.

Higher Price

``We're happy to see this offer,'' said Colin McLean, managing director of SVM Asset Management, who holds shares in Ryanair and Aer Lingus. The airline ``might have to up their offer and there is the possibility of someone else entering'' with a rival bid, he said.

Aer Lingus Chief Executive Officer Dermot Mannion has said he plans to use the proceeds of the IPO to double Aer Lingus's long-haul fleet to 14 jets, expand the 28-plane short-haul fleet by 50 percent and spend about 2 billion euros adding U.S. and Asian routes.

Gillian Culhane, an Aer Lingus spokeswoman in Dublin, declined to comment. Employees owned 9.9 percent of the airline following the initial public offering.

Ryanair has a strategy of taking market share from national carriers, while defending its Irish market. Unlike Aer Lingus, Ryanair has no long-haul routes. The Ryanair bid would be the largest airline transaction in the past 12 months if successful, according to Bloomberg data.

Competition Regulator

``It's hard to see how the Irish competition regulator can permit such a concentration of capacity at Dublin airport,'' said Chris Avery, an analyst at J.P. Morgan with an ``overweight'' rating on Ryanair stock. ``If the regulator objects, it is then hard to see what Ryanair hopes to achieve.''

The combined group would operate on about 500 routes, competing on only 17, Ryanair said. Ryanair will combine purchasing with Aer Lingus to drive down fares and costs. The airline had about 2.2 billion euros of cash before buying a stake in the carrier, said O'Leary.

``We can comfortably fund this from our own resources,'' said O'Leary. ``We're happy to work with the Irish government as a significant minority shareholder if they decide not to sell,'' O'Leary said, adding he didn't anticipate antitrust or regulatory difficulties.

Ryanair History

O'Leary joined the Dublin-based company in 1988 from accounting firm KPMG LLP. Ryanair for the first time in August 2005 carried more passengers than British Airways.

When O'Leary was asked to head what was then an unprofitable local airline, he said it should be shut down. He changed his mind after flying to Dallas to pick Herb Kelleher's brain on how he built Southwest into the world's largest low-fare carrier. O'Leary typically targets his route expansion at state-owned or former national airlines which often struggle with higher costs.

O'Leary and Ahern's government have had a strained relationship, particularly over landing fees at state-owned Dublin airport. O'Leary said Ahern was treating Irish people as ``fools'' for allowing the Dublin Airport Authority to raise car parking charges by 50 percent, the Irish Times said on April 1 2005. He has routinely described Ireland as ``Bertie's blunder land,'' citing overruns on infrastructure including the Port Tunnel in the capital.

Aer Lingus slashed 2,100 jobs, more than a third of the workforce, to avoid bankruptcy and return the carrier to profit after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks on the U.S. hurt demand for trans-Atlantic travel.

Ryanair Strategy

Ryanair plans to accelerate Aer Lingus's strategy of cutting fares on short-haul routes, as well as adding beds on transatlantic routes, O'Leary said.

``Our strategy for Aer Lingus is to speed up their own business plan, which has already been signed off by the Irish government," he said. Ryanair has no plans to start its own long-haul service, he said.

``Ryanair has a well-known history of hostility to its staff and shabby treatment of its customers," IMPACT, a Dublin-based union which represents about 2,000 airline employees including pilots and cabin crew, said in a statement. The union said it was opposed to the proposed takeover.

``If accepted, the government will have realized over 500 million euros from the sale of its shares in Aer Lingus just four years after the company nearly went bankrupt," said O'Leary. ``The staff would realize over 220 million, which averages just over 60,000 euros."

Aer Lingus and the Irish government raised an additional 96.6 million euros by selling extra shares on Oct. 3, taking the total raised by the airline's initial public offering to 740.7 million euros.

Ryanair Steps Up Industry Shakeout (WSJ)

By Keith Johnson

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

The surprise €1.48 billion ($1.88 billion) bid by Ryanair Holdings for recently privatized Irish flag carrier Aer Lingus underscores how onetime budget upstarts are increasingly calling the shots in an industry long dominated by state carriers.

If successful, the takeover could create one of Europe's biggest and most profitable airline groups. But it won't be smooth sailing: Aer Lingus's board unanimously rejected the offer. Chairman John Sharman called the approach "unsolicited and wholly opportunistic" and said it "significantly undervalues the group's businesses." In addition, the Irish government, still Aer Lingus's biggest shareholder, and unions lambasted the proposed takeover and vowed to fight it.

Ryanair's bid, announced yesterday morning, is the latest example of how feisty budget carriers are revolutionizing an airline industry still recovering from the shocks of deregulation, terrorist threats and volatile oil prices. Traditionally, large state-run airlines have started or bought their own low-cost airlines in an effort to tap into a profitable market they can't tackle on their own, because of their cumbersome legacy costs. Now, Ryanair Chief Executive Michael O'Leary wants to do the opposite: tack Aer Lingus's long-haul routes onto his budget carrier's operations.

Mr. O'Leary said that if the deal were successful, he would keep Ryanair and Aer Lingus as separate brands within "one strong airline group for Ireland" that would have "the ambition, expertise, financial strength and cost base to take on European and global competitors." Buying Aer Lingus offers the best way to get returns for Ryanair's €2.2 billion cash reserve, he said, and wouldn't affect Ryanair's business or aggressive expansion.

Ryanair said it had acquired 19.2% of Aer Lingus shares on the open market. The Irish government kept a 28% stake in the airline after its Monday initial public offering, while its employees hold 15%. The Irish government said yesterday that it wouldn't sell to Ryanair and was "firmly committed to competition in aviation markets."

Ryanair's unsolicited cash offer for all of Aer Lingus prices the carrier's shares at €2.80, a 12% premium to the closing price Wednesday and a 27% premium to the share price when the airline was listed Monday. For 2005, Aer Lingus reported revenue of €883 million and net profit of €72.4 million.

It was unclear what type of regulatory hurdles a deal could face. Though it would create a monopoly inside Ireland, antitrust authority will almost certainly rest with the European Union, because most of the two airlines' business is outside Ireland. Ryanair argued that several airlines in the EU have merged and that the U.K., Spain, and France have seen domestic consolidation.

"We're pretty confident of regulatory clearance" from the EU, said Ryanair Chief Operating Officer Michael Cawley. But political opposition to losing the flag carrier to Ryanair, a rapacious, cost-slashing airline, is fierce in Ireland, a country with a strong trade-union history. Impact, a union representing pilots and cabin staff, has already voiced its opposition to the bid and cited Ryanair's "well-known hostility to its staff" and "shabby treatment of customers." Ryanair declined to comment.

Even the nuts-and-bolts of the operation may prove problematic. Aer Lingus's former management turned the airline from a basket case to one of the continent's most-profitable carriers, but it still has much higher costs, lower profit margins and a vastly different corporate culture than Ryanair.

"We said we'd never wave the white flag" when the Irish government privatized Aer Lingus, said Michael Halpenny, general secretary of Ireland's Siptu union, which represents about 1,800 Aer Lingus employees. "We warned everybody this is exactly what would happen," he said in an interview.

Win or lose, Ryanair's bid puts Aer Lingus in a bind. The bid is conditioned on securing 50.1% of Aer Lingus, making it all but impossible for the government to block if Ryanair's offer seduces minority shareholders. If for some reason it is unsuccessful, analysts said, Ryanair may aggressively attack Aer Lingus's Irish operations.

In the past 15 years, Ryanair transformed itself from an unprofitable Irish puddle-jumper to Europe's biggest budget airline. It offers hundreds of short, inexpensive, no-frills flights throughout Europe and carried 34.8 million passengers last year.

Ryanair's relentless focus on lowering costs helped maintain industry-leading profit margins in recent years despite higher oil prices and a belated counterattack by traditional airlines. The market has rewarded those efforts, pushing Ryanair shares up 29% during the past year.

Buying Aer Lingus could open up another potential revenue stream for Ryanair: lucrative long-haul passengers, which have so far been an elusive goal for Mr. O'Leary. Entering the long-haul market was virtually impossible, given Ryanair's spartan service and business model based on flying planes as long as 12 hours a day on different routes. Aer Lingus, which flies between Ireland and Boston, Chicago and Los Angeles, would bring long-haul passengers and the chance to funnel them into Ryanair's extensive European network.

Tata Steel Considering Corus Merger (FT)

By John Willman

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

Tata Steel of India confirmed on Thursday that it is considering a bid for Corus, the Anglo-Dutch steel producer, as part of a review of global opportunities for industry consolidation.

However, it added that there was no certainty that any move would be made, or that if it did, it would be for Corus. Tata's move may also draw out other potential bidders.

The announcement came after days of stock market speculation over an offer of 580p a share that led to heavy trading in Corus shares on Wednesday. Nearly 90m shares shares changed hands by later afternoon on Thursday, taking the price up 50¼p to 458p, at which price the group is valued at £4.08bn.

Corus is the seventh largest steel producer, with output of around 20m tonnes a year, but Tata's statement is bound to reignite speculation over its future. It has long been rumoured as a takeover target, and has been searching for a merger partner for six months.

Tata Steel is a subsidiary of Tata Group, India's largest privately owned company, and produced 5m tonnes last year. It has ambitious plans to quadruple its output in India, and has expanded into Singapore and Thailand.

In an interview with the Financial Times earlier this week, B Mutharaman, managing director, refused to comment on whether it was interested in a deal with Corus.

However, the €26.9bn takeover of Luxembourg-based Arcelor by Lakshmi Mittal's Mittal Steel in June merged the two largest steel producers to create a business with capacity of more than 110m tonnes – three times more than its closest rival. This has prompted speculation over further consolidation in the industry.

Tata Steel Might Bid $10 Billion For U.K.'s Corus (WSJ)

By Peter Wonacott And Jason Singer

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

India's Tata Steel Ltd. is in talks with Corus Group PLC on a potential bid of about $10 billion for the British steelmaker, according to people familiar with the matter. The talks come amid a wave of consolidation reshaping the steel industry and a broader rush overseas among Indian companies.

Tata Steel, India's largest privately owned steelmaker by output, said it is exploring a possible bid for Corus in a drive to pick up customers and technology in the fragmented global steel industry. While no formal bid has emerged, Tata Steel is likely to make an offer in coming days, according to people familiar with the matter.

Tata Steel, of Mumbai, said in a statement it is "reviewing various opportunities," but added that "there can be no certainty that an approach will be made and if made that it will result in an offer."

Tata Steel executives declined to elaborate on the statement. A Corus spokeswoman declined to comment. Details of a potential bid for Corus have yet to be determined, said the people familiar with the matter. Wednesday, before Tata Steel's interest was disclosed, Corus had a market value of about £3.6 billion ($6.8 billion).

Shares of Corus shot up 16% to a six-year high yesterday in London to 473.75 pence ($8.90). Tata Steel rose 2.7% to 537.35 rupees ($11.79) on the Bombay Stock Exchange, outpacing the 1.5% rise in the exchange's benchmark index.

DOJ_NMG_0076529

A takeover of Corus -- among the world's 10 largest steel producers -- would far exceed anything Tata Steel has attempted. Its biggest deal to date was last year's $286 million acquisition of Singapore's NatSteel Asia Pte. Ltd. Now ranked 56th among global steel producers, Tata Steel would likely have to load up on debt to make a bid for Corus, according to analysts.

While Corus is more than three times the size of Tata Steel in terms of output, the Indian company is part of a larger industrial group controlled by Ratan Tata, who wants to expand the conglomerate globally. The family-controlled company made almost $1 billion in acquisitions last year, including in hotels, chemicals and software services.

Many Indian companies are joining counterparts in China and Russia in expanding globally. The buying binge by Indian companies still is small -- $5 billion through the end of August, according to Ernst & Young consultants. But the pace and size of deals are growing rapidly. Last year, Indian companies made a record $3.7 billion in foreign acquisitions.

"Indian companies want to drive the top line up -- they are looking to buy companies much larger than themselves," says Arindam Bhattacharya, a director of Boston Consulting Group in Gurgaon, India.

Many analysts say the global steel industry is poised for a shake-up. This year, Mittal Steel Co., based in the Netherlands but controlled by the family of Indian-born tycoon Lakshmi Mittal, acquired Arcelor SA of Luxembourg for about $34 billion.

Tata Steel is no stranger to overseas forays. In addition to Singapore's NatSteel, it has acquired a controlling stake in Thailand's Millennium Steel PCL and has entered joint-venture pacts with companies in South Africa, Australia and Iran.

Corus, meanwhile, has put itself on the block. A tie-up with Tata Steel would offer one clear cost advantage: inexpensive iron ore from Tata's mines.

If Tata Steel makes a bid, Corus would likely draw attention from other buyers, analysts said. Russian metals companies have shown interest in Corus.

Vodafone, Rivals Face EU Roaming Fine, People Say (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Matthew Newman

Bloomberg, October 6, 2006

Oct. 5 (Bloomberg) -- European Union regulators are recommending a fine against Vodafone Group Plc, the world's largest mobile phone operator, and two rivals for overcharging international travelers, people with knowledge of the case said.

Staff for the European Commission, the EU's executive arm, have written a draft ruling that may also lead to fines against Vodafone's German unit, the U.K.'s O2 Plc and Deutsche Telekom AG's T-Mobile International, according to four people who declined to be identified because the draft isn't public.

``An antitrust case is an additional point of pressure," Michelle de Lussanet, an analyst at Forrester Research Inc. in Amsterdam, said in an interview. ``There are other challenges such as regulation cutting roaming fees and more price competition."

The penalties would follow France's record 534-million euro fine ($678 million) last year against the mobile-phone units of France Telecom SA, Vivendi Universal SA and Bouygues SA for colluding on prices over a six-year period. The EU typically fines companies from 2 percent to 3 percent of annual sales. The largest monopoly fine was 497 million euros levied against Microsoft Corp.

Roaming Fees

The commission is stepping up its push to lower so-called roaming charges, the fee that one operator pays another to allow its clients to make calls outside the home market. In July, the agency proposed rules that would force companies to cut the fees by as much as 70 percent. About 147 million EU citizens pay roaming charges that average five times the cost of providing the service, according to the Brussels-based commission.

A final decision on the fines will be made by the commission as early as next month, the people said. Under EU law, the commission can fine companies as much as 10 percent of their annual sales.

Jonathan Todd, a commission spokesman, said, ``We have an ongoing antitrust investigation."

David Nicholas, a spokesman at Telefonica SA's O2, said the company has filed a complaint about the commission's probe to the European Ombudsman, which reviews complaints by EU citizens and companies about administration at public institutions.

``The nature of the investigation has changed a number of times," Nicholas said. ``The way the investigation has been conducted by the EU hasn't been proper."

Five-Year Probe

``The process isn't very transparent," he said. ``We can't understand why this investigation isn't finished."

Vodafone shares fell 1.25 pence, or 1 percent, to 126 pence as of 12:05 p.m. in London. Deutsche Telekom's shares rose 8 cents to 12.68 euros in Frankfurt, while Telefonica's stock rose 7 cents to 13.78 euros in Madrid.

The ruling will cap an investigation that has lasted more than five years. EU investigators raided the offices of Vodafone and eight competitors in July 2001, searching for evidence that they violated cartel rules by fixing prices on calls between networks in Germany and the U.K.

The commission didn't find evidence of illegal collusion between network operators. The probe then shifted to possible abuse of monopoly positions in national markets.

In July 2004, Mario Monti, the former competition commissioner, charged Vodafone and O2 with ``unfair and excessive prices." The commission said at the time that the two companies' international roaming charges contrast ``sharply" with the rates used on domestic calls.

Market Definition

In February 2005, the regulator said Vodafone and T-Mobile made international travelers pay ``unfair and excessive prices" to connect calls in Germany.

``It is clear that the outcome of these two investigations will have far-reaching effects for all mobile operators in Europe and should send a clear message to all operators whose wholesale roaming prices may also be excessive," the commission said then.

The alleged infringement of antitrust law covered 1999 to 2003, the people said. A key point in the probe was how the commission defined the market.

The commission's argument is based on a legal theory -- untested in an EU court -- that each mobile operator is a monopoly unto itself because roaming users have little choice of connections and networks don't compete on price, the people said.

Foreign Operators

Regulators determined that when a network provider was indispensable for a foreign operator to have roaming in a country, then that nation was considered a separate market, the people said. Under those circumstances, the agency found that the operators dominated their national markets.

Foreign operators were forced to sign up with all national companies to get the best coverage. The commission determined that the national operators overcharged the foreign companies for that service, the people said.

Charlie McCreevy, the EU's internal market commissioner, will rule on the case because Neelie Kroes, the top competition official, excused herself because she was formerly a board member at O2. Kroes was a director at the company from 1998 to 2004.

In March 2005, O2 changed its name from MMO2. Telefonica, Spain's biggest phone company, bought O2 in 2005 for 17.7 billion pounds ($22.5 billion).

ENVIRONMENT/INDIAN AFFAIRS:

Spinach Companies Taken Aback By FBI Searches (MCT)

By Ken McLaughlin And Brandon Bailey, San Jose Mercury News

McClatchy, October 6, 2006

SAN JOSE, Calif. - When the first of the dozen or so federal agents arrived Wednesday about 9:30 a.m. at Growers Express in Salinas, Calif., equipped with side arms and search warrants, some employees initially thought it was some kind of sick joke.

It wasn't.

The FBI and Food and Drug Administration agents spent the next six hours meticulously sifting through paper and computer records looking for evidence of violations of federal law that might have led to an E. coli outbreak in bagged spinach that has now led to two confirmed deaths.

"They told us we were free to stay, but they locked down our computers and told us if we left we couldn't come back into the building," said Woody Johnson, the company's vice president of sales and marketing.

The Salinas Valley, already rocked by weeks of economic havoc, was further jolted by the raids at Growers Express and Natural Selection Foods of San Juan Bautista - whose bagged spinach has tested positive for the particular strain of E. coli involved in the outbreak.

Particularly surprising was the raid at Growers Express, often hailed as a model of food safety in the valley. Another fact that had farmers scratching their heads: Growers Express doesn't process any fresh bagged spinach, the only product found to have E. coli contamination. And the company says the small amount of bagged spinach it markets is purchased from processors not connected to the recent recall.

Johnson on Thursday tried to unravel the mystery, maintaining that the company's system for ensuring that food is safe to eat is what led to the raid - not spinach.

Growers Express, he said, serves as a sales and marketing service for independent growers, many of whom don't have the will or know-how to run a sophisticated food-safety program. So, he said, the firm provides protocol and policy procedures for ensuring the safety of their customers' products. It also contracts with third-party auditors such as Primus Labs of Santa Maria, which does E. coli testing for growers.

"We provide the independents with the price of admission to sell to national retailers," Johnson said. "We have internal audits, external audits, and there's a lot of documentation here."

Johnson said the company was shocked by the raid because Growers Express has "a policy of having our records available," saying the company doesn't have the sophistication to hide the records.

"We were surprised they chose to do it with a sledgehammer and not just pick up the phone," he said.

It was unclear if investigators were acting on suspicions involving Growers Express or one or more of its clients. Natural Selection says independent and government tests at its processing facility have come up "clean" and says it suspects the E. coli problem started "in the fields."

Spokesmen for the U.S. Attorney's office and the FBI declined to discuss the case in detail, but FBI Special Agent Joseph Schadler noted that agents could not get a warrant without convincing a judge there was reason to expect they might find evidence of a crime. Meanwhile, Idaho officials on Thursday announced that genetic tests have confirmed that the Sept. 20 death of a toddler was caused by the same strain of E. coli involved in the nationwide outbreak. Federal officials say the outbreak has sickened 192 people and also caused the death of a 77-year-old Wisconsin woman.

The Idaho case involved a 2-year-old boy, Kyle Allgood, who became ill and died after drinking a "smoothie" that his mother made from spinach, juice and berries on Sept. 12. Ross Mason, a spokesman for the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare, said the boy's mother and older sister also became ill after having some of the drink, but they have recovered.

Health officials had suspected the death was linked to the contaminated spinach, but they had to wait for lab tests to confirm the connection, Mason said.

While the original source of E. coli is still a mystery, California health officials said they are awaiting results from tests that could answer the question.

Investigators announced this week that they detected E. coli bacteria in samples of manure found in cattle pastures next to spinach fields where officials suspect the contaminated vegetables may have grown. They are now conducting genetic tests to see if the bacteria in the manure is a genetic match to the strain found on the spinach.

If the strain is the same, state officials said they also want to know how the E. coli found its way into the spinach fields. Some environmental and consumer groups say that contaminated water runoff from livestock operations is a serious potential threat to food safety.

"It's very common and very difficult to control all the time," said Christine Bruhn, a food scientist and director of the Center for Consumer Research at the University of California-Davis. She suggested a likely source of the outbreak could be contaminated water or compost containing manure that had not fully decomposed.

Federal Agents Looking For Signs Of Negligence At Spinach Plants (AP)

By Lisa Leff

AP, October 6, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO - Federal investigators trying to build a criminal case against two produce companies in the contaminated spinach outbreak are following a script first used a decade ago to prosecute a company whose E. coli-tainted apple juice killed a baby and sickened dozens of other people.

Federal officials do not think anyone deliberately contaminated the spinach with E. coli, which has killed two and sickened at least 193 others. Instead, the probe is focused on whether the companies took appropriate steps to make sure their products were OK to eat.

To be convicted of criminal charges, the companies need not have known their products were contaminated, but merely negligent in their duties to keep tainted foods from the market, legal experts said.

FBI and Food and Drug Administration agents spent 11 hours Wednesday searching Natural Selection Foods LLC and Growers Express.

DOJ_NMG_0076532

The raids largely involved sifting through records for evidence indicating the spinach producers skirted proper food safety procedures. Those records included agricultural testing results, sales information, regulatory compliance information, training records, meeting logs and employment records, according to Natural Selection.

"We are looking more toward the food safety issue at this point," FBI spokesman Joseph Schadler said Thursday, adding that the investigation was in its early stages and may or may not lead to criminal charges. It could also spread to other spinach producers, he said.

Lawyers involved in previous food poisoning cases said the government likely will try to charge the companies under the 1938 Federal Food Drug and Cosmetics Act, which makes it a crime to sell or distribute "adulterated" products - defined as any item deemed unsafe for human or animal consumption.

Distributing contaminated food through interstate commerce is usually a misdemeanor, but it can rise to a felony if authorities find evidence that company officials knowingly took action to compromise the safety of the food supply. Penalties can then include jail time.

That would be hard to prove in this case, said Fred Pritzker, a food safety lawyer in Minneapolis who represents several victims in the recent spinach scare.

"If they charge it out, it would be unusual, and could signal an egregious set of facts," he said.

Tests on spinach recalled from grocers in the affected states point to nine spinach farms that supplied produce to Natural Selection, one of the nation's largest distributors of bagged salads. The company has repeatedly asserted their plant is clean, and that they're cooperating fully with government officials investigating the case.

Growers Express operates a food-safety program in which small-scale farmers pay the company to provide health and safety inspections and maintain databases of audit reports. The company turned over these audit reports to the FDA and FBI on Wednesday.

"We make a policy of having our records available," said Vice President Woody Johnson. "It's not like we have a Web site where you can see an audit, but it's all very transparent. We're not sophisticated enough to even try to hide this."

The federal Food Drug and Cosmetic Act is unusual because simply allowing contaminated foods into interstate commerce could result in criminal charges, even if there was no intent to violate the law, said Eric Greenberg, a food safety lawyer.

"The result of prosecution under this statute is that you can be considered a criminal, and you may even go to jail, and it may simply be because you made a mistake, or one of your employees made a mistake," he said.

The government has most often used the law to go after importers who sell foreign products that don't conform to FDA standards or manufacturers who substitute inferior, cheaper ingredients in their products. After ignoring repeated warnings, for example, members of a family run business in Mississippi were sent to prison for using corn syrup to sweeten maple syrup and honey they marketed as 100 percent pure.

The 1996 Odwalla apple juice case was the first criminal conviction stemming from mass food poisoning. Although investigators never determined how the E. coli got into the apple juice, the company was held criminally liable because its juice was unpasteurized, which allowed the bacteria to thrive. Odwalla pleaded guilty and paid a $1.5 million fine - at the time the largest food injury fine in FDA history. The outbreak also led to new pasteurization and labeling requirements for fruit juices.

Since then, the act has been used to prosecute other companies. In 2001, Sara Lee Corp. pleaded guilty to selling adulterated hot dogs and lunch meats and paid a $200,000 fine after a nationwide outbreak of listeriosis killed 15 people and caused six miscarriages.

Bill Marler, a Seattle lawyer who has represented dozens of clients in lawsuits connected to contaminated greens, said the government also could prosecute farmers and processors under federal clean water laws and other environmental statutes if they failed to safeguard irrigation water.

"When you have cows in such close proximity to fields and the cows are upstream, it doesn't take a rocket scientist to find that since cows are the biggest reservoir for (E. coli) and cows poop, maybe the outbreaks have something to do with cows," Marler said.

There have been outbreaks involving greens in the past, but industry observers said this contamination's reach and the government's reaction might lead the fresh produce industry to really tighten enforcement and avoid similar incidents in the future.

"My hope is that this is the tipping point for the spinach and lettuce industry in California," Marler said. "It's time for them to come to terms with what issues they need to deal with."

Toddler's Death Linked To E. Coli Outbreak (WP/AP)

By Rebecca Boone, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076533

BOISE, Idaho -- A 2-year-old boy who died from kidney failure last month had been infected with the same strain of E. coli bacteria that prompted a nationwide consumer warning on fresh spinach, health officials said Thursday.

Kyle Allgood's was the second confirmed death in the outbreak, which also killed an elderly Wisconsin woman and sickened at least 190 other people.

"This confirms what we suspected for quite some time," said Ross Mason, a spokesman for the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare.

The boy died Sept. 20 in Salt Lake City after developing a type of kidney failure caused by E. coli. Health officials had to wait for the results of genetic testing on the bacteria to determine whether his illness was from spinach.

The sample taken from the boy was fairly small, so technicians had to let it grow for several days at a laboratory before analyzing it, officials said.

Last week, the Food and Drug Administration lifted a two-week consumer warning on fresh spinach. On Wednesday, the FBI searched two California produce companies for evidence of possible felony violations of federal environmental laws.

E. coli lives in the intestines of cattle and other animals and typically is linked to contamination by fecal material. It causes an estimated 73,000 infections each year in the United States, including 61 deaths, according to the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

Sources can include uncooked produce, raw milk, unpasteurized juice, contaminated water and meat, the agency said.

Idaho Lab Ties Death Of Boy, 2, To Spinach Drink (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

The 2-year-old who died of kidney failure set off by E. coli last month ate a spinach blend tainted with the same strain of the bacteria that has sickened nearly 200 people since mid-September, making his the second confirmed death in the outbreak, health officials say.

“It’s not a surprise,” a spokesman for the Idaho Department of Health and Welfare, Ross Mason, said Wednesday of the conclusion that the death of the toddler, Kyle Allgood of Chubbuck, Idaho, on Sept. 20 was linked to the outbreak. “We figured that would be the case.”

Scientists conducted tests since the death at a state laboratory in Boise to determine whether the E. coli strain in Kyle’s system matched the strain that killed an elderly Wisconsin woman and sickened 192 others.

The Federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention considered Kyle’s death, as well as that of an elderly Maryland woman who died on Sept. 13 after eating fresh spinach, as suspect cases possibly linked to the outbreak. Health officials in Maryland said this week that they had not reached a finding on the woman’s death.

Tests to compare E. coli strains start with stool samples. By the time Kyle’s doctors knew that he had E. coli, the kidney failure had flushed his system so completely that obtaining a sample to test was impossible, Mr. Mason said.

After Kyle died, health officials at the state laboratory in Boise found a small sample that a hospital had taken before he was transferred to Primary Children’s Medical Center in Salt Lake City, where he died, Mr. Mason said.

Bush Policy Irks Judges In West (WP)

By Blaine Harden

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

SEATTLE, Oct. 5 -- Using language that suggests they are fed up with the Bush administration, federal judges across the West have issued a flurry of rulings in recent weeks, chastising the government for repeated and sometimes willful failure to enforce laws protecting fish, forests, wildlife and clean air.

In decisions in Oregon, California, Montana and Wyoming, judges have criticized the judgment, expertise and, in some cases, integrity of the federal agencies that manage natural resources on public lands.

The rulings come at a time when an emerging bipartisan coalition of western politicians, hunters, anglers and homeowners has joined conservation groups in objecting to the rapid pace and environmental consequences of President Bush's policies for energy extraction on federal land.

Specialists in environmental law cite a noticeable increase in the number of recent court rulings in which federal judges in the West have ruled against the administration, using blunt language that shows impatience and annoyance.

"You are seeing frustration in the federal judiciary," said Dan Rohlf, a law professor at Lewis & Clark Law School, in Portland, Ore. The law school has the nation's oldest environmental law program. "When judges express that frustration on paper, which is not all that often, they are often reflecting what they see as a systematic effort to get around the law."

The most scathing and exasperated of the recent court orders came late last month out of Portland, where U.S. District Judge James A. Redden has presided for six years over a stalled federal effort to prevent endangered salmon from going extinct in the Columbia and Snake rivers.

Federal agencies "have repeatedly and collectively failed to demonstrate a willingness to do what is necessary" under the Endangered Species Act to save fish at risk of extinction, wrote Redden, who was appointed in 1980 by President Jimmy Carter.

Responding to Redden's language and to other recent critical comments by federal judges in the West, Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia J. Magnuson said: "It is regrettable whenever a court chooses to examine and speculate about the motives of a federal agency rather than applying the applicable laws to the facts of the case."

The agencies that Redden said are refusing to enforce the law include the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, which leads the salmon-recovery program, as well as the Army Corps of Engineers, the Bureau of Reclamation and the Bonneville Power Administration, which markets power from federal dams on the rivers.

Bob Lohn, regional head of NOAA Fisheries, declined to comment on Redden's criticism of his agency's work. Through a spokesman, Lohn said that any comment would be inappropriate because of legal disputes pending before Redden and other judges.

In his court last year, Redden said the administration's plans to protect fish had been proposed "more in cynicism than in sincerity." He noted in his order last month that federal agencies now "seem to be more concerned with ensuring" that Idaho irrigators get water for their crops than with mitigating the damage that dams and water diversions do to endangered fish.

Having tossed out two earlier federal plans for running the river system (one was proposed late in the Clinton era), Redden warned that he "will not allow another invalid" plan to remain in place while urgent action is needed to protect salmon. The warning suggests that the judge might halt the operation of federal dams on the Snake River -- dams that Bush has described as vital to the economy of the Northwest.

U.S. District Judge Charles R. Breyer ruled in San Francisco in late August that the "Forest Service's interest in harvesting timber has trampled" environmental laws protecting timberland in and around California's Giant Sequoia National Monument. He was appointed by President Bill Clinton in 1997.

In a much broader ruling, another federal judge in California used scolding language two weeks ago in tossing out a Bush administration plan that allowed governors to decide what national forest land is suited for logging, mining or energy development.

U.S. Magistrate Judge Elizabeth D. Laporte largely reinstated a Clinton-era "roadless rule," which had put nearly a third of the national forests off-limits to development.

Laporte chastised the administration for changing the 2001 roadless rule without regard to consequences for endangered species, and for failure to cite "any new evidence" justifying the junking of land protections that had been years in the making.

Laporte was selected as a magistrate judge in 1998 by other judges in the northern district of California.

In Montana last week, U.S. District Judge Donald W. Molloy wrote that the Fish and Wildlife Service had lost touch with science when it declined to investigate whether the North American wolverine is at risk of extinction.

Molloy, appointed by Clinton in 1996, found "a dramatic loss" in the range of wolverines, a decrease in their population and growing threats to the weasel-like scavenger from genetic isolation and human encroachment.

The Fish and Wildlife Service, he ruled, had ignored "substantial scientific information that would lead a reasonable person to conclude" that listing wolverines as endangered or threatened may be warranted. He ordered the agency to look into the matter for a year.

In western Wyoming, the Bureau of Land Management ignored air-quality and wildlife data when it sold energy leases on national forest land in western Wyoming, according to a September ruling by Bruce R. Harris, a deputy chief administrative judge who works for the land appeals board in the Interior Department.

The ruling temporarily halted energy development on 20,000 acres in the Wyoming Range, where hiking outfitters and conservation groups have fought the encroachment of oil and natural gas exploration.

Specifically, Harris wrote that the BLM had not made itself aware of a recent study showing that endangered lynx were living within the leased parcel. He said that "little, if any, attention was given to air quality issues" before granting the lease. In the nearby Pinedale region, extensive gas drilling on BLM land has caused widespread air pollution.

Federal court rulings in much of the West are appealed to the San Francisco-based U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit. Like lower courts in the West, it has often been caustically critical of the Bush administration.

Wildlife Report Paints 'Bleak Picture' Of West (LAT)

By Robert Lee Hotz

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076535

Rising temperatures in the 11 Western states from global warming will cause more pervasive droughts, a four-fold increase in wildfires and extensive die-offs in regional plant, fish and game habitats, according to a report Thursday by the National Wildlife Federation.

To avoid the consequences of climate change, the 1 million-member wildlife organization urged national limits, following those recently adopted in California, on the greenhouse gases responsible for rising temperatures, such as carbon dioxide and methane.

The national appetite for energy, fed by carbon-rich coal, oil and natural gas, imposes a double penalty on the ecological health of the West, the group said. The search for fossil fuels -- drilling permits on public lands have tripled in six years -- disrupts fragile habitats, even as the rising levels of carbon dioxide alter the regional climate in ways that will make it impossible for many species to survive.

The federation report, called "Fueling The Fire," brings a regional focus to climate research findings from federal agencies, academic reports and science journals.

The researchers offered growing evidence that rising regional temperatures already have had an effect, causing warmer winters, earlier springs, less snow and more rain. That, in turn, has raised the risk of floods in winter and the likelihood of diminished water supplies in summer.

The winter snow pack, the source of 75 percent of the water supply in the West, has declined by almost a third in the northern Rocky Mountain region and more than 50 percent in the Cascades since 1950, the federation reported.

As the Western landscape becomes ever more desiccated, wildfires consequently become more common, more widespread and harder to control, experts said.

This past wildfire season was the most severe on record, said ecologist Steven Running at the University of Montana College of Forestry and Conservation. During the past summer, more than 9.6 million acres burned -- twice the seasonal average -- and firefighters spent a record $1.5 billion to control them.

"The warming trend we are under is clearly accelerating and expanding the wildfire activity," Running said. "There is no reason we can see that it will reverse anytime soon."

Anacostia Club Charged With Illegal Dumping (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

Federal authorities have filed a criminal charge against a yacht club along the Anacostia River for illegal dumping months after D.C. officials said the club was in the running for a prestigious environmental award.

The District Yacht Club illegally discharged 240 square feet of concrete debris into the river in 2003, according to recent misdemeanor charges filed by the U.S. Attorney's Office in federal court in the District.

According to the charging documents, which do not name any yacht club members or officers , the club dumped the concrete into the Anacostia without seeking a permit.

Criminal prosecution under the federal Refuse Act, which the yacht club is accused of violating, includes penalties of up to $2,500 for each violation and/or imprisonment ranging from a month to a year.

The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, which monitors discharge permits, yesterday referred questions about the investigation to the Justice Department.

Justice Department spokeswoman Cynthia Magnuson said that a hearing in the case is scheduled Dec. 5. A plea deal is expected in the case, according to court records.

The charges come four months after D.C. officials announced that the District Yacht Club was one of four yacht clubs and marinas in the District being considered for an official designation in the "Clean Marina Award" program.

Yacht club officials could not be reached for comment yesterday.

A volunteer at the club, who asked that his name not be published, said that the concrete ended up in the river in connection with a project to install a rail system used to help lift boats in and out of the water.

The volunteer said that the concrete was being used as a foundation to provide support for the rail system, but that the government's investigation mostly centered on the failure to obtain a permit from the Army Corps of Engineers.

The volunteer also said that the yacht club is a small organization with about three dozen members. He said that club members plan to meet to discuss the case this weekend.

It's not clear what prompted the investigation. Under federal law, tipsters who provide information leading to successful prosecution under the federal Refuse Act can receive half of whatever amount a judge determines violators should pay in fines.

Interior Dept. To Study Potential Impact Of Choctaw Casino Project In Mississippi (USAT)

By Ana Radelat, Gannett News Service

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — The Interior Department will examine a proposal for a casino the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians hopes to build in Jackson County.

In a notice in the Federal Register on Wednesday, the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) said it intends to study the potential environmental impact of the casino, which would consist of a hotel, shops and parking near the intersection of Highway 57 and Interstate 10.

State officials oppose the project.

"The governor campaigned against it and consistently said he opposes the expansion of gaming beyond where it is today," said Pete Smith, Gov. Haley Barbour's spokesman.

Sen. Trent Lott, R-Miss., says the project would pose unfair competition for Gulf Coast casinos that, unlike tribal enterprises, aren't exempt from state taxes and other regulations.

The complex would be built on 40 acres the tribe owns in Jackson County and 61 adjoining acres the Choctaws have asked the federal government to put into trust, which would take it out of state control.

The environmental impact study will assess the proposed casino's effects on traffic and wildlife, air quality and sewage and water systems. Possible social and economic impacts also will be reviewed.

The BIA established a 30-day period for the public to comment on the proposal and has scheduled a public meeting Oct. 18 on the project in the Ocean Springs Civic Center.

It called the Choctaws' plan a "preferred alternative" for the land, saying it would "maximize potential economic benefits" for the tribe and create jobs. Otherwise, the BIA notice said, the Choctaws would close two county businesses: First American Printing and Direct Mail and First American Plastic Molding, which together employ more than 100 people.

Kurt Chandler, the BIA's regional environmental scientist in Nashville, said Choctaw Chief Phillip Martin decided to pay at least $2 million for the environmental impact statement to convince residents and Mississippi officials that it would not have any negative consequences.

Choctaw representatives could not be reached for comment.

HAZCLEAN Environmental Consultants of Jackson will do most of the work on the environmental impact study under the supervision of the BIA.

"Nothing is going to get past me," Chandler said. He said the study will take six to nine months.

Farewell, Martha (WP)

HOLLYWOOD WOULD have scripted a different ending for the saga of Martha, the bald eagle who with her mate, George, captured the imagination of the Washington area. But rather than feeling sad for what has been lost, we prefer to focus on the lessons that this improbable pair imparted about the beauty and value of the natural world.

Martha was put to sleep this week after veterinarians wisely concluded that it would be cruel to keep her alive in captivity following injuries that would have prevented her from ever flying again. Martha and George were so named by workers building a replacement for the Wilson Bridge, which the two bald eagles nested near in spite of the noise and commotion. They became mascots, and a public eager to imbue animals with human qualities saw love and loyalty as they stayed together and, over the years, produced 16 eaglets. Martha was injured in an attack by another bird in April, and her struggle to recover and rejoin George became national news.

That attack epitomizes both the good and bad news about the state of bald eagles today. Once threatened with extinction, the bald eagles' population has rebounded to a point where some are suggesting they no longer need to be on the endangered species list. The eagle that attacked Martha is a sign of that increase; the battle, which was over territory, is evidence of the loss of habitat to urban encroachment.

George and Martha showed thousands of commuters a better side to a lousy ride over a bridge. As a result, many drove away with a new respect for wildlife.

Study Says Lab Meltdown Caused Cancer (LAT)

By Amanda Covarrubias, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

Scientists say details about the 1959 accident near Simi Valley continue to be withheld. Other contamination at the site is much clearer.

DOJ_NMG_0076537

Radioactive emissions from a 1959 nuclear accident at a research lab near Simi Valley appear to have been much greater than previously suspected and could have resulted in hundreds of cancers in surrounding communities, according to a study released Thursday.

Chemical contamination from rocket engine testing at the site continues to threaten soil and groundwater in the area around Rocketdyne's Santa Susana Field Laboratory, the study also found.

The nuclear meltdown, which remained virtually unknown to the public until 1979, could have caused between 260 and 1,800 cases of cancer "over a period of many decades," the study concluded.

But the advisory panel that oversaw the five-year study, conducted by an independent team of scientists and health experts, said it could not offer more specifics about potential exposure to carcinogens because the Department of Energy and Rocketdyne's owner, Boeing Co., did not provide key information.

"This lack of candor … makes characterization of the potential health impacts of past accidents and releases extremely difficult," the panel concluded.

Boeing officials vigorously disputed the findings, saying the study was based on miscalculations and faulty information.

"We disagree entirely with the report's conclusion," said Phil Rutherford, a health, safety and radiation manager for the company. He cited a Boeing-commissioned study released last year that found overall cancer deaths among employees at the field lab and at Canoga Park facilities between 1949 and 1999 were lower than in the general population.

The Boeing report contradicted findings from an earlier UCLA study that found elevated cancer deaths among workers exposed to high levels of radiation.

Critics chided Boeing officials Thursday for failing to provide information for the new study.

"The pattern of secrecy and misrepresentation that began at the time of the accident continues to this day, where sloppy practices are done under a cover of darkness," said Dan Hirsch, a physicist and co-chairman of the advisory panel.

The lab was opened on a craggy plateau in easternmost Ventura County in 1948 as the nearby San Fernando and Simi valleys were on the cusp of a postwar population boom. Originally operated by North American Rockwell, it conducted nuclear research for the federal government for more than four decades before ceasing those operations in the late 1980s. It has also been the site of more than 30,000 rocket engine tests, the thunderous explosions serving as a Cold War-era hallmark for nearby residents.

The 2,850-acre site has been the source of much controversy since the nuclear accident was first widely publicized in 1979. A team of UCLA graduate students obtained documents through the Freedom of Information Act detailing the meltdown.

The disclosure resulted in a number of environmental studies that found widespread radioactive and chemical contamination at the lab. In turn, several investigations into the potential impact on the health of lab workers and area residents were triggered.

The advisory panel was created by local legislators in the early 1990s to oversee some of the studies. Its new report specifically focuses on how the lab's operations, which included decades of rocket engine testing, may have affected the health of people in nearby communities.

The study, paid with federal funding, asserted that the rocket engine tests had caused chemical contamination of water and soil in nearby areas in recent years and "may indicate pathways for other contaminants."

Among the scientists' other key findings:

· As much as 30% of the most worrisome compounds associated with nuclear testing at the lab, iodine-131 and cesium-137, may have been released into the air. But Boeing's Rutherford said data from the site's own airborne monitoring system refutes that claim.

· Unable to obtain weather data from Boeing, scientists made calculations based on varying assumptions about wind speed and direction and estimated the number of potential cancers at 260, with the rare possibility that the number could be as high as 1,800, within 62 square miles surrounding the field lab.

"These cancers, if they occurred, would have been amidst a population of several million people and over a period of many decades," the report said. "The ability of epidemiological studies to identify these cancers, if they exist, in a population that large, is limited, given the uncertainty of where the exposures occurred."

· Perchlorate, a component of rocket fuel, migrated off the lab site, toward populated areas, in surface water runoff. Other contaminants may have spread off site in this manner as well, the report said.

The report also disclosed little-known information about lab operations: It was home to 10 nuclear reactors and numerous low-power reactors, plutonium and uranium carbide fabrication plants and a "hot lab" used for remotely cutting up irradiated nuclear fuel shipped in from other federal nuclear plants.

About 150 people attended a public meeting Thursday night to discuss the report's findings. Many of those in the audience are residents or former residents of the area surrounding the field lab.

They said they appreciated the findings and hoped the report would spur regulators to force a thorough cleanup of the site.

Marjorie Weems, who lives on property adjoining the site, said her daughter, Priscilla, 34, had to have part of her thyroid removed 13 years ago and worries about a possible connection to the lab's operations.

"It's been such a coverup for so many years," said Weems, 62, whose husband, now retired, worked at the lab. "They lied and lied and lied and said there was no contamination. But now we know that's not true."

At the time of the 1959 nuclear accident, little information appeared in the media. Lab officials released a statement saying "no release of radioactive materials to the plant or its environs occurred, and operating personnel were not exposed to harmful conditions."

The advisory panel overseeing the most recent study accused the lab's operators of maintaining a pattern of deception and secrecy ever since.

For instance, it said researchers discovered that a meteorological station was atop the nuclear reactor on July 13, 1959, when fuel rods ruptured and partially melted, emitting radioactive gases into the plant and the atmosphere.

When the researchers requested the station's weather data to try to determine how far radioactive gases may have traveled from the hilltop lab, Boeing officials refused, asserting that the information was "proprietary — a trade secret," the panelists said in the report.

"How can you possibly declare a trade secret which way the wind blew on a certain day?" Hirsch said.

Boeing officials said they do not recall any specific requests for weather data, adding that such information might not even exist.

Santa Susana Field Laboratory timeline

1959: Fuel rods in the first nuclear reactor in the country to produce electricity for a commercial power grid rupture and partially melt, releasing radioactive gases into the atmosphere. But the accident is not widely publicized until 1979.

1997: A UCLA health study, which reviewed the records of employees of Rocketdyne and predecessor North American Aviation from 1949 to 1994, finds elevated cancer deaths among workers exposed to high levels of radiation.

2005: A health study by lab owner Boeing Corp. concludes that overall cancer deaths among nearly 47,000 employees who worked at the Rocketdyne lab and its Canoga Park facilities between 1949 and 1999 were lower than in the general population.

2006: An independent panel of scientists releases a report that finds the 1959 nuclear accident appears to have been much worse than previously suspected and could have resulted in hundreds of cancers in surrounding communities. It also finds that chemical contamination from rocket engine testing at the site continues to threaten area soil and groundwater.

Firm Fights Pollution Charges (SLT)

By Judy Fahys, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, October 6, 2006

Lawyers for a West Valley company and two of its managers say local water officials bungled the pollution limits that are behind a 29-count federal indictment against their clients.

Accused of tampering with pollution readings, the three have filed suit in 3rd District Court in hopes of proving the limits on selenium were illegal and, consequently, that a dozen of the charges should be dismissed from the federal pollution case.

The selenium cap at the Central Valley Water Reclamation Facility "was not properly set, and therefore, we shouldn't be held criminally responsible," said Max Wheeler, one of the three defense attorneys on the case.

The U.S. Justice Department indicted the Pennsylvania-based Johnson Matthey Inc. in March and charged John David McKelvie, the former general manager of the West Valley plant, and Plant Manager Paul Card Greaves with violations of the Clean Water Act.

The indictment includes charges of conspiracy to discharge pollutants in excess of permit limits, selective sampling, concealment and manipulating wastewater discharges. One time, the indictment alleges, freshwater from a hose was added to discharge water to dilute the selenium.

The company faces maximum penalties of $12.5 million. McKelvie faces fines of $4.5 million and 90 years in prison. Greaves faces 125 years in prison and nearly $6.3 million in fines.

Reed Fisher of the Central Valley Water Reclamation Facility referred comments on the case to the Justice Department. The Justice Department did not return a telephone call seeking comment.

In past statements, Fisher has noted that even with the allegedly high discharges from Johnson Matthey into the Jordan River, the district kept within its own discharge limits for selenium.

Selenium is a naturally occurring element. Small amounts of it are required for good nutrition, but too much can cause havoc with human health and wildlife. A state task force is looking at curbing the human sources of selenium in the Great Salt Lake, which some suspect is harming waterfowl reproduction.

Wheeler called Johnson Matthey's selenium discharges "a zero-impact situation" because of the "inconsequential" amounts that wound up in the Jordan River.

He said the water reclamation district used the wrong chart from the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to set its limits. Had it used the correct table, the limits would have been nearly three times higher, and 12 counts of the indictment would be invalidated.

A Bad Start In The Parks (NYT)

Just before it made tracks out of town, the Senate confirmed Mary Bomar's appointment as the new head of the National Park Service. Ms. Bomar testified in person in late September before the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, but the bulk of her testimony took the form of written answers to written questions posed by members of the committee. Her answers were intently managerial in tone — not particularly evasive and not particularly helpful.

At one point, for instance, Ms. Bomar was asked to list the "three greatest challenges facing the Park Service." Number one, she said, is "re-energizing the support of the American people," and number three is "preparing a new generation of leadership." (Two is improving the park service's "capabilities.")

In reality, the biggest challenge facing the service is to take politics out of parks management. Again and again over the past six years, demoralized career park service employees have been forced to watch sensible decisions overturned or bad decisions made on a political basis. They have witnessed a brazen attempt to break the parks wide open in favor of commercial interests. They've seen the integrity of park service science compromised and its results disregarded.

If Ms. Bomar can put the national park system back on a sound managerial footing, she will not need to re-energize the support of the American people.

There are a lot of ways Ms. Bomar could set a new tone and demonstrate her commitment to apolitical good management. One opportunity involves the problem of snowmobiles in Yellowstone. Ms. Bomar said recent experience has demonstrated that snowmobiles "may be operated without unacceptable impacts to park resources and visitors" under the current limits and requirements. That is exactly what has not happened.

For the past two winters, snowmobile numbers have been running about 250 a day in Yellowstone — roughly a third of the maximum allowed under a temporary plan. Even that smaller number exceeds the weakened noise standards established by the Bush administration in 2003, and the National Park Service has rejected two environmental impact statements that find the presence of snowmobiles in Yellowstone unacceptable.

But Senator Conrad Burns, who is facing a tough battle for re-election in Montana, has proposed legislation that would force the park to continue admitting up to 720 snowmobiles a day and strip the courts of their ability to rule on the issue. It is a classic face-off between the forces of politics and parks stewardship. Ms. Bomar had a chance to send a message about her intention to manage impartially, in her written responses. She missed the opportunity.

The Interior Department has recently approved a strong set of management policies that put preservation first. Ms. Bomar would do well to put those policies first and put an end, at last, to snowmobiles in Yellowstone.

Judge Order Bonds's Trainer Released, Citing `Snafu' (Update1) (BLOOM)

By Karen Gullo

DOJ_NMG_0076540

Bloomberg, October 6, 2006

Oct. 5 (Bloomberg) -- Greg Anderson, baseball player Barry Bonds's trainer, will be released from jail today after being held for contempt for refusing to testify in a federal steroid probe, a judge said, citing a court error.

U.S. District Court Judge William Alsup, noting a ``snafu" in his handling of Anderson's case, said U.S. marshals in San Francisco should release Anderson today at 5 p.m. local time.

Yesterday a three-judge panel of a San Francisco-based appeals court said Anderson must be released under a law that requires contempt appeals to be resolved within 30 days. Anderson was jailed Aug. 28 for refusing to answer grand jury questions about whether Bonds and other athletes lied to a grand jury about using steroids. He could have been jailed for months.

``This snafu has arisen because of an apparent failure of this court to be clear in its findings," said Alsup in a ruling today. ``He will be released on his own recognizance."

Mark Geragos, Anderson's attorney, couldn't be reached. Anderson was ordered to appear at an Oct. 19 hearing. The appeals court could order Anderson back to jail after reviewing Alsup's findings concerning the legality of a government tape of Anderson. Alsup has not issued a written ruling on his findings. Anderson said the tape, which the government refused to turn over, is illegal and tainted the grand jury proceedings.

The government is seeking Anderson's testimony to determine whether any athletes, including Bonds, lied to a federal grand jury about taking steroids. Bonds has denied using them.

Anderson was jailed for 15 days in July for refusing to testify and released when the grand jury's term expired. A new grand jury then resumed the probe. Anderson again refused to testify about Bonds when brought before the panel on Aug. 17, prosecutors said.

Anderson pleaded guilty last year to distributing steroids to unidentified athletes and served three months in jail. He is trying to withdraw the guilty plea.

The case is Greg Anderson v U.S., 06-90292, U.S. District Court, San Francisco.

Bonds' Trainer Released From Jail (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

Greg Anderson's newfound freedom may be short-lived.

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) -- Barry Bonds' personal trainer Greg Anderson walked out of prison Thursday hours after a federal judge ordered him released because of a "legal snafu."

U.S. District Judge William Alsup told marshals to free Anderson because a federal appeals court hadn't affirmed his contempt order within the required 30 days after he was jailed for refusing to testify to a grand jury investigating the Giants slugger.

Anderson, 40, could be returned to prison if the appeals court affirms Anderson's Aug. 28 contempt citation for refusing to answer questions before the panel probing whether Bonds committed perjury when he said he never knowingly used steroids.

Bonds told a grand jury investigating the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative steroid ring in 2003 that Anderson gave him what he believed were flaxseed oil and arthritic balm. Anderson later pleaded guilty to distributing steroids and money laundering.

Anderson, who served three months in prison and three months of home detention for his conviction, has appealed his contempt jailing on several fronts.

His main contention is that a secret, illegally recorded tape of him discussing Bonds' steroid use is the basis for grand jury questions he faces.

Although Alsup dismissed that claim and others, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeal last week sent Anderson's appeal back to the judge, saying Alsup's ruling regarding the tape was not clear enough.

"This snafu has arisen by an apparent failure by the court to be clear of its findings," Alsup said.

In clarifying his order Thursday, Alsup said he agreed with prosecutors that there was ample evidence beyond the tape to question Anderson. Prosecutors on Thursday said the questions they want answered are based on athletes' secret testimony in the BALCO case and a search of Anderson's house that turned up drug records, some with Bonds' name on it.

The appeals court could rule any day.

Anderson has been imprisoned twice for refusing to testify whether Bonds used steroids. He served 15 days in July and was let out because the grand jury probing the Giants slugger had expired and a new grand jury was formed.

Other than the tape dispute, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has rejected the merits of Anderson's appeal. Among them, Anderson claimed his BALCO plea deal prevented him from cooperating with the government's steroid investigation.

Anderson will seek to withdraw his 2005 guilty plea because the tape amounts to an illegal wiretap and may have been the basis for the BALCO case against Anderson, defense lawyer Mark Geragos said.

Prosecutors claim the tape is legal and was made in a face-to-face meeting with Anderson.

Bonds's Trainer Is Released From Prison (NYT)

By Carol Pogash

The New York Times, October 5, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 5 — Barry Bonds's personal trainer, Greg Anderson, was released from prison Thursday after what Judge William Alsup of the United States District Court called "a snafu."

Anderson, 40, was being held in contempt of court for refusing to answer grand jury questions about Bonds in connection with the ongoing investigation of the Bay Area Laboratory Co-Operative. Anderson, who has been jailed three times in connection with the case, most recently on Aug. 28, could be returned to prison.

In the late morning, the somber-looking Anderson, who had come to work wearing an ill-fitting tan prison uniform, strode out of the federal building here sporting a new navy extra-large navy sweatshirt, large gray sweatpants and laced black shoes with the tag still attached. After his release, his lawyer, Mark Geragos, had rushed to a Levi's store in the rain to purchase clothes for his client.

On Sept. 28, a federal appeals court heard six claims from Geragos challenging the contempt order. The court sent the case back to Judge Alsup for clarification on one of those claims: that the grand jury questions Anderson refused to answer were based on an illegally recorded tape of Anderson discussing steroid use by Bonds.

A person in prison on federal civil contempt charges is entitled to bail if his appeal is not disposed of in 30 days. Thursday marked Anderson's 37th day in jail. On Wednesday, the appeals court ordered that Anderson be released by 5 p.m. the next day.

Judge Alsup blamed himself for "the apparent failure of this court to be clear in its findings" and the government for not supplying evidence. "Mr. Anderson should not bear the burden of these omissions," the judge said before releasing him on his own recognizance.

Anderson is still not free of the investigation. If he is called before the grand jury again and refuses to answer questions about Bonds, he could be returned to prison.

AP, October 6, 2006

OKLAHOMA CITY Federal officials in Oklahoma City say 21 gang members and their associates face a total of 85 conspiracy, gun and drug-related charges in a federal indictment that was unsealed today.U-S Attorney John C. Richter says the defendants are members or associates of the Walnut Gangster Crips. They're accused of conspiring with four unindicted coconspirators to possess with intent to distribute more than 30 kilograms of cocaine, cocaine powder and over 1,000 tablets of ecstasy.The indictment alleges that members of the street gang associated themselves with others who acquired the cocaine powder in Los Angeles to manufacture the crack for redistribution in the Oklahoma City area.The indictment seeks forfeiture of firearms, ammunition, cash and some property.

Local Men May Get 40-year Terms In Marijuana Case (TUCCIT)

Tucson Citizen, October 6, 2006

Mark A. Simmons, 35, and Ernest R. Washington, 37, were found guilty by a Tucson jury Wednesday.

Prosecutors said the men plotted to move the drugs between Tucson and Ohio. During the investigation, officials seized about 1,500 pounds of marijuana while it was being transported between the states.

Evidence at the trial showed the men used rental cars and tractor trailers in 2003 and 2004 to transport the drugs. Three kilograms of cocaine seized in Philadelphia were also linked to the two, authorities said.

A drug conspiracy conviction carries a maximum penalty of 40 years in prison. Sentencing for the men is scheduled for Dec. 14.

Man Sentenced For Dealing Ecstasy, Conspiracy (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0076542

AP, October 6, 2006

BALTIMORE, Md. -- A New Jersey man who operated an Ecstasy drug ring and tried to have an informant killed has been sentenced in Baltimore.

U.S. Attorney Rod Rosenstein said Fred Caruso was sentenced to 13 years and seven months in prison, followed by five years of supervised release.

Caruso was charged with conspiracy to distribute Ecstasy, conspiracy to retaliate against a witness and conspiracy to commit kidnapping, police said.

Caruso pleaded guilty to distributing ecstasy in Maryland and New Jersey from 1999 to 2000.

Rosenstein said Caruso began selling in 2000 to a man named Thomas Dixon. Dixon was under police surveillance when he received the first delivery of about 41,000 tablets. Dixon was arrested and agreed to cooperate with law enforcement, officials said.

After agreeing to testify against Caruso in 2002, Dixon was shot six times as he left his home but survived.

Rosenstein said court documents showed Caruso admitted hiring individuals to shoot Dixon.

DEA Rounds Up Nine In Suspected Drug Ring (SDUT)

Union-tribune Breaking News Team

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 5, 2006

SAN DIEGO – The arrest of nine people Wednesday by drug enforcement officials has dismantled of a major drug trafficking organization operating in San Diego, authorities said.

Agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration arrested the group, seized three pounds of methamphetamine and confiscated about $30,000 after serving seven search warrants, said Dan Simmons, a spokesman for the DEA.

The organization reportedly distributed several pounds of methamphetamine, several times a week to buyers in San Diego County, Las Vegas and Omaha, Neb., and sold more than $100,000 worth of methamphetamine a month, officials said.

Also seized were three weapons, two vehicles and bullet-proof gear.

Rosenstein Case Witnesses Ask For Disguises (JERP)

The Jerusalem Post, October 5, 2006

The six Israel Police detectives who are due to testify at the trial of suspected drug dealer Ze'ev Rosenstein in Miami requested permission on Thursday to appear in court wearing wigs and make up fake so that their identities would not be exposed.

In addition, the detectives also asked to be identified in court by their police numbers only, not by name.

The detectives made the request out of fear that they would be targeted by Rosenstein's associated when they continued to work in Israel after the trial.

Rosenstein, identified by federal prosecutors as one of the world's biggest distributors of Ecstasy has pleaded not guilty to charges that could put him in prison for up to 40 years.

The 51-year-old entered the plea in May, nearly three months after he was extradited from Israel to face charges that he conspired to distribute more than 1 million Ecstasy pills in the US between summer 1999 and November 2001.

MIAMI Israeli undercover agents want to wear wigs, fake facial hair and makeup so they can testify without revealing their true identities at the upcoming trial of a man charged with running a worldwide Ecstasy distribution ring.

As many as six surveillance officers of the Israel National Police also want to appear in the U.S. federal trial of Zeev Rosenstein using only an "officer identification number" rather than their names. They want to limit defense cross-examination that might reveal confidential tactics and spy technology.

"The underlying principle behind these procedures is that in order to operate effectively in a country like Israel, an undercover surveillance officer must preserve his or her complete anonymity," U.S. prosecutors Michael Sullivan and Ben Greenberg said in a motion filed in federal court this week.

Rosenstein, 51, is scheduled to go to trial in November on charges of conspiracy to distribute in the U.S. more than 1 million pills of the synthetic drug MDMA, more commonly known as Ecstasy. Rosenstein is on the U.S. list of 44 top worldwide drug traffickers. He has pleaded not guilty and has been held without bail since his extradition from Israel in March.

The prosecutors' motion says that the Israeli agents' testimony "goes to the heart" of the U.S. case because they witnessed numerous meetings Rosenstein allegedly had with other conspirators in the Ecstasy ring. There was no audio surveillance, making these eyewitness accounts even more critical, the motion said.

In the U.S. justice system, a defendant has a right to confront and cross-examine accusers, and courts have ruled both ways on whether witnesses may testify in disguises because of concerns about that right and about the impact on jurors. The Israeli government, however, said cover for these agents would be forever blown if they are not disguised.

"In stressing the importance of these protections, we wish to note that Israel is a very small country, with a relatively small and close-knit organized criminal community," the Israeli Ministry of Justice said in a letter to U.S. prosecutors. "The exposure of the identity of any surveillance officer thus inevitably means the end of his or her effectiveness."

The motion asks U.S. District Judge William Dimitrouleas to approve a "light disguise" for the Israeli agents "including makeup, wigs and/or other facial hair for men" as well as the restrictions on questioning about methods and use of numbers instead of names. Dimitrouleas had not ruled on the motion as of Thursday.

Rosenstein's attorney, Howard Srebnick, did not immediately return telephone and e-mail messages seeking comment about the request.

Undercover Agents May Testify In Disguises At Trial Of Accused Israeli Drug Lord (FLSUNSEN)

By Vanessa Blum, South Florida Sun-sentinel

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, October 5, 2006

Prosecutors in the case of accused Israeli drug lord Ze'ev Rosenstein want Israeli undercover agents testifying at his Miami trial to wear disguises and use numbers instead of names to protect their identities.

They filed a motion Monday requesting the special measures, which are mandated by Israeli law but go against a fundamental principle of American justice -- a defendant's right to confront witnesses at trial.

They proposed the agents be referred to by identification numbers and appear in court wearing "light" disguises such as wigs, makeup and artificial facial hair.

"Rosenstein will still have the opportunity for a virtually unfettered face-to-face encounter with the undercover surveillance officers," the brief states. The prosecutors also asked U.S. District Judge William Dimitrouleas to bar defense lawyers from asking the agents probing questions about their investigative techniques or devices.

Rosenstein, a suspected mob boss whom some Israelis liken to Al Capone , was extradited to South Florida in March on charges he conspired to import and distribute Ecstasy in the United States.

He pleaded not guilty and his trial is scheduled to start in November.

Sullivan and Greenberg plan to put on the stand six current and former Israeli agents to testify about their surveillance of meetings involving Rosenstein and his alleged associates.

The disguises worn by the agents would not obscure their eyes or distort their voices, so jurors would still be able to assess their credibility, the lawyers stated.

The agents' true names are not relevant because jurors would be informed the witnesses are undercover officers employed by the Israeli government, the lawyers said.

Howard Srebnick, Rosenstein's defense attorney, could not be reached.

Miami defense lawyer Jane Moscowitz, who is not involved in the case, said the government's request should be rejected because it violates one of the basic tenets of a fair trial.

"I understand Israel's concern, but if these agents are going to testify in U.S. courts, they should testify under our rules," Moscowitz said.

In June, an Illinois federal judge agreed to close the courtroom during testimony from two Israeli intelligence agents in a terrorism fundraising case.

The agents will also use code names and wear light disguises when they appear in court.

While such cases are the exception, judges have permitted witnesses to use fictitious names or testify in disguise.

Rome Businessman Indicted In Marijuana Distribution Case (AP)

AP, October 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076544

ROME, Ga. _ A northwest Georgia businessman and real estate investor pleaded not guilty Thursday to charges of conspiring to distribute more than a ton of marijuana.

Mario Armas, 45, also entered a not guilty plea to a related charge of money laundering.

A federal indictment and a search warrant affidavit unsealed Thursday morning alleges that Armas conspired with Lonnie Merren and Kevin Redstrom, both of Rockmart, between January 2003 and November 2004 to distribute at least 1,000 kilograms _ 2,200 pounds _ of marijuana in the Rome area, U.S. Attorney David E. Nahmias said.

The drug dealing was allegedly linked to other crimes, including kidnapping, burglary and laundering the profits of drug deals. Search warrants were executed Thursday at business and residential properties related to Armas and the alleged drug scheme.

Armas owns multiple businesses and properties in the Rome area.

"The indictment unsealed today is the result of a two-year investigation into allegations of drug trafficking and money laundering of at least $2 million generated by marijuana sales in Northwest Georgia," Nahmias said in a statement. He called Armas the "principal financier," using his business, N & A Corporation, as a front. He said Redstrom and Merren allegedly were money couriers for Armas.

Armas remains in federal custody, and a bond hearing is scheduled for him Wednesday.

Agents from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and Drug Enforcement Administration have been investigating and gathering evidence at Armas' home and office. More than a dozen cars were parked out front of Armas' home Thursday, and officers and agents were seen entering and leaving with boxes and tools.

Merren and Redstrom are both expected to be arrested in separate locations outside Georgia and will make their initial appearances before the magistrate judge next week.

U.N.: Afghan Opium May Up Heroin Deaths (UPI)

UPI, October 5, 2006

VIENNA, Oct. 5 (UPI) -- The U.N. Office on Drugs and Crime warns the robust Afghan opium trade will likely cause a dramatic increase of heroin-overdose fatalities.

In a letter sent to nearly 90 health ministers, the text of which was released Thursday, UNODC Executive Director Antonio Maria Costa advised health authorities to prepare for "a substantial increase in the number of deaths by overdose."

The 2006 Afghan Opium Survey released last month revealed a record production of 6,100 tons of opium, an increase of 49 percent from 2005.

"The abundant supply of Afghan heroin is likely to result in dramatic increases in the purity of street heroin," Costa said in the letter sent from UNODC headquarters in Vienna. "Addicts are not used to injecting doses containing such high concentrations of the drug."

He called on the Afghan government to take strong action against opium traffickers and trade violators and encouraged local health authorities "to take every possible measure in the period ahead and to alert practitioners to the possible risk increase." In order to effect change, the director proposed penalizing governors and police officials presiding over opium-growing provinces and suggested drug-free areas be rewarded.

Western countries must also help, he said, adding "heroin habits in the West put huge sums of money into the pockets of criminals and insurgents, who destabilize Afghanistan and kill soldiers and civilians alike."

Uribe Hinting At Talks With FARC (MH)

By Steven Dudley

The Miami Herald, October 6, 2006

BOGOTA - Despite a strong mandate validating his first four years of waging all-out war against leftist rebels, Colombian President Alvaro Uribe has opted for a more peaceful beginning to his second term.

Since his inauguration in August, Uribe has reached out to leaders of the hemisphere's largest rebel group, the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia or FARC, by offering to swap imprisoned rebels for kidnapped politicians, citizens and soldiers in guerrilla hands.

"The result of this security campaign can't just be of scorched earth, killing guerrillas and putting at risk our soldiers," Uribe said on local radio this week, referring to his so-called Democratic Security plan. ``This policy of Democratic Security is a way to achieve total reconciliation among us Colombians."

The seeming about-face by Uribe comes just months after the president and his allies won landslide victories in this year's presidential and congressional elections. The elections were seen as a validation of Uribe's policy to strengthen the country's armed forces and police, and launch unprecedented military offensives in various parts of the country, which forced the guerrillas to seek hiding and lowered rebel violence and kidnapping rates.

But results in the war have been waning of late. Uribe also has been hit by scandals in the military and recent reports that the production of coca, the raw material for cocaine, continues apace despite years of concerted attack on what many consider the principal funding source for warring groups in this country of 42 million people.

"Initially, Uribe insisted on ending the guerrillas by fighting them," said former Inspector General Jaime Bernal Cuéllar. ``But now he has two things going against him: the impossibility of winning the war against the guerrillas, and the polls that show the majority of Colombians are for a prisoner swap."

Yet, some analysts say Uribe has always had it in his mind to negotiate. Uribe has already negotiated with right-wing paramilitaries -- who also fought the guerrillas -- leading to the demobilization of more than 32,000 illegally armed troops and the surrender of the group's top commanders.

Uribe also began preliminary peace talks with guerrillas from the country's second-largest rebel group, the National Liberation Army, or ELN, in Cuba.

"At the end of the day, Uribe is a political realist," said Fernando Cubides, a sociology professor at the National University in Bogotá.

IMPOSSIBLE TASK

``Inside he knew that a military defeat of the guerrillas was never a possibility. What he wanted was to strengthen the state for an eventual negotiation."

Regardless of when the president's plan began, Uribe officially authorized his peace commissioner, Luis Carlos Restrepo, this week to contact FARC commanders to begin negotiations on the prisoner swap.

The FARC is holding 59 Colombian politicians, police and soldiers as well as three United States military contractors it captured after shooting down their airplane in 2003. The government is holding some 500 rebels in jails across the country.

One of the FARC's prisoners is Ingrid Betancourt, a Colombian and French national and former presidential candidate here, who has sparked European nations such as France, Switzerland and Spain to take a strong interest in backing the swap.

The United States, however, has been playing coy -- stating only that it supports the liberation of all kidnap victims. Still, the State Department has declared the FARC a terrorist group, and U.S. officials have always said they are against negotiating with terrorists.

What's more, there are several guerrillas in United States' prisons facing drug trafficking and kidnapping charges, and the Justice Department has recently stepped up its efforts to indict FARC members at large in Colombia for drug trafficking, money laundering, kidnapping and terrorism.

For its part, the FARC has made a point of mentioning two of these U.S.-based rebel prisoners as part of the possible prisoner swap.

REBEL DEMANDS

The guerrillas have also demanded the demilitarization of two municipalities to make room for the negotiations and possible deal, something the government seems unwilling to do. Uribe's predecessor, Andrés Pastrana, demilitarized an area in the south the size of Switzerland to negotiate with the FARC.

The guerrillas used the territory to talk peace, but also to regroup and retrain, hold kidnap victims and launch attacks on nearby military sites and police stations.

"It cannot be a zone of refuge for crime," Uribe said of the area where talks may take place. ``It can't be a point to regroup for terrorist acts that serve to put political pressure [on us]."

Uribe's recent declarations in favor of a prisoner swap have surprised some and consoled others. Others have seen a transformation of the president since he began his tenure in 2002.

"I see a lot of change with regard to his rhetoric, especially toward the FARC," Fabiola Perdomo, the wife of a local assemblyman taken hostage by the FARC in 2002, said of Uribe. ``He's become more flexible."

So flexible, in fact, that Uribe has even mentioned the possibility that a prisoner swap could lead to peace talks and possibly a National Assembly, which the FARC has long demanded.

Woman Given 15 Years For Setting Apartments On Fire (WP)

By Ernesto Londoño

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

A 25-year-old Germantown woman who set her apartment building on fire when she tried to burn her boyfriend's clothes was sentenced yesterday to 15 years in prison -- a punishment three times longer than the one sought by prosecutors.

DOJ_NMG_0076546

The fire set at the Oak Hill apartments by Roxana L. Benavides on Dec. 18 displaced 75 families the week before Christmas.

"It really is an absolute miracle that there were not more people seriously injured or perhaps even killed," Montgomery County Circuit Court Judge Eric M. Johnson said. "What you did was very selfish."

No one was injured in the fire, which caused about $2.5 million in damage.

Benavides, who pleaded guilty to first-degree arson in July, cried as she read a statement in court.

"There isn't a day that goes by that I don't feel guilt for causing the turmoil, not only in the victims' lives, but my family's as well," she said. "That night, a lot of innocent people as well as myself could have died because of my stupidity."

Assistant State's Attorney Sherri D. Koch urged the judge to impose a five-year sentence, and defense attorney Jeffrey B. Henry asked for an unspecified more lenient sentence. It is unusual for Montgomery judges to give a substantially stiffer sentence than the one the state seeks.

Henry said he was taken aback by the sentence, especially coming from Johnson, whom he and other lawyers consider a judge more likely to give relatively low sentences.

"This girl doesn't deserve 15 years," Henry said. "I've had actual violent rapists get 10 years. I've had a mother who murdered her 4-year-old daughter with a pillow who got 15 years."

He said he would ask the judge to reconsider.

Tammy Krogmann, 48, a building resident who lost property in the fire, admonished Benavides during her victim-impact statement. She lamented the loss of her notes, drafts of her thesis and photos that belonged to her grandmother.

"You do not set someone's clothes on fire," Krogmann said.

That night, Benavides, 25, was arguing with her boyfriend, Kenneth Ray, because he wanted to dance and she didn't feel like it. Enraged, she lighted a pile of his clothes on fire in her bedroom, attempted to extinguish the blaze and then went to sleep thinking it was out.

"Unfortunately, they have broken up," he said, quickly adding: "Which is probably a good thing in light of the facts."

IMMIGRATION:

In Border Fence's Path, Congressional Roadblocks (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

No sooner did Congress authorize construction of a 700-mile fence on the U.S.-Mexico border last week than lawmakers rushed to approve separate legislation that ensures it will never be built, at least not as advertised, according to Republican lawmakers and immigration experts.

GOP leaders have singled out the fence as one of the primary accomplishments of the recently completed session. Many lawmakers plan to highlight their $1.2 billion down payment on its construction as they campaign in the weeks before the midterm elections.

But shortly before recessing late Friday, the House and Senate gave the Bush administration leeway to distribute the money to a combination of projects -- not just the physical barrier along the southern border. The funds may also be spent on roads, technology and "tactical infrastructure" to support the Department of Homeland Security's preferred option of a "virtual fence."

What's more, in a late-night concession to win over wavering Republicans, GOP congressional leaders pledged in writing that Native American tribes, members of Congress, governors and local leaders would get a say in "the exact placement" of any structure, and that Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff would have the flexibility to use alternatives "when fencing is ineffective or impractical."

The loopholes leave the Bush administration with authority to decide where, when and how long a fence will be built, except for small stretches east of San Diego and in western Arizona. Homeland Security officials have proposed a fence half as long, lawmakers said.

"It's one thing to authorize. It's another thing to actually appropriate the money and do it," said Sen. John Cornyn (R-Tex.). The fine-print distinction between what Congress says it will do and what it actually pays for is a time-honored result of the checks and balances between lawmakers who oversee agencies and those who hold their purse strings.

In this case, it also reflects political calculations by GOP strategists that voters do not mind the details, and that key players -- including the administration, local leaders and the Mexican government -- oppose a fence-only approach, analysts said.

President Bush signed the $34.8 billion homeland security budget bill Wednesday in Scottsdale, Ariz., without referring to the 700-mile barrier. Instead, he highlighted the $1.2 billion that Congress provided for an unspecified blend of fencing, vehicle barriers, lighting and technology such as ground-based radar, cameras and sensors.

"That's what the people of this country want," the president said. "They want to know that we're modernizing the border so we can better secure the border."

Bush and Chertoff have said repeatedly that enforcement alone will not work and that they want limited dollars spent elsewhere, such as on a temporary-worker program to ease pressure on the border. At an estimated $3 million to $10 million per mile, the double-layered barrier will cost considerably more than $1.2 billion.

Judd Gregg (R-N.H.), who chairs the Senate subcommittee that funds the Department of Homeland Security, said that before the legislation was approved, the department had planned to build 320 miles of fencing, secure 500 miles of hard-to-traverse areas by blocking roads and monitor electronically the rest of the 2,000-mile-long southern frontier.

"I think there'll be fencing where the department feels that it makes sense," Gregg said, estimating that "at least 300 to 400 miles" will be built.

Congress withheld $950 million of the $1.2 billion, pending a breakdown by Chertoff of how he plans to spend the money. It is due in early December, after the midterm elections.

Asked whether Homeland Security would build 700 miles of fence, department spokesman Russ Knocke would not say. Instead, he noted that department leaders announced last month that they will spend $67 million to test a remote-sensing "virtual fence" concept on a 28-mile, high-traffic stretch of border south of Tucson over eight months, and then adjust their plans.

"We plan to build a little and test a little. . . . Stay tuned," Knocke said. "We're optimistic that Congress is going to provide the department with flexibility."

The split between GOP leaders hungry for a sound-bite-friendly accomplishment targeting immigration and others who support a more comprehensive approach also means that the fence bill will be watered down when lawmakers return for a lame-duck session in November, according to congressional aides and lobbyists.

The office of Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Tex.) yesterday released a letter from House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.) promising to ensure that Chertoff has discretion over whether to build a fence or choose other options. Homeland Security officials must also consult with U.S., state and local representatives on where structures are placed.

The letter was inserted in the Congressional Record on Friday night because Congress ran out of time to reach a final deal, aides said.

"State and local officials in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas should not be excluded from decisions about how to best protect our borders with their varying topography, population and geography," Hutchison said in a statement added to the record.

Congress also hedged on when a fence would be completed. The law mandating it said Homeland Security officials should gain "operational control" of the border in 18 months. But the law funding it envisions five years. Chertoff has set a goal of two to three years, but only after completion of an immigration overhaul.

U.S. Border Fence Plan Upsets Mexicans (AP)

By Olga R. Rodriguez

AP, October 5, 2006

Mexico lobbied for six years for a comprehensive immigration reform that would allow millions to cross into the United States legally. Instead, they're getting a fence.

Mexicans — from leading politicians to migrants preparing to cross illegally — consider the U.S. plan to fence off much of the border shameful, offensive and ill-conceived.

President Bush on Wednesday signed a bill that would allot $1.2 billion for hundreds of miles of fencing along the U.S.-Mexican border and for more vehicle barriers, lighting and infrared cameras.

But migrants resting at a Tijuana shelter after being deported from the United States said more walls wouldn't deter them. Alfonso Martinez, a 32-year-old from southern Mexico, had been working as a farmhand for six months in Vista, Calif., when he was arrested and deported last week.

"Wall or no wall, I will try at least three times," said Martinez, who said he would try to cross by himself through Tecate, a mountainous town about 35 miles east of Tijuana. "I have three girls that I have to support, and in Mexico there is no work."

Mexican immigrants in the United States and the Mexican government had lobbied lawmakers for more ways to cross the border and work legally.

While Bush had proposed a temporary worker program, it didn't garner enough support in Congress for passage. The idea has been dropped by Washington, at least until after the November congressional elections.

Congress focused on security over immigration, arguing that the porous border could be used by terrorists who want to sneak into the U.S. undetected. There is no evidence that has happened, however.

The Mexican government this week sent a diplomatic note to Washington criticizing the plan for 700 miles of new fencing along the border. Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez called it an "offense" and said Wednesday his office was considering taking the issue to the United Nations.

But Ruben Aguilar, the spokesman for President Vicente Fox, said Thursday that Mexico had ruled out that possibility. He added he was "confident" the additional fencing would never become a reality because an immigration accord would eventually replace it.

President-elect Felipe Calderon Thursday criticized the U.S. plan, but said the case is a bilateral issue that should not be taken to any international organization.

"I think it is a deplorable decision that has been made by the United States Congress for the construction of this wall, and it does not solve our common problem, which is emigration," Calderon told a news conference in Santiago, Chile.

Guillermo Alonzo, a migration expert at the Tijuana-based Colegio de La Frontera Norte, said fences instead will force migrants to look for new ways to sneak into the United States and find new routes through deadlier terrain.

"When migrants are determined to cross, they find a way to jump the fences," Alonzo said. "Walls don't stop anything."

Alonzo cited the construction of a fence between Tijuana and San Diego, known in Mexico as "the tortilla wall." It was completed in the 1990s and forced migrants into the sparsely populated and dangerous Arizona desert.

While there are walls at various points along the border, the one in Tijuana is the longest stretch, running 14 miles west from the Otay border crossing and plunging into the Pacific Ocean.

It has become a symbol of the divisive immigration issue, a blank slate for graffiti, crosses, photos and other remembrances of those who have lost their lives trying to sneak into the United States. Some families, divided by the border, even meet at the fence, talking through the metal wires.

While the wall downgraded Tijuana from the illegal migration mecca it was in the 1990s, hundreds of migrants still come here, Alonzo said.

"Now smugglers hide migrants in trunks of cars or get false documents," he said.

Luis Kendzierski, a priest who directs a Tijuana migrant shelter, said building a wall is an unfriendly gesture that will lead to a hike in smugglers' fees and more migrant deaths.

Between 2001 and 2006, almost 2,000 migrants died while trying to sneak into the United States, according to El Colegio de la Frontera Norte.

"We are supposed to be neighbors and friends, and instead of building bridges and doors, we're building obstacles," Kendzierski said.

House Immigration Bill's Author On 'Victory Tour' (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

SCOTTSDALE, Ariz. -- The House's top immigration negotiator says the House won the first round in the debate over the issue, and he is on a "victory tour" of the Southwest border states to drive that message home.

Rep. F. James Sensenbrenner Jr., Wisconsin Republican and primary author of the House's immigration-enforcement bill, said that by getting the president to sign a funding bill that included a down payment on the border fence and other enforcement measures, the House position on enforcement first has prevailed.

"I want the American public to know that we won on this, and the House Republicans were able to not only pass, but fund important border security measures," the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee said.

The Mexican government this week sent a diplomatic note to Washington criticizing the plan for 700 miles of new fencing along the U.S.-Mexico border. Foreign Secretary Luis Ernesto Derbez called it an "offense" and said Wednesday that his office was considering taking the issue to the United Nations.

But Ruben Aguilar, a spokesman for outgoing President Vicente Fox, said yesterday that Mexico had ruled out that possibility. He added that he was "confident" the additional fencing would never become a reality because an immigration accord eventually would replace it.

President-elect Felipe Calderon yesterday criticized the U.S. plan but said the case is a bilateral issue that should not be taken to any international organization.

"I think it is a deplorable decision that has been made by the United States Congress for the construction of this wall, and it does not solve our common problem, which is emigration," Mr. Calderon said.

The House and Senate had been deadlocked all year over whether to pass immigration enforcement legislation, as the House wanted, or a broader bill that also legalized most undocumented aliens and created a temporary-worker program.

Congress adjourned last week having passed a bill to build the border fence and a funding measure that includes the first down payment for that fence, as well as money for an additional 1,500 Border Patrol agents and 6,700 new detention beds to hold illegal aliens awaiting deportation.

That, Mr. Sensenbrenner said, was a victory for the House. He held a press conference here yesterday at a technology company's headquarters to drive home provisions the increased funding for technology in the bill. On Wednesday, he was in San Diego at the site of a drug-smuggling tunnel that had run under the border. The funding bill also established stiff prison time for tunneling under the border.

President Bush signed the spending bill in Scottsdale on Wednesday.

"It's what the people of this country want -- they want to know that we're modernizing the border so we can better secure the border," he said as he signed the bill.

The president has yet to sign the 700-mile fence bill, though he has said he will do so.

Some lawmakers said they don't know whether the fence will ever be funded.

Sen John Cornyn, Texas Republican, told reporters this week that the fence bill was a symbol of Congress' commitment to enforcement, but that he wasn't sure the rest of the money would be forthcoming.

"It's one thing to authorize. It's another thing to actually appropriate the money and do it," he said, according to reports.

But Mr. Sensenbrenner said that was misguided.

He pointed out that spending bills start in the House, not the Senate, and urged Mr. Cornyn to work with the House to get the funding done.

Former U.S. Attorney To Plead Guilty In Tax Fraud Scheme (AP)

By Elizabeth Dunbar, The Associated Press

AP, October 6, 2006

A former U.S. Attorney, state judge and state Republican chairman has agreed to plead guilty to charges related to a tax fraud conspiracy, federal prosecutors in Raleigh, N.C., said Wednesday.

Samuel T. Currin will plead guilty to conspiring to launder $1.45 million through his law firm's client trust account and to lying on his taxes by failing to report an offshore debit card account, prosecutors said. Three others also have been charged.

Currin, 57, will also plead guilty in a related case to obstructing a grand jury investigation into securities fraud, in which he conspired to withhold documents and provide false testimony, U.S. Attorney Gretchen Shappert said.

He could be sentenced to as many as 43 years in prison.

Prosecutors allege Currin and his conspirators sent out fraudulent promotional materials on several publicly traded Nevada companies. When stock prices and trading volumes increased, those participating in the scheme profited on the sale of the securities, they say.

Prosecutors said Currin received more than $240,000.

"At the end of the day, I hope the public will recognize that Sam has had a long and distinguished career as an attorney and public servant," Currin attorney Mark Calloway said in a statement. "Sam recognizes he has made a serious mistake, and he is doing what he can to make it right."

Tax attorney Ricky Graves; Howell Way Woltz, president of Sterling Trust in the Bahamas; and his wife, Vernice Woltz, a director of Sterling Trust, are also charged.

Currin was an aide to U.S. Sen. Jesse Helms; U.S. Attorney for eastern North Carolina from 1981-87; state GOP chairman from 1996-99; and a Superior Court judge until 1990.

Doctor, Wife Indicted In Tax-shelter Scheme (SAEN)

By Guillermo Contreras, Express-News Staff

San Antonio Express-News, October 6, 2006

A former San Antonio doctor and his wife have been indicted on charges that they hid more than $656,000 from the Internal Revenue Service in an offshore tax-shelter investment scheme.

DOJ_NMG_0076550

A federal grand jury on Wednesday indicted Daniel Luczkow, 40, and his wife, Mary Luczkow. They are accused of using fake entities offshore to reduce their total income by $490,080 in 1999 and $166,824 in 2000.

Luczkow was an emergency room physician at Baptist Health System in San Antonio in the late 1990s and is now practicing in Massachusetts, where he went to medical school, according to his lawyer, Van Hilley.

The pair are charged with conspiracy to defraud the IRS, punishable by up to five years in prison, and three counts of subscribing to a materially false tax return for a potential refund. Those counts each carry a maximum of three years in prison.

Hilley said the couple attended a seminar put on by people associated with Anderson's Ark and Associates.

The government contends in the indictment that Anderson's promoted offshore "investment" opportunities that helped people dodge taxes.

With administrative offices in Hoodsport, Wash., the organization spanned five countries and had more than 1,500 clients, according to a Justice Department news release.

Hilley said the Luczkows filed amended tax returns and tried to repay the money. He said his clients plan to plead not guilty.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Hastert Takes Responsibility, But Won't Step Down (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning And Andrew Zajac

Chicago Tribune, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- House Speaker Dennis Hastert offered a public apology Thursday for his handling of a complaint about a congressman's suggestive electronic messages to an underage page as the House ethics committee opened an investigation into former Rep. Mark Foley's contacts with pages.

"I'm deeply sorry this has happened and the bottom line is we're taking responsibility," Hastert told a news conference outside his district office in Batavia, Ill. "The buck stops here."

The political damage from the cyber-sex scandal that Republican candidates already had sensed began to show up in polling data, indicating a sharp drop in support for the GOP and public distrust of congressional leaders' explanations for their handling of a complaint about Foley. However, it is not yet clear how lasting the falloff in support will be as lawmakers and the FBI pursue separate investigations of the six-term Florida Republican. Foley abruptly resigned his seat last week.

President Bush again offered his support for Hastert (R-Ill.). But Republicans were nervously assessing polls for a broader measure of the damage, and some were distancing themselves from the speaker by canceling scheduled campaign events with him.

A Time magazine poll released on Thursday found two-thirds of Americans aware of the page scandal believe Republican leaders tried to cover it up. Fox News reported that internal Republican polling indicates the party could now lose as many as 50 seats in the House in the Nov. 7 elections, giving the Democrats control.

An AP/Ipsos poll showed that half of likely voters say the Foley scandal will be "very or extremely important" when they vote. By nearly a 2-1 ratio, voters say Democrats are better at combating corruption.

Rep. Doc Hastings (R-Wash.), chairman of the House ethics committee, said a subcommittee formed to look into the scandal already had approved nearly four dozen subpoenas for witnesses and documents and he pledged the investigation "will go wherever our evidence leads us."

The committee's senior Democrat, Rep. Howard Berman of California, said the panel's investigation should take "weeks, not months," holding out the possibility of answers before the elections.

Hastert's office also floated the idea of appointing former FBI Director Louis Freeh, who is reviled by many Democrats because of his clashes with the Clinton White House, to examine procedures for protecting pages. House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi of California objected, however, arguing that the ethics committee should first examine whether current procedures were followed, a spokeswoman said.

The FBI is moving deliberately in its inquiry, mindful of congressional anger last May when agents raided the Capitol Hill office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.) in a bribery investigation.

The Justice Department is still negotiating access to Foley's House office computer and other evidence, according to a law enforcement source familiar with the inquiry. "There's clearly sensitivity there," the source said.

Another difficulty is determining whether Foley's electronic messages, though possibly offensive to some people, meet the test for a criminal solicitation of sex. Through his attorney, Foley has denied having sexual contact with minors.

Former Foley chief of staff Kirk Fordham, who has said he warned Hastert's office of Foley's inappropriate behavior with pages more than two years ago, was interviewed Thursday by FBI agents at his lawyer's office in Washington.

Fordham's attorney, Tim Heaphy, said his clientdecided to warn Hastert chief of staff Scott Palmer because of "one particular incident" involving Foley and pages. Heaphy declined to elaborate. Palmer has denied receiving the warning.

In the fall of 2005, an aide to Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.) complained to Hastert's office about an inappropriate e-mail Foley sent to a former page. The office's quiet handling of that complaint—Foley received only a private warning to cease contact with pages—has been the focus of criticism since more explicit electronic messages were revealed last week.

"I don't know who knew what when," Hastert said Thursday. "If it's members of my staff or they didn't do the job, we will act appropriately."

Hastert declared at his news conference that he had no thoughts of resigning over his handling of the matter and anticipated remaining the Republican Party leader in the next Congress.

After nearly a week of not making any direct contact with either Hastert or other House GOP leaders, Bush called the speaker Thursday night to voice his support.

"He thanked him for making a clear public statement today in which the speaker said he takes responsibility and reiterated that House leadership is accountable," White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said.

Still, the national Republican establishment remained divided on whether Hastert should stay as speaker, with no clear consensus emerging. A national Republican leader described two camps in discussions, with one arguing that the departure of Hastert would provide the public a catharsis for the scandal but the other contending that the departure of the party's highest-ranking congressional leader would only further feed the frenzy.

Comments that Hastert made in a Tribune interview suggesting the scandal had been orchestrated by ABC News, Democratic political operatives aligned with the Clinton White House and liberal activist George Soros were considered a serious misstep in national Republican circles, an official said. Senior Republican officials contacted Hastert's office before his news conference Thursday to urge that he not repeat the charges and he backed away from them in his press conference.

"The Chicago Tribune interview last night—the George Soros defense—was viewed as incredibly inept," a national Republican official said. "It could have been written by [comedian] Jon Stewart."

Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean called the allegations "a Republican lie. It's a disgrace. They are blaming everyone but themselves for what happened."

Clinton spokesman Jay Carson said, "By pointing fingers at everyone but himself, Speaker Hastert certainly has an interesting definition of 'The buck stops here.'"

Soros told Fox News in an interview that any suggestion that he is involved in orchestrating the Foley revelations "is so far off the mark, it's really laughable."

A Soros-funded foundation provided a grant to a liberal-leaning ethics group that had obtained a copy of a suggestive e-mail from Foley to an underage page and forwarded it in July to the FBI with a request for an investigation. At the time, the FBI declined to investigate.

ABC News, which broke the Foley story, has said it obtained the e-mail from a Republican source.

The identity of a former page who had communicated with Foley though instant messages was revealed after a mistake by ABC News resulted in the former page's screen name being shown in a transcript posted on its Web site. Researchers were then able to use this information to learn the identity of the now 21-year-old former page.

Hastert, A Political Survivor, Vows To Overcome Scandal (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 5 — J. Dennis Hastert, who was installed as House speaker eight years ago through backroom maneuvering in a moment of crisis for his party, has no distinct power base in Congress, not much of a national reputation and, in an age of television politics, little polish in front of the camera.

But Mr. Hastert has survived and survived to become the longest-serving Republican speaker. And on Thursday, standing outside his district office in Batavia, Ill., he made it clear that he did not intend to become a casualty of the Mark Foley scandal, saying he expected to win re-election to his seat and run for speaker again when the new Congress convenes in January.

Mr. Hastert made his statement soon after the leaders of the House ethics committee promised a vigorous investigation into the handling of the Foley case, approved dozens of subpoenas and said they expected to finish their work in weeks. [Page A23.]

Mr. Foley, a Florida Republican, resigned from the House last Friday after being confronted by ABC News with sexually explicit messages he had sent to teenage pages.

With both parties still trying to adapt to the fallout from the case with less than five weeks until Election Day, Mr. Hastert moved to squelch speculation that he would step down in response to suggestions that he and his staff had failed to heed warning signs about Mr. Foley.

Without acknowledging any shortcomings by himself or his aides, Mr. Hastert said he took responsibility for the matter. But he seemed to concede that leaders in times of crisis could sometimes fall victim to perceptions as much as to any wrongdoing or bad judgments on their part.

"Any time that a person has to, as a leader, be on the hot seat and he is a detriment to the party, you know, there ought to be a change," Mr. Hastert said, answering a question at the news conference about whether he had become a drag on Republican election prospects. "I became speaker in a situation like that."

Mr. Hastert got his job in 1998 after the party's first choice to replace Newt Gingrich, Robert Livingston of Louisiana, pulled out at the last minute amid revelations about an extramarital affair. Since then, Mr. Hastert has endured a number of crises, in part by staying more in the background while higher-profile colleagues, particularly his one-time sponsor, Tom DeLay, plunged into the partisan fray.

Mr. DeLay is now gone, under indictment in Texas in a campaign finance case and under investigation in the Jack Abramoff lobbying case. And now Mr. Hastert has been thrust front and center, forcing him to confront the biggest threat to his hold on the speaker's post, and to do so at a time when his party was already nervous about losing control of the House and perhaps the Senate.

Mr. Hastert, who had a busy October of campaign travel penciled into his calendar, is suddenly seen as a liability for the first time since being elected speaker. Republican candidates across the nation were canceling, postponing or reconsidering appearances with him, fund-raisers said, wary of campaigning with Mr. Hastert, even though pollsters say he carries no more than a 40 percent name recognition.

For nearly a week, Republicans said they saw the need for Mr. Hastert publicly to concede that mistakes had been made on his watch. While he stopped short of issuing a direct apology Thursday, saying he still was not aware of the extent of Mr. Foley's inappropriate behavior toward pages, Mr. Hastert did declare, "The buck stops here."

Hours later, President Bush called Mr. Hastert to offer his support, thanking him for "taking responsibility and for saying the House leadership is accountable," said a White House spokeswoman, Dana Perino.

Earlier in the day, officials said Mr. Bush would not go further than the measured comments of support he delivered on Tuesday, but they later said they saw Mr. Hastert's appearance as an important step toward cooling the furor.

The speaker also won support from former President George Bush on Thursday. In an interview with Larry King of CNN, Mr. Bush said: "I'm very, very fond and think very highly of Hastert."

When Mr. King asked, "Don't you think he should quit?" Mr. Bush responded, "Oh no. No, no, no."

The signs of support were part of a carefully woven effort to bring worried Republicans back on board as the party fights to hold control of the House and the Senate. To do so, Republicans sought to stir suspicions among conservatives that revelations about Mr. Foley were delivered as part of a media conspiracy to influence the election.

The strategy largely played out under-the-radar, with Mr. Hastert conducting interviews from his home in Plano, Ill., speaking to conservative talk-radio hosts on Thursday, including William J. Bennett, Mike Gallagher and Laura Ingraham. Earlier this week, he told his version of events to Rush Limbaugh.

Since leaving Washington on Tuesday, Mr. Hastert has remained in his home in the Fox River Valley nearly 60 miles west of downtown Chicago, surrounded by his wife, Jean, and close friends. He took calls from several Republican members of Congress, aides said, and held a conference call with his House leadership team before his afternoon news conference.

Mr. Hastert, a former schoolteacher and wrestling coach, is more at home in Illinois than in Washington, traveling back to the state almost every weekend with Scott Palmer, his chief of staff, and Mike Stokke, his deputy chief of staff. When Congress is in session, the two aides and Mr. Hastert share a townhouse near the Capitol, living a bachelorlike existence. The speaker once boasted that neither he nor his roommates had cooked a meal since 1986, preferring to dine out.

It is Mr. Palmer and Mr. Stokke who are now at the center of a House inquiry into when the speaker's office became aware of Mr. Foley's conduct. Mr. Stokke offered his resignation this week, an aide said, but Mr. Hastert declined to accept it.

In Washington, the resignation of Mr. Foley has opened the door to the biggest crisis of Mr. Hastert's tenure as speaker, a position he neither planned for nor was particularly eager to take over back in 1998. Even after he assumed the speaker's chair, he was seen widely viewed inside the Republican leadership circle as a figurehead to Mr. DeLay.

He was neither the leader of a revolution, like his predecessor, Mr. Gingrich, nor was he a brash dealmaker like Mr. DeLay. His power base, associates say, simply turns on the good will he has earned among the members of Congress. And the Congressional page scandal has been his first solo test since the departure of Mr. DeLay in June at holding together a worried Republican caucus.

"The essence of Denny Hastert's leadership is that you lead by letting other people take credit for things," said Ken Mehlman, the chairman of the Republican National Committee. "That's a strength of his. He's not a limelight seeker."

Mr. Hastert's penchant for avoiding the limelight also illustrated a weakness, Republicans said, as he refused initially to accept responsibility for the uproar surrounding Mr. Foley's case. He spoke to reporters on Monday, but did not take questions in front of television cameras, a decision that proved to be a mistake, aides said. His remarks on Thursday were televised live.

"It shows he's a specialist at the game of inside politics, not the outside game of public relations," said John J. Pitney, who studies Congress and teaches government at Claremont McKenna College in California. "He's very good at dealing with members one on one, but focusing on a public message is not his strength."

But in his own district, where Mr. Hastert faces a little-known Democratic challenger who is half his age, he responded to the scandal on several fronts, including placing recorded telephone calls to the homes of constituents across the 14th Congressional District.

The calls were quickly ordered up by Mr. Hastert's campaign, and recorded by a local announcer, to respond to a telephone recording placed by a liberal group this week that accused the speaker of protecting pedophiles in Congress.

Mr. Hastert has largely escaped controversy during two decades in Congress, particularly the kind that has befallen many House leaders before him.

In recent years, though, his steady accumulation of wealth through land deals has been scrutinized, particularly after he sold a parcel of land near a federally financed highway project he supported. His net worth, according to a Chicago Tribune analysis this summer, has risen to more than $6 million from $290,000 during his time in Washington.

His aides have dismissed suggestions that Mr. Hastert has used his position to leverage financial gain, saying that he, like others in his fast-developing district, invested during a real estate upswing. At 64, he is looking toward retirement, which he flirted with after the last election.

The president, however, wanted Mr. Hastert to stay on and push his agenda through Congress.

"I hope you're going to run again," Mr. Bush said at the close of 2004, said Andrew H. Card Jr., who at the time was the White House chief of staff. "We need you."

Despite Scandal, Bush Supports Hastert (AP)

By Terence Hunt

The Associated Press, October 5, 2006

A week into a sex scandal involving teenage House pages, President Bush called House Speaker Dennis Hastert on Thursday to thank the embattled Republican leader for how he has handled the situation.

In a phone call lasting several minutes, Bush expressed support for Hastert, under fire from conservatives unhappy with what he did and didn't do about former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually suggestive messages to teens.

"The president thanked him for going out and making a clear public statement that said the House leadership takes responsibility and is accountable," White House deputy press secretary Dana Perino said.

"He said he appreciated that when they got the information, they swiftly took action making clear that Rep. Foley should step down and promptly requested a Department of Justice investigation. And he expressed his support for the speaker," Perino said.

Earlier in the day, the White House tried to distance Bush from any political backlash, saying that House Republicans were dealing with the matter and do not need to be told what to do.

"Everybody here wants the president to come in and tell the House how to do its business," said presidential spokesman Tony Snow, emphasizing that Congress and the White House are separate branches of government.

Some conservatives have called for Hastert's resignation on grounds that he and his staff did not act quickly enough on warnings about the conduct of Foley, R-Fla., who resigned last week after the disclosure that he sent sexually explicit messages to teenage pages.

Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney support the speaker and do not want him to resign, Snow said, although the spokesman acknowledged that the facts of the case are unclear.

"In absence of full information, we're sticking with what we've got," Snow said of Hastert. "We don't think that Denny Hastert's the kind of guy who says, 'Man, that's great stuff; we're really glad Foley was doing that on the sly.'"

Republicans are worried the scandal could cost them control of the House and possibly the Senate in next month's elections. That would throw a huge cloud over the remaining two years of Bush's presidency, giving Democrats power to probe his administration's decisions and derail his priorities.

An Associated Press-Ipsos poll found that about half of likely voters say recent disclosures of corruption and scandal in Congress will be very or extremely important when they cast their vote next month.

"I don't think you should hold every member of Congress responsible for what happened in the case of Mark Foley," Snow said. "Come Election Day, the question is whether people are going to be voting on the basis of disgusting IMs (instant messages) between a grown man and a young man or something that's probably more important to everybody, which is safety, security and prosperity."

"Have you been reading the press? Of course, it's a trial," he said. "They've got a hanging jury out there and everything." Later, he said he was being glib.

Hot Seat In Foley Scandal, Republican Leader Comes Under Fire (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

When reporters in suburban Buffalo, N.Y., gathered Monday night to hear local Rep. Tom Reynolds explain his role in the House page sex scandal, they were surprised to see the local congressman flanked by dozens of children, some squirming in their parents' arms.

"I'm not going to ask any of my supporters to leave," a defiant Mr. Reynolds told reporters, who had suggested that the topic -- about former Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley's sexually charged computer messages to a male page -- wasn't appropriate for children. For 45 minutes, the crowd stood by as the coos and occasional cries of the children provided background noise and Mr. Reynolds fielded questions.

As much as anybody, Mr. Reynolds is in the hot seat over the Foley scandal. As chairman of the House Republicans' campaign committee, he's responsible for protecting the party's majority. That tough task has become tougher, in part because Mr. Reynolds finds himself among the most vulnerable candidates.

He is tainted, like other House leaders, for having been privy to early concerns about Mr. Foley. Mr. Reynolds hopes one day to be speaker of the House. But he first must figure out how to handle the delicate balance between self-preservation and party preservation. He professes to support the current speaker, Dennis Hastert, even as he has tried to shift the blame to him.

The Reynolds dilemma shows the broader tensions among House Republicans brought to the surface by the Foley matter. Republicans have traditionally been known for a discipline that fractious Democrats have long envied. Now that united front is shattered. The controversy is stoking Republican fears that they will lose control of the House on Nov. 7.

As they grapple with how to contain the escalating political crisis, Mr. Reynolds and his fellow Republicans have had to consider two separate paths. One is for the party to hang tough and blame Democrats for the timing of the disclosures. The other is to take full responsibility and move on -- while presumably sacrificing a top leader, like Mr. Hastert.

Yesterday, officials seemed to be gravitating toward the first choice, and Mr. Hastert brushed aside calls he should step down. "I haven't done anything wrong," he said at a news conference from his home in Batavia, Ill. "Republicans dealt with it immediately" he said, and are now "trying to correct the problem" through new investigations and a review of the page program.

Hang-Tough Strategy

The hang-tough strategy is being urged by former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, conservative talk-show hosts such as Rush Limbaugh, and increasingly, according to several Republicans, by party Chairman Ken Mehlman and White House political advisers. "Get indignant," as one former House Republican and top party strategist put it. "We don't have to take any lectures from Democrats."

Advocates of this approach call for avoiding responsibility for not taking action against Mr. Foley, while reminding the public about past Democratic sex scandals, notably President Clinton's, involving former White House intern Monica Lewinsky. They suggest -- so far without evidence -- that Democrats held on to information about the Foley emails and instant messages until close to Election Day. "As much as we'd love to take credit for chasing a child predator out of Congress, their charges are ridiculous," said Bill Burton, spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

In the days since last Friday's disclosure of Mr. Foley's lurid instant messages to house pages and the congressman's resignation, Republican House leaders and their staffs have turned on each other. In disputing who was responsible for dealing with the Floridian's behavior, they have contradicted each other, and sometimes themselves.

Mr. Reynolds began the back-and-forth last Saturday, suggesting he'd acted responsibly by telling the speaker last spring, after he had learned from a Louisiana congressman about some "overly-friendly" electronic messages to a 16-year-old page. That, as Mr. Reynolds knew, contradicted the speaker's own comments that he only learned of the matter the day before through news reports. "I stand by my Saturday statement," Mr. Reynolds said in an interview yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0076555

At his Monday news conference, Mr. Reynolds said that upon learning of the "despicable" Foley messages last Friday, "I immediately began to work for his resignation." That conflicts with Speaker Hastert's account. "I think Foley resigned almost immediately upon the outbreak of this information, and so we really didn't have a chance to ask him to resign," Mr. Hastert has said.

But Mr. Reynolds, in the interview, said, "I did not talk to Foley but I asked Kirk Fordham" -- then Mr. Reynolds's chief of staff -- "to go down and secure his resignation."

On Wednesday, Mr. Fordham resigned, saying that he had repeatedly urged the speaker's staff as far back as 2003 to stop Mr. Foley's inappropriately personal contacts with male pages. The speaker's office denied that claim.

Mr. Fordham's contention raises questions for Mr. Reynolds as well. While Mr. Reynolds insists he knew nothing until last spring, Republicans privately say they can't believe Mr. Fordham wouldn't have made Mr. Reynolds aware as well. "Monday morning quarterbacking is great," Mr. Reynolds quipped.

At a news conference, Mr. Hastert yesterday took his own swipe back at Mr. Fordham. "It's interesting, Kirk Fordham also said, just about three or four days ago, that he worked for this guy for 10 years and he never did anything wrong."

Even before the Foley scandal broke, nonpartisan handicappers were predicting the Democrats could net the 15 seats needed for a House majority, and perhaps gain the six needed to take the Senate. The news came on the last day of a Congressional term that was unusually unproductive and contentious.

For example, the Republican-led Congress rejected the president's top-priority Social Security and immigration proposals. It also weathered corruption scandals that forced out the majority leader, Tom DeLay.

Now the Foley affair is providing new grist for Democrats as well as a controversy that voters can easily understand. "If you had a teacher [engaged in inappropriate contact with] a high school student, and the principal knew, and they had taken no action, what would happen to both the teacher and the principal once word got out?" asks Rep. Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, Mr. Reynolds's counterpart as head of House Democrats' campaign committee. "Well, that's how the American people see this."

The Republican leaders' sniping at each other, meanwhile, keeps the story alive, even for far-removed Republican members back home campaigning. "The more the spotlight shines on the dysfunction in Congress, that makes it very hard for these members to change the subject," says Amy Walter, who analyzes House races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

The Foley fallout is especially dangerous, Ms. Walter adds, for incumbents already under clouds of their own. One is Pennsylvania Rep. Don Sherwood, who stars in his own campaign ad asking voters' forgiveness for an extramarital affair. Republicans now expect to lose the seat Mr. Foley gave up, which was considered fairly safe until last week.

On Monday night, a group of House Republicans held a strategy conference call to brainstorm over how to respond to the Foley situation. Though he's in charge of the Republican House campaigns, Mr. Reynolds didn't phone in, as he was busy with his own race. But participation was high. "I guarantee you it was the largest one of these we've ever had," said Republican Rep. Patrick McHenry of North Carolina.

Rep. Judy Biggert of Illinois suggested every member contact the parents of the pages they'd sponsored, to provide reassurance and perhaps learn of other problems. "We seem to be forgetting that this is all about the children. We keep talking about who did what to whom, and who's covering up," she said yesterday in an interview. Mrs. Biggert says she has reached the mothers of three of the five pages she has sponsored, and none reported problems, only delight with the program.

Republicans have also discussed deflecting the scandal by talking up youth programs and education initiatives. Those issues were the focus this week when Reps. Reynolds, John Sweeney of New York, and Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania had campaign visits from First Lady Laura Bush, who remains hugely popular with voters. And Republicans have talked about surrounding themselves with children in public events -- just as Mr. Reynolds did at his Monday news conference.

As Mr. Reynolds prepared the party for the fall campaign, he took credit for an election strategy that had Republicans emphasizing local issues, and the federal funds they've brought home. That was to help them overcome the hostile national climate.

But now Mr. Reynolds's "all-politics-is-local" strategy is overwhelmed by the page scandal. That's particularly true in his own race. His district is a western New York stretch of suburbs, small towns and farms from Buffalo nearly to Rochester. It's traditionally Republican but less so as manufacturing job losses have unsettled voters. His rival is Republican-turned-Democrat Jack Davis, a 73-year-old businessman who took 44% of the vote against Mr. Reynolds two years ago, and says he will spend $2 million on this race.

On the Defensive

Several links to Mr. Foley have Mr. Reynolds on the defensive. He talked the reluctant congressman into running for a seventh term -- at a time when critics say he may have been aware of suspicions surrounding Mr. Foley. "I don't recall if I had a conversation with him before or after I learned about the overly-friendly emails," he said in an interview yesterday.

DOJ_NMG_0076556

After learning of the emails 52-year-old Mr. Foley sent to the 16-year-old, the campaign contributed $5,000 to Mr. Foley, according to campaign finance documents. Once it was clear the Floridian likely was safe for re-election, Mr. Reynolds accepted $100,000 from Mr. Foley for his National Republican Congressional Committee coffers.

Mr. Reynolds's now-departed chief of staff, Mr. Fordham, has said that, as a friend, he counseled his former boss Mr. Foley prior to the congressman's resignation Friday. Mr. Reynolds has said he wasn't aware of his chief of staff's role.

Even as a seasoned politician, Mr. Reynolds is tested by the recent events. "Ah, politics is what it is," he says. He's been at it for a long time. Starting as a town councilman at 23, Mr. Reynolds moved on to the Erie county legislature, then the New York state assembly, where he was the Republican minority leader. He was elected to Congress in 1998.

Mr. Reynolds was immediately marked as a comer among House Republicans. Party leaders put him on the prestigious tax-writing Ways and Means Committee. He raised significant sums for the party, and for Mr. Bush's 2000 campaign. Nearly four years ago, he was elected to chair the National Republican Congressional Committee, where he seemed to work closely with Mr. Hastert. "Not bad for a kid from Springfield," he said on the drive to another campaign event last month.

On the recent campaign trip, Mr. Reynolds proudly said at one point, "I am a member of the House Republican leadership." But at Monday's news conference, he took a different tone when a reporter challenged him on why, as a leader, he didn't do more to confront Mr. Foley earlier.

"I did due diligence by talking to the speaker" in the spring, he reiterated. "I heard something, I took it to my supervisor." Asked if Mr. Hastert should have done more, he replied, "That's a question you have to ask the speaker."

Yesterday, two other House leaders who had likewise laid responsibility for the Foley issue on the speaker -- Majority Leader John Boehner of Ohio and Roy Blunt of Missouri -- issued press releases of support for him as calls for the speaker's departure built. Mr. Reynolds did not.

Hastert Takes Responsibility For Page Scandal, But Refuses To Resign (MCT)

By Margaret Talev And William Douglas

McClatchy Newspapers, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON - House Speaker Dennis Hastert and the House ethics committee moved Thursday to contain political damage from the congressional page scandal, mixing words of contrition with promises to complete a bipartisan ethics investigation within weeks.

Hastert made it clear that he wouldn't resign.

Republican ranks appeared to be firming behind him after days of second-guessing and finger-pointing over whether he and other leaders in the House of Representatives had acted quickly and responsibly enough after learning that former Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., had exchanged inappropriate emails with teenage congressional pages. Foley resigned last week.

Barring explosive new revelations, Hastert seemed likely to avoid being forced out before Nov. 7's midterm elections. A new Pew Research Center poll showed that the scandal so far isn't moving voters.

Hastert, in a news conference from his Illinois district that was televised nationwide, said he was "deeply sorry" about any actions that might have jeopardized the safety of congressional pages and that he was taking responsibility, and he added "the buck stops here."

He also expressed optimism that Republicans would maintain control of the House and would choose him to remain their leader. "I'm going to run and presumably win in this election, and when we do I expect to run for speaker," he said.

Hastert maintained that he never attempted to cover up anything related to Foley, but he acknowledged mistakes. "Could we have done it better? Could the page board have handled it better? In retrospect, probably yes," he said.

House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, and third-ranking House Republican Roy Blunt, R-Mo., who a day earlier were critical of Hastert's handling of the matter, issued strong statements of support for him Thursday. "I believe strongly he should remain our speaker," Boehner said. Said Blunt: "We all now realize that this terrible situation could have been handled differently. We are all upset; we are all horrified; but we all stand together with our speaker."

In Florida, Rep. Clay Shaw, a Republican locked in a tight re-election contest in a district beside Foley's, also voiced support for Hastert.

On Capitol Hill, the House ethics committee had a closed-door hearing on the matter. Then its members held a news conference to outline the panel's coming investigation into what lawmakers and their staff knew about Foley's involvement with pages, when they knew it and what they did with the information. Committee Chairman Rep. Doc Hastings, R-Wash., said the panel already had approved nearly four dozen subpoenas for documents and testimony.

Rep. Howard Berman, D-Calif., the panel's top Democrat, said of the investigation's expected timeline: "We are looking at weeks, not months." But neither he nor Hastings would commit to producing a report before the elections.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., rejected a plan by Hastert to bring in former FBI director Louis Freeh to investigate the page program. A Pelosi spokesman said the minority leader was concerned that the move could interrupt the ethics investigation and become a public relations ploy.

The Pew Research Center poll suggested that the Foley scandal isn't moving voters much. Before the news broke, voters were telling Pew surveyors that they preferred Democrats to Republicans by 51-38 percent, and after the scandal broke they said the same by 50-37 percent. The differences are statistically insignificant. The Iraq war dominated voters' thinking, not Foley. The survey was conducted Sept. 21-Oct. 4.

ABC News reported Thursday that three more former pages had contacted the network to say that Foley had made advances to them. They weren't identified.

House Republican leaders maintain that they had no knowledge of sexually explicit instant messages between Foley and former pages until ABC News published them last week.

Kirk Fordham, a former chief of staff to Foley and to Rep. Tom Reynolds, R-N.Y., charged Wednesday that he'd told Hastert's chief of staff three years ago that Foley's relationships with pages could be a problem. Hastert's chief of staff denies that.

Timothy Heaphy, Fordham's attorney, said the FBI interviewed his client Thursday, though he declined to say what was discussed. Heaphy said Fordham stood by his statement that he'd warned Hastert's staff three years ago: "He's not backtracking from that at all."

House Republicans Move To Back Hastert (WP)

By Jim Vandehei And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

Republicans are calculating that the smartest way to survive the Mark Foley sex scandal is to rally around House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and hope that no new evidence surfaces before Election Day that shows GOP leaders could have done more to prevent the congressman from preying on young male pages, according to several GOP lawmakers and strategists.

The White House and top House Republicans remain deeply nervous that the scandal will hurt them politically, and that additional information will come out contradicting statements by Hastert and others that they were unaware of Foley's sexual messages to underage boys, the lawmakers and officials said.

For now, they said, it would be politically disastrous for Republicans to oust Hastert because it would be viewed as akin to a public admission of guilt in the scandal, as well as a pre-election victory that would buoy Democrats and help their turnout efforts.

"Calls for resignation are just inappropriate," said Rep. Jeb Hensarling (R-Tex.). "I would be absolutely shocked if the facts led us to that he knew more than he says he knew."

Rep. Paul Ryan (R-Wis.) said every Republican lawmaker is rejecting calls from some conservative leaders to oust Hastert. "You are seeing a rally-around-the-speaker effort more than anything else," he said.

Several GOP lawmakers in tough races said voters are not reacting as harshly to the scandal as they first feared, buying Hastert even more room to save his job. Still, lawmakers are privately furious with how Hastert and other leaders have handled the scandal. It has created tension among GOP leaders who have sometimes viewed each other suspiciously since House Majority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) took over after the resignation of Tom DeLay (R-Tex.). And many expect that the worst is still to come.

Top advisers to Hastert have accused Boehner of undermining the speaker's campaign to save his job. They pointed to Boehner's comments earlier in the week that it was Hastert's responsibility to fully investigate charges that Foley was making improper contact with underage boys. "That still stings," said one top adviser, who believed that the remark "was pretty close" to an insurrection.

Kevin Madden, a spokesman for Boehner, said his boss was "in no way trying to blame Hastert. It was merely a description" of responsibility for the page program, which the speaker's office technically oversees.

Ron Bonjean, a spokesman for Hastert, played down alleged tensions. "We are all sticking together through this. This has been a tough time for the House Republican majority, and we are going to make it through," he said.

A top Boehner adviser said the majority leader wanted to make it clear he is not to blame for the leadership's handling of allegations against Foley. "This has opened up and made more obvious some managerial problems in the speaker's office," the adviser said. Boehner has made it clear to colleagues that he plans to run for speaker if Hastert steps down or for minority leader if Republicans lose the House in November.

House Majority Whip Roy Blunt (R-Mo.), in a phone call to Hastert this week, told him that critical comments Blunt made about Hastert were taken out of context.

"Those who are trying to create the appearance of disunity between myself and the speaker should know: There is not, and has not been, any daylight between the speaker and me," Blunt said in a statement yesterday.

Even if some GOP leaders turn on him, Hastert has a very powerful ally in President Bush. White House aides are nervous that the controversy has clouded, at least for now, Bush's effort to try to shape the midterm elections around the issue of terrorism.

But they are warning against a quick ouster of Hastert. Bush called Hastert last night to offer support and to thank him for his public statement taking responsibility for the situation, a White House spokeswoman said.

This approach comes as a sharp contrast to the administration's handling of the controversy in 2002 over Sen. Trent Lott's comments about then-Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) -- which cost Lott (Miss.) his post as Senate GOP leader. In Lott's case, Bush was quick to nudge him out of power. The president, however, feels deeply indebted to Hastert, who has pushed through his agenda and has quietly provided advice on how to deal with a restive Republican Congress.

Still, many Republicans accused Hastert of badly bungling the political fallout of the Foley scandal and waiting until yesterday to take responsibility and decisive action to investigate the matter.

"I don't think anyone has handled this particularly well," said a top House Republican, who requested anonymity in order to speak candidly. Hastert and other leaders "are having to focus on staying clear of this scandal individually, and not thinking about reelecting people."

Others complained that Hastert's blame-the-media-and-Democrats strategy looks odd when conservatives are leading the charge for his resignation.

Rep. Rob Simmons (R-Conn.), who faces one of the toughest reelection fights in the country, said lawmakers will stand by Hastert -- at least until all the facts are known. "He is not the kind of guy you would think would condone this kind of behavior," he said. "Calling for someone's resignation is simply a political stunt if you don't have all the facts."

Hastert Must Go (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

DENNIS HASTERT SHOULD RESIGN as speaker of the House of Representatives. Not necessarily because he failed to act quickly when shown evidence suggesting that Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) was abusing his power with teenagers — not all the details are known, though the ones that are don't look good. No, the Illinois Republican should resign because he's an unimaginative politician and an uninspired legislator. Unfortunately, these days that just makes him a typical congressional Republican.

At his job-preserving news conference Thursday, Hastert said, "The buck stops here," then proceeded to blame some of this Republican scandal on the Democratic Party. "I haven't done anything wrong, obviously," he added.

That sound you hear is Harry Truman rolling over in his grave. Still, it was an improvement over the speaker's contention Monday that critiquing his oversight amounted to nothing more than "woulda, coulda, shoulda." To repeat: Even disregarding the well-documented rumors of Foley's unhealthy obsession with young interns dating to at least 1995, and accepting Hastert's insistence that his office first heard about Foley's misbehavior last fall, the speaker had more than enough information to launch an investigation. Instead, he was more interested in protecting his party's fortunes than the safety of minors.

Is that reason enough for Hastert to resign? Perhaps. But let's give Hastert the benefit of the doubt, on the principle that it's unfair to judge a man for a single mistake. Looking at his record only makes the case for his resignation stronger.

Start with his laugh-out-loud assertion Thursday that the Republican Party has been "holding the line on spending." From 1999, when Hastert was elected speaker, to 2005, non-defense discretionary spending increased 34%, according to the Heritage Foundation. Pork-barrel line items have grown exponentially on Hastert's watch, and ballyhooed attempts at reform have largely fizzled. Instead of trying to prevent his colleagues from raiding the public purse, Hastert has saved his scorn for judges who authorize the FBI to search the offices of fellow lawmakers charged with crimes.

The same Republican Party that swept into a House majority 12 years ago amid fire-breathing promises to clean house and inject new blood is now led by a 19-year veteran whose oldest son is a lobbyist.

On policy, Hastert's no better. He's presided over the House's becoming a fever swamp of immigration rhetoric that even some Bush administration officials see as xenophobic and damaging. He has suggested that New Orleans might be better off "bulldozed." And he has allowed the House to become a rubber stamp for the Bush administration's expansion of executive-branch power.

If he has a compelling vision for the nation, or frankly any vision at all, it has escaped our attention. The 109th Congress can't do any more harm, thankfully. But Hastert shouldn't head the 110th.

Hastert Career Has Milestones In Misfortune (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0076559

By William M. Welch
USA Today, October 6, 2006

He's been called the accidental speaker.

Dennis Hastert, the Republican speaker of the House of Representatives, is a quiet, hulking Midwesterner who rose to power over the misfortune and missteps of fellow Republicans.

And just as a colleague's sex scandal propelled him into the job, a sex-related scandal involving another House Republican has threatened his hold on power.

It was one week ago that Rep. Mark Foley resigned his seat under pressure from fellow Republicans amid reports that he had sent overtly sexual messages to a teenage male congressional page.

Since that day, Hastert has been besieged by the news media and been the target of finger-pointing by other Republicans — among them Rep. Thomas Reynolds of New York — who said they had tried to bring the Foley problem to his attention well before last week.

On Thursday, Hastert, 64, returned to his district office in Batavia, Ill. — a conservative, far-western suburb of Chicago — for a news conference in which he defended his handling of the matter.

Hastert accepted responsibility but insisted he had done what he should — if not all that he might have — to end Foley's inappropriate contacts with the high school boys working in Congress.

"I am deeply sorry this has happened," Hastert said. "When Congress found out about the explicit messages, Republicans dealt with it immediately, and the culprit was gone. We are now trying to correct the problem."

Known to friends as "Denny," Hastert is a former high school wrestling coach who has held the highest constitutional job in Congress longer than anyone since Massachusetts Democrat Thomas "Tip" O'Neill left the post in 1987 after 10 years.

Nevertheless, Hastert has been largely unknown to average Americans. A CBS poll in April 2005 found that only 13% had an opinion about Hastert, good or bad — far less than others who have held the job, such as O'Neill and Hastert's predecessor, Newt Gingrich.

He has never been comfortable in front of cameras or reporters. He appears more at ease chatting with blue-collar workers at a tool-and-die factory in his district than publicly representing his party in Washington. Rather than attending to the Washington social circuit, Hastert goes home to Illinois every weekend, where he tinkers with old cars and his 1954 fire engine.

Yet throughout his adult life, Hastert has been a successful organizer to whom colleagues eventually turned for leadership.

As a coach, Hastert turned a start-up high-school program into a winner, and organized coaches of the minor sport into a national association, which he led. Married to a colleague — his wife Jean was a physical education teacher at the same high school — Hastert developed a taste for politics and ran for the Illinois Legislature in 1980.

He finished third in the primary. When the winning candidate fell mortally ill, party leaders turned to Hastert to take the nomination. He won the election and spent six years in Springfield.

When his congressman was fatally stricken with cancer in 1986, party leaders placed Hastert's name on the ballot. He won narrowly, with 52% of the vote, but has never had a tough race since.

By the time Republicans won a majority in 1994, Hastert had already become a confidant of the party's leadership. He was a floor leader in the push to pass the GOP's "Contract with America" early in 1995, and he managed the campaign of Texan Tom DeLay to become House GOP whip.

DeLay immediately made Hastert his chief deputy, putting Hastert in position to count noses, and twist arms, on every important vote the House took. He had a chummy approach — his bear-like arm around a colleague was usually more welcome than the tough-guy approach that earned DeLay the nickname "The Hammer."

When Gingrich quit after the 1998 elections shrunk the GOP's majority, the speaker's job fell into Hastert's lap. Rep. Bob Livingston, R-La., had been selected for the job, but before he could take it, he quit Congress, admitting he had had an extramarital affair.

"He was just handed the keys," said National Journal's Hotline editor Chuck Todd. "You sort of wonder if that's coming home to roost."

Rep. Ray LaHood, R-Ill., credits Hastert with delivering the tough news to DeLay and two other GOP congressmen when scandal meant they had to resign, and says he's taken charge now.

"I believe he probably gets it behind him now," LaHood said. "He did what he should have done two or three days ago."

The Speaker's Feint (WP)

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

HOUSE SPEAKER J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) yesterday came up with yet another ploy to shield himself and his colleagues from scrutiny while pretending to do the opposite.

The issue is how House leaders dealt with warnings that Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) had sent inappropriate e-mail to a teenage page. The speaker announced with considerable satisfaction that he hopes to appoint an independent "person of high caliber" -- but not to do what is obviously needed, which is investigate whether the House botched the response, thereby endangering more pages. Instead, Mr. Hastert said, he wants someone "to advise us on the page program." He floated the idea of naming former FBI director Louis J. Freeh but pulled back when Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) wouldn't go along.

Let's save the speaker, and whoever his eminent person turns out to be, some time by offering advice right now: No congressman should harass pages. No one should send them what White House press secretary Tony Snow dismissed as "naughty e-mails." And if there's even a hint that one of your colleagues is doing so, or wants to, don't brush it off. "The buck stops here," the speaker said yesterday, declaring that "we're taking responsibility." But announcing that doesn't make it so.

Yesterday's gambit followed an earlier tack, which was to turn the matter over to the FBI. The FBI has a role to play in determining whether criminal violations occurred, but the appropriate constraints on the bureau -- in the scope of its investigation and its ability to share information with the House and the public -- make it an ill-suited vehicle "for us to try to find out what happened," as the speaker put it. Meanwhile, responding to the uproar with finger-pointing suggestions that the other side leaked the matter, as Mr. Hastert did yesterday, isn't going to fly. Would he be happier if the information hadn't come out?

The House ethics committee's announcement yesterday of an investigation is a development to be taken more seriously. As we've said previously, there are legitimate questions about the panel's ability to handle something with this much political sensitivity, given Republican efforts to undermine its power and independence and given its dysfunction during the Abramoff scandal. That's why an independent investigator -- a "person of high caliber," in the speaker's phrase -- would have been the best way to ensure a thorough investigation and unsparing conclusions.

That apparently wasn't seriously considered, though, so now the ethics committee's integrity is on the line. It should resist calls for haste (including from Ms. Pelosi, who risks appearing more interested in electoral timelines than a thorough inquiry), but it also must work briskly and without regard for political fallout.

Path Is Risky For Gay GOP Politicians (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds And Jenny Jarvie

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

Months later, according to the acquaintance, when she offered to send him the photo, Foley looked anxious.

The intern, "male or female?" he inquired.

"Female" was the reply.

For most Republicans, being photographed in a compromising position with a young woman could be scandalous. But in the sometimes strained world of gay Republicans, it was an asset.

Foley resigned a week ago over revelations that he had engaged in sexually explicit online banter with male teenagers. And though it was the age of those House pages that forced his downfall and a criminal investigation, Foley's sexual orientation had been a huge political liability for him for years.

Gays hold many prominent positions in government and business in Washington. But in the GOP ranks, homosexuality is still politically risky. In fact, with the exception of the military, perhaps no institution in America has as strong a "don't ask, don't tell" approach as the Republican Party.

"Obviously, the far right has kind of got a stranglehold on the Republican Party," said Minnesota state Rep. Paul Koering, a Republican who came out publicly last year. "The very first time I ran, I literally almost made myself sick worrying about somebody finding out I was gay."

Congress has three openly gay members, one of them a Republican — Jim Kolbe of Arizona, who is retiring when this term ends. Kolbe acknowledged his sexual orientation in 1996 after a gay magazine was about to "out" him for voting against government recognition of same-sex marriages.

Staffers from both parties say they think that several other Republican members of Congress are gay but, at least officially, in the closet.

"It's kind of like a secret society," said a gay former congressional staffer who, like others interviewed for this article, spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the issue.

One reason for the secrecy, gay Republicans say, is that their party has grown more hostile to gays in recent years. The trend began with the 2002 congressional election, when GOP leaders made the strategic decision to use religious conservative groups' opposition to gay marriage to turn out voters. For those groups, which consider homosexuality a deviant "lifestyle," few issues rile their membership more.

"While pro-homosexual activists like to claim that pedophilia is a completely distinct orientation from homosexuality, evidence shows a disproportionate overlap between the two," Family Research Council President Tony Perkins said this week in a message to supporters.

David Catania, who serves on the District of Columbia city council and is gay, said he left the Republican Party over its opposition to gay marriage. He expressed sympathy for his gay friends who remained active Republicans.

"They've hitched their stars to the party, hoping to hunker down and ride out the Taliban-esque wing, hoping their views will come back into the mainstream," Catania said. "It's got to be very demoralizing for them."

"It's difficult for them," the staffer said. "For the most part, they grew up in Republican households and families. It's like a religion to them. They may even be out to their families. But they are not out professionally."

Early in Foley's congressional career, friends and associates say, he took measures to deflect attention from his sexual orientation. He showed up at parties with a woman on his arm, made references to girlfriends, and used photos of himself with his sister and niece in campaign literature. Many voters assumed the photo showed him with a wife and daughter.

In Florida, Foley had a host of glamorous and wealthy female companions, including Petra Levin, a former model and philanthropist, and Nancy Jean Davis, the Miami heir to the McArthur Dairy fortune.

"He always had a knockout woman on his arm," said Jack Furnari, president of the Boca Raton Republican Club. "People would say, 'See that woman Mark was with?' and chuckle. It was all a show."

At times and in certain circles, however, Foley was less reticent about being seen with his longtime male partner, friends and associates say. In Palm Beach, the luxury winter resort island that some describe as fiscally conservative but socially liberal, Foley would arrive at fundraisers and galas with his companion, a local dermatologist. But they always sat at separate tables.

Sid Dinerstein, chairman of the Republican Party of Palm Beach County, who says he saw Foley a month ago at a restaurant with Foley's companion as well as his sister and her husband, said the congressman's sexuality was not an issue in Palm Beach.

"Nobody cared," Dinerstein said. "Liberals think all Republicans are stupid bigots, but we knew. It just wasn't talked about. We cared about his political skills, his legislative skills."

Rand Hoch, former chairman of the Democratic Party of Palm Beach County and openly gay, remembers speaking at length with Foley in 1997, when some gay newspapers were outing public officials.

"I tried and tried to persuade him to come out," Hoch said. "But ultimately he thought that at that time in Washington, D.C., and nationally, an up-and-coming Republican politician could not be openly gay."

Foley was a tireless socializer, a trait that served him well politically. He won plaudits from charities for his willingness to help raise money, and he earned the loyalty of fellow Republicans in Washington and Florida for his ability to shake donor trees in Hollywood and elsewhere.

In the House's tightknit Republican caucus, he rose to the rank of deputy whip, a junior member of the leadership. In 2003, Foley was considered the GOP front-runner to succeed then-Sen. Bob Graham (D-Fla.), who had decided to run for president.

Though Foley had a campaign fund worth millions, the White House moved aggressively to recruit a different candidate, then-Housing and Urban Development Secretary Mel Martinez. Party strategists worried about what a Foley candidacy would mean for President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign in the state that had decided the election four years earlier.

Foley, it seemed, had gone as far in politics as he could as a gay Republican. And in a way, acquaintances said, the failure of his Senate bid appears to have freed him to be somewhat more open about his homosexuality. For instance, he began appearing more often at social events with his partner; if you invited one to dinner, socialites learned, you invited both.

For gay Republicans, staffers say, discretion is the key. And Foley, it seems, had trouble being discreet.

In Washington, he was known as someone who liked to stay out late. And at parties, he did not hide his interest in young men.

Friends and colleagues urged Foley to take steps to avoid scrutiny. He resigned his membership at a popular gay gym on the advice of his former longtime political advisor and chief of staff Kirk Fordham, according to one former Capitol Hill staffer.

Fordham also was known to follow Foley to parties, in some cases intervening to stop the congressman from inviting partygoers back to his apartment.

"Kirk told him to knock it off," said the former staffer, who is a Democrat.

In recent days, gay political staffers and activists have expressed anger with Foley.

"Thanks a lot, Mark," said Catania, the District of Columbia councilman. "You weren't any help to us when you were in the closet, and you've really hurt us now.

"It leaves the impression that we're all predators."

Rep. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), one of the two openly gay Democratic members of Congress, expressed concern this week that the Foley scandal could lead to a "real purge of gays in the Republican Party."

"Republicans," Frank said in an interview posted on TheAdvocate.com, the website of the Boston-based gay newspaper, "will now be more nervous having gay people in positions of power."

GOP Pushes Issues To Deflect Fallout (WT)

By Joseph Curl And Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

Republican lawmakers inside the Beltway are using a multipronged strategy to limit fallout from the Foley scandal: Focus on national security, keep congressional races on local issues and blame Democrats -- even operatives of former President Bill Clinton.

"We will do the same thing we have been doing -- spending tens of millions of dollars reminding voters this election is about local issues and local personalities and not a national referendum," said Carl Forti, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee.

Mr. Forti said average voters want to know where candidates stand on immigration and taxes, and they aren't daily bombarded in their local newspapers with dire predictions for Republicans' chances of keeping control of Congress in November.

"We built these House races in 2002 and 2004 on these issues because we knew President Bush wasn't going to have coattails," Mr. Forti said.

New polls, taken after Rep. Mark Foley of Florida resigned last week amid charges he sent sexually explicit e-mails to an underage male congressional page, show about half of likely voters said that recent disclosures will be very or extremely important in their vote next month.

One former senior administration official who remains close with top Bush advisers said the White House strategy is clear:

"We've got to start going back on the offense, doing what the president did in September, when he began to deliver a series of speeches on national security and the war on terror."

Republicans, the official said, will continue to address the scandal by saying "this is not endemic to the Republican Party, this is one bad guy ... and he's gone. Then, we pivot, say enough's enough, it's under investigation, we're not saying any more about it. ... If Democrats try to localize what is a national story, they do it at their peril."

At the White House, the strategy is simply to not talk about it, with press secretary Tony Snow telling reporters yesterday, "I will be maddeningly but consistently nonresponsive beyond what you are about to hear."

But outside the Beltway, some state Republican leaders say the party remains in disarray, with no cohesive message on how to deal with the daily sordid developments and keep the races from becoming a national indictment on the party.

"We haven't really seen much of a plan" for how to deal with the scandal, said Saul Anuzis, chairman of the Michigan Republican Party.

The state leader said there was an early talking-points e-mail to state leaders from the House Republican Conference, but that simply pointed out that the Democrat-controlled House in 1983 "was embroiled in scandal after two Members of Congress were found to have engaged in inappropriate sexual relations with teenage congressional pages."

Celinda Lake, a top Democratic pollster, said if Mr. Bush's job-approval rating remains in the 30s, then Republicans have a near-zero chance of holding the House and will probably lose the Senate as well.

But, said Miss Lake, an approval rating up around 44 percent will make it more difficult for Democrats to make the net gain of 15 seats to take control of the House and six seats to take over the Senate.

Republican analysts say the national party has been slow off the mark to deal with the developing Foley story.

Asked whether there was a plan to communicate with the nation outside the Beltway, Republican pollster Frank Luntz said, "No, and that's the problem."

"Back in the days of [former House Majority Leader] Tom DeLay, there would have been an immediate conference call, not to defend the position of the leadership, but to articulate what needs to be said from this point forward. There would have been sample releases, there would have been sample talking points, there would have been an op-ed produced -- none of that's happening," Mr. Luntz said.

The silence from Republican Party leaders has given Democrats locked in tight races across the country an edge. For instance, in Minnesota's 6th Congressional District race, Democrat Patty Wetterling, a children's-safety advocate, rushed a TV ad onto the air on Tuesday calling for a criminal investigation of Mr. Foley.

DOJ_NMG_0076563

On Wednesday, Mrs. Wetterling, who says in the ad that the Republican Party "knowingly ignored the welfare of children to protect their power," was chosen to the give the national Democratic response to tomorrow's weekly radio address by Mr. Bush.

Democrats, who for a year floundered to find a message to run on this year, say the Foley scandal illustrates that the Republicans are preoccupied with protecting their congressional majority at the expense of public interest, even the safety of young pages.

John Zogby, a Democratic pollster, said this scandal has legs because it is far more understandable than normal Washington scandals over policy or White House access.

"The bottom line is that married voters, parents and grandparents, are the ones who vote for Republicans, and there's damage out there, real damage."

He said that his recent polling shows a high number of evangelicals undecided, "and frankly, if they're undecided, they may not vote. ... Voters not showing up could be devastating."

House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, who some conservatives have said should resign over his handling of the scandal, on Wednesday suggested that operatives aligned with Mr. Clinton knew about the Foley accusations and might have been behind the disclosures in the closing weeks before the Nov. 7 elections.

The Illinois Republican offered no proof, and yesterday said he was merely citing press reports.

Democrats Use Foley Scandal To Hit GOP (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

The Democratic Party is using the unfolding scandal involving Rep. Mark Foley to bash Republican candidates and raise support for their party, arguing that Republicans have too much power and mishandled the situation.

From Virginia to New Mexico, Democrats have demanded the resignation of House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois and challenged Republicans to return money donated by Mr. Foley, who resigned last week after it was reported that he had sent sexually explicit electronic messages to teenage boys in the congressional page program. Meanwhile, the Democratic National Committee cited the scandal in two e-mails to supporters this week -- one asking for volunteers, the other asking for money.

In yesterday's fund-raising e-mail, DNC Chairman Howard Dean said Democratic operatives were ready to defeat Florida's Mr. Foley and Republicans long before the scandal, but stressed that "Democrats are fighting in important races up and down the ballot on the idea that the culture of corruption and cover-up just won't stand up against a message of real change."

The seemingly boldest attack on Republicans so far has come from House Democratic candidate Patty Wetterling in Minnesota, who began airing television ads contending Republican leaders "admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman," and "knowingly ignored the welfare of children to protect their own power." Mrs. Wetterling, a child safety advocate, was chosen by Democrats to deliver their weekly radio address tomorrow.

House Republican leaders have denied covering up the scandal. After resigning, Mr. Foley checked into a rehabilitation program for alcohol abuse, leaving Republican leaders scrambling to fend off critics who accuse them of covering up his behavior.

Mr. Hastert said yesterday he was "deeply sorry" the situation occurred, called for several investigations and a review of the page program, but denied any wrongdoing.

Democratic leaders quickly slammed him.

"The problem today isn't the page program," said Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada. "The problem today is that House Republican leaders had evidence of a sexual predator in their ranks and chose to cover it up instead of choosing to protect these children."

Jonathan Collegio, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee, counted 33 House campaigns so far in which the Democratic candidate has either called for Mr. Hastert to resign, urged the Republican candidate to return Mr. Foley's donations or made politically charged statements about the scandal.

He called such efforts "the type of election year antics that voters can see right through," and will reject.

The Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee this week blasted key Republican senators for refusing to acknowledge a Republican cover-up and lashed out at others, such as Sen. George Allen, Virginia Republican, for campaign contributions made by Mr. Foley.

Mr. Allen's office donated the amount Mr. Foley had given them to a Virginia nonprofit group that protects children.

New Mexico's Attorney General Patricia Madrid, a House Democratic candidate, called for Mr. Hastert to resign, then demanded her Republican opponent, Rep. Heather A. Wilson, join her -- a tactic used by other Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0076564

"They're using it to their benefit," said Jennifer Duffy, political analyst for the Cook Political Report. "Republicans would, too."

She warned it's premature to say the scandal will put Democrats over the top in the midterm elections because "voters have a fairly short attention span."

In the Loop (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

The controversy over whether embattled House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) should remain in office has divided hard-line anti-pedophiles such as conservatives Richard Viguerie , David Bossie and the Washington Times, who demanded Hastert's head, from moderate anti-pedophiles such as President Bush and Vice President Cheney and some talk-show types, who can better appreciate the larger implications of this matter.

One problem for the hard-liners is that there is no mechanism to force Hastert to quit, to give him the standard option of resigning or being fired. The House is not in session, so there's no way to have a vote until lawmakers return Nov. 9, after the election. (Bush could call them back in a true emergency, as he did in the Terri Schiavo case, but that doesn't appear likely.) What's more, House experts say there's no historical guide -- there has not been a vote to kick out a speaker in at least a century, maybe ever. (There is a provision that if the speaker doesn't show up for three days, the chair can be deemed vacant and a motion would be in order for the election of a new speaker.) Were the House around, presumably someone who voted for Hastert last time could call for a new vote.

One reason this situation may be unprecedented, a House official said, could be that a speaker, who technically doesn't have to be a member of the House, is only chosen for one Congress, or two years. Usually it would take someone a year or so to really mess up, and then their term would be almost up anyway. In the past, the House could "usually wait them out," he said.

Signs To Say Negron Will Get Foley Votes (AP-Y)

AP, October 6, 2006

Supervisors of elections in former Rep. Mark Foley's district may post signs telling voters that Joe Negron is the Republican candidate even though it will be Foley's name on the ballot, Florida elections officials said Thursday.

An e-mail from the State Division of Elections to election supervisors in counties that are part of Foley's district said that "preferably, the notice would be placed in every voting booth" and in absentee ballot mailings. The suggestion angered some Democrats who said it gives Negron unfair help.

Counties do not need to post such notices, but the agency sent out its recommendations after being asked by local elections officials, spokeswoman Jenny Nash said.

Foley had been heavily favored to beat Democrat Tim Mahoney in November before a scandal involving inappropriate messages to young pages led to his high-profile resignation. Republican leaders picked Negron, a state legislator, to replace him, but it was too late to put his name on the ballot.

State Democratic Party Chairwoman Karen Thurman sent a letter to state officials noting that state laws prohibit signs from being posted at polling places.

Nash said that the clarifying notices were meant to help voters, not any particular candidate, and that such notices have been used in past elections when a candidate has been replaced after ballots have already been printed.

Gov. Jeb Bush said the move would help alleviate confusion.

"Joe Negron is, by law, the candidate," Bush said. "You can't have his name on the ballot because of state law but to inform people is more than fair. ... To provide information is more than appropriate."

Foley Foe Was Long Shot, Now Has Big Shot (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. -- As Republican leaders in Washington work to contain the Mark Foley scandal, Democratic challenger Tim Mahoney is hoping it will propel him into Congress.

Mr. Mahoney has gone from long shot to strong contender because of Mr. Foley's resignation after news reports that he sent sexually explicit communications to teenagers who were House pages. It is a dramatic reversal for a political newcomer who had trailed Mr. Foley in most polls despite spending nearly $400,000 of his own money on the race.

But while Democrats are celebrating the likely gain of a solidly Republican House seat, the choice of Mr. Mahoney illustrates the ideological compromises the party is making to retake the House. A self-described conservative Democrat, Mr.

Mahoney is a former Republican who didn't switch his party affiliation until 2005. He describes Ronald Reagan as a political hero and himself as a "conservative Christian." He talks about the need to reduce abortions, though he doesn't favor banning them. Mr. Mahoney owns a gun and says he supports the right to firearms and doesn't want stricter gun laws. He also favors eliminating the estate tax on family farms and securing the nation's borders better.

Whatever his ideological leanings, there is little question that Mr. Mahoney's campaign slogan -- "to restore integrity to public office" -- was prescient. "My message hasn't changed. I was talking about morals and values and what's wrong with Washington a year ago," he says in an interview after a lunch-time campaign event here. "What's happened is that national events have caught up."

Aides to Mr. Mahoney say the campaign's fund raising has surged in the days since the Foley scandal broke. High-profile Democrats such as former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner are showing up to campaign with Mr. Mahoney.

Republicans aren't conceding the seat, and Joe Negron, the Republican state representative appointed to succeed Mr. Foley in the race, is pledging a fight. Mr. Negron's nascent campaign received a boost Tuesday when Florida's Division of Elections recommended that election supervisors in this affluent, Republican-leaning district post notices in voting booths and send letters to absentee voters indicating that votes for Mr. Foley count for Mr. Negron. Democrats are likely to challenge that recommendation in court since they are hoping to capitalize on the fact that Florida law requires Mr. Foley's name to stay on the ballot.

Still, strategists from both parties say Mr. Mahoney stands a better than even chance of winning the race, a sharp shift in electoral fortunes that is contributing to Democrats' optimism about taking the House next month.

Democrats need 15 seats to gain the majority, and have strong chances in three races once seen as firmly in Republican control. Besides the Foley seat, the others are those of former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay of Texas, who resigned amid fund-raising investigations, and of Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio, who pleaded guilty to bribery charges and isn't running for re-election.

"Those three seats are gifts for the Democrats," says nonpartisan political analyst Stuart Rothenberg. "The Republicans have wrapped them up with nice wrapping paper, put bows on them, and handed them to the Democrats."

Mr. Negron disputes that analysis, saying Mr. Mahoney is a "liberal Democrat" out of step with the values of a district that has elected Republican congressmen for the past 25 years. With $600,000 left over from his previous campaigns, Mr. Negron expects to raise at least $400,000 more in the final weeks of the campaign. Florida Gov. Jeb Bush will campaign with him next week, the first of a series of visits by prominent Republicans designed to distance Mr. Negron from the Foley scandal. "This election is not a referendum on Mark Foley, even though Tim Mahoney wants it to be," Mr. Negron says in an interview.

Within hours of Mr. Negron's selection, the Republican National Committee sent out talking points that quoted from a negative appraisal of Mr. Mahoney's candidacy by Mr. Rothenberg, who in October 2005 described the Democratic challenger as "an unpolished second- or third-tier House candidate who is not yet prepared for a U.S. House race."

Mr. Rothenberg says candidates like Mr. Mahoney generally improve over time and added that he now has the opportunity to run a positive, issues-based campaign because the scandal removed his strongest opponent.

"He's not being compared to a veteran Republican who won with 70% of the vote anymore; now the implicit comparison is with a disgraced Republican congressman," Mr. Rothenberg says.

Mr. Mahoney is saying little publicly about the scandal. "People don't want their congressmen out there continuing to fan the flames of this salacious thing," he says.

Instead, the 50-year-old financier is playing up his business background and the fact that he isn't a career politician. He grew up in a large Irish-Catholic family in New Jersey that venerated John F. Kennedy, but became a strong supporter of Mr. Reagan after graduating from college. He made his fortune in finance, running a small investment-banking firm out of his house. The firm grew into an investment-banking and private-equity company called vFinance Inc., which has more than 200 employees and $1 billion in assets.

Last year, Mr. Mahoney was in Washington trying to build support for an effort to promote job creation in small and midsize firms. He found himself in the office of Rep. Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat leading the party's effort to win back the House, and was surprised when Mr. Emanuel asked him to run for Congress. "I thought he wanted a donation," Mr. Mahoney says.

These days, Mr. Mahoney wakes at 6 a.m. to devote a few hours to vFinance business before starting a full day of fund raisers and campaign events like a meeting with the local chapter of the American-Israel Public Affairs Committee, where he faced questions about Iran's nuclear program. He says he expects to raise at least $2 million dollars, with much of that money coming from Democrats outside Florida who are energized about winning a race once written off as hopeless.

Mr. Negron says Democrats can only win in this district by tying the race to Mr. Foley, but Mr. Mahoney says he has a different Republican target in mind. "George W. Bush's approval rating in our district is 33%," he notes. "Even Mark Foley was trying to run away from the president."

Area Republicans Won't Hesitate To Vote Foley/Negron (PALMBEACHP)

By Jennifer Sorentrue

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 6, 2006

If you listen to the political pundits or even some Washington Republicans, it's going to be an uphill battle for the GOP to convince voters that a mark on their ballot for former U.S. Rep. Mark Foley is really a vote for replacement candidate Joe Negron.

With less than five weeks for Negron to raise money and campaign before the Nov. 7 election, some have even said it could even be an impossible feat. Negron, a state representative from Stuart, was chosen by Republican Party officials to replace Foley, who resigned in disgrace.

"To vote for this candidate (Negron), you have to vote for Mark Foley. How many people are going to hold their nose to do that?" House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, said in a radio interview with conservative commentator Sean Hannity this week.

But an informal survey of a dozen Republicans in Foley's former congressional district Thursday shows the experts may be wrong. Despite the scandal, most still plan to check Foley's name when they go to the polls, according to unscientific results.

"To me, it's the person — Foley — not the Republican Party," Stuart resident Mary Emrick said, referring to allegations that Foley exchanged sexually explicit Internet messages with teenage boys.

"You can't condemn the whole party," said Emrick, who typically votes Republican and plans to vote for Negron by marking Foley's name on her ballot. "There are people everywhere, in every walk of life, doing things. I think it's just the person."

Like Emrick, all of those surveyed said despite the allegations against Foley, they would have no problem recognizing that a vote for Foley is actually a vote for Negron. However, some said they don't know enough about Negron and haven't made up their minds in the race.

Although some political observers have suggested the allegations may cause Republicans to stay home on election day, many of those surveyed said they still planned to vote Republican straight through their ballot.

"I will turn out," said Martin County resident Renee Nesbit. "I will vote.... I'll just go ahead and vote Foley/Negron."

Nesbit, 58, said that any Republican who shies away from voting in the race because of Foley's actions is "just not using their head."

"I think that's really immature," Nesbit said. "There are using emotions over intellect."

Foley's former district, which includes parts of eight counties, stretching from Wellington to Fort Pierce and west to Port Charlotte, voted 54 percent for President Bush in 2004.

It was seen as a safe GOP seat until Foley's resignation last week. Now, Negron is expected to face a difficult race against Democrat Tim Mahoney.

Martin County resident Kurt Schaeffler, 40, said he needs to know more about Negron before deciding whether to vote for him. He will likely wait until the last minute before making a decision in the race, he said.

"I don't know anything about the man," Schaeffler said. "He is jumping into a situation where he is behind the ball.... Up until this new enlightenment, as far as I could tell Mark Foley was in there, and he was doing a good job. I would have left him right there."

Like Schaeffler, Stuart resident Chip DuBois doesn't know anything about Negron, but he plans to vote for him. He said there's no way he would vote for Mahoney.

"I would vote for my dog instead of Mahoney," DuBois said. "I just don't like him."

Royal Palm Beach resident Dana Hepworth said Negron seemed "capable," but didn't think he had enough time to reach voters before the election.

Still, he plans to vote for Negron. Most voters who select Foley's name will be doing it because they want to vote Republican, Hepworth said.

"The focus now is on Mark Foley, not the issues at hand," said Hepworth, 55, a certified addictions counselor. "I think (Negron) is in a real difficult situation. I think that anyone that is going to be voting for Negron is going to be voting strictly Republican."

Wellington resident Susan Gordon also made up her mind. She says she'll check Foley's name "just because I want to see a Republican in office."

While all of the Republicans surveyed were familiar with the scandal surrounding Foley, several said they knew little about the party's candidate for the U.S. Senate — Katherine Harris, who received at least as much publicity in 2000 as Foley is now. Harris, now a congresswoman from Longboat Key, was Florida's secretary of state, responsible for overseeing the disputed presidential election between Bush and Al Gore.

Harris is seeking to unseat U.S. Sen. Bill Nelson, a Democrat.

Royal Palm Beach resident Suzy Crawford said she'll probably vote for every Republican on her ballot. Asked about Harris, she said, "Don't know anything about her. But a woman could probably do a better job."

Rep. Pelosi Envisions A Better-run House (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti

AP, October 5, 2006

Relishing the prospects of a triumph, Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Thursday promised to restore integrity and civility to the House if voters put her party in control this fall.

"We'll turn the most closed and corrupt Congress into the most open and honest Congress," Pelosi, D-Calif., told The Associated Press in an interview.

She spoke five weeks before the midterm elections as the House ethics committee opened an investigation into an unfolding sex scandal that led to Rep. Mark Foley's resignation and calls for House Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., to step down.

"The only way you can make the change that needs to be made for our country — a new direction where we're there for the many and not the few — is to drain the swamp," said Pelosi, who is in line to be the nation's first female House speaker if Democrats ascend to power.

With Nov. 7 looming, an AP-Ipsos poll released Thursday found the majority of likely voters favoring Democrats to win control of the House and half of likely voters saying recent disclosures of corruption and scandal in Congress will be very or extremely important when they cast their vote.

Republicans are scrambling to try to stop the political bleeding that began last week when Foley resigned amid reports that he sent sexually explicit communications to teenage boys who once worked as House pages. That set off finger-pointing among House Republican leaders who were accused of failing to react quickly when they were warned of Foley's behavior.

Hastert spurned calls from the party's conservative base for his resignation. After days of cracks in support, House Republicans and others, including Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, rallied around the speaker. Still, some Republicans expressed fears that the scandal could cost the GOP the House.

In Idaho, Republican Rep. Mike Simpson said he was no longer confident that Republicans would retain power, a shift from a week ago when he was "fairly confident we were going to keep the majority." Now, he said, it's "a real tossup."

Republicans outside of Washington, meanwhile, chastised Democrats for criticizing House leaders while ignoring what Republicans called a long and tawdry history of Democratic impropriety and sex scandals.

"What we don't have to do is allow our friends on the left to lecture us on morality," former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, R-Ga., said at a party fundraiser in South Carolina. "There's a certain stench of hypocrisy."

On Capitol Hill, Pelosi expressed confidence that Democrats would gain the 15 seats they need to seize control of the House from Republicans who have ruled for a dozen years.

Should Democrats win, she promised they would approve rules to "break the link between lobbyists and legislation" and enact legislation adopting all the recommendations of the bipartisan commission that investigated the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks. The party's agenda also includes raising the minimum wage to $7.25 an hour and cutting the student loan interest rate.

The Foley scandal, Pelosi said, cuts to the heart of Democrats' argument that a change in power is needed and resonates with voting groups that will be crucial to who wins on Nov. 7 — senior citizens and women.

"This is an issue, though, that just highlights so clearly the fact that they don't play by the rules," Pelosi said, questioning why Republican leaders did not notify the bipartisan committee that oversees the page program when questions about Foley's behavior first arose.

"You would think if you knew of something like this, your best defense is to inform the Democrat on the committee," Pelosi said. "But they just don't see it that way."

"What could have been going through their heads, where they have an over-50-year-old man making these overtures to a kid" who was under the responsibility of Congress, Pelosi asked. "They chose not to address it."

How The Democrats Can Step Up (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

It's too late for the Democrats to forge coherent positions on Iraq or tax policy before the November elections. But fortune has presented them with a mission that can be summed up in a simple sentence: They must be the party of accountability and reform.

DOJ_NMG_0076568

The pollsters report that nearly two-thirds of the country now believes that America is heading in the wrong direction. The events of the past several weeks offer a devastating argument for the Democrats of why that is so. With the Republicans in control of the executive and legislative branches, arrogance has become a way of life. In a series of widely disparate cases -- from ignoring the ethics problems of former House majority leader Tom DeLay to refusing recommendations to fire Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld to covering up the egregious conduct of Rep. Mark Foley -- the Republican leadership's instinct has been political self-protection rather than accountability and effective government.

The Democrats are talking about a culture of corruption in Washington, but what are they going to do about it? That's the question Democrats should address over the next month if they want a mandate for change. If they win the House of Representatives, will the Democrats embark on a two-year binge of investigations and score-settling? Or will they get serious about solving the country's problems?

The challenge for the Democrats, if they do triumph in November, will be to break out of the partisan straitjacket that constricts American politics. That has been the real inner demon of the Republicans -- they appeared to care more about their party and its prerogatives than about the country's welfare. The Democrats, in recent years, have drunk deep from that same poisoned chalice, and they need to stop.

The Democrats' first priority next year should be ethics reforms that address the gross misconduct that surfaced in the DeLay and Jack Abramoff scandals. They should start by seeking GOP co-sponsorship for new legislation on lobbying and campaign finance. The Republicans will try to paint Democrats in the next Congress as liberal fanatics bent on revenge. The Democrats should answer with a spirit of bipartisanship -- an offer to work with the Republicans on effective oversight of the executive branch and congressional reform. If a Democratic victory in November becomes an exercise in "payback," the public rightly will be angry.

To see how far the Republicans have strayed from accountability, it's useful to recall their response to the DeLay scandal. At every opportunity, they tried to evade, obstruct and bully. When the House ethics committee admonished DeLay in late 2004 for ethics violations, the GOP leaders stonewalled. First they changed the Republican caucus rules so that DeLay could remain as leader even if he was later indicted. The leaders were forced to back down on that one, but they then fired the conscientious Rep. Joel Hefley as chairman of the ethics committee and purged two other Republican members and several staffers. The effect was to gut the committee, which didn't function at all during 2005.

Even after the Abramoff influence-peddling investigation brought a string of indictments, the GOP-controlled Congress failed to pass lobbying reforms. "These are the worst congressional scandals in three decades, and Congress has done absolutely nothing about it," argues Fred Wertheimer, president of the campaign watchdog group Democracy 21.

The case of Rumsfeld partakes of the same circle-the-wagons spirit that has sapped the GOP. Rumsfeld should have resigned after the Abu Ghraib scandal in mid-2004. (Imagine what that signal of accountability might have done to help America's image.) But by early this year, it was obvious even to those in the Bush White House that Rumsfeld had to go. They were moving to ease him out this spring when a parade of retired generals called publicly for his resignation. I'm told that the White House, fearful of being seen as caving in to pressure, backed off at that point and left Rumsfeld in place.

And now we have the Foley scandal, which, even by Washington standards, is a remarkable piece of hypocrisy and cronyism. For at least a year senior House Republicans knew or should have known that Foley had inappropriate communications with House pages. They did nothing -- and the only possible explanation is that they were afraid of political damage. Indeed, they allowed Foley to remain co-chairman of the House caucus on missing and exploited children until the day his revolting messages were disclosed.

The Democrats will benefit from the GOP meltdown to the extent that they offer the country a genuine alternative: In place of scandal, reform; in place of partisanship, cooperation; in place of arrogance, accountability.

9th Circuit Judge Protests Proposal For New Breakaway Circuit (LAW)

By Pamela A. Maclean, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, October 6, 2006

The long-simmering debate over splitting the nation's largest federal appellate court heated up last month when one 9th Circuit judge complained that a new breakaway circuit would have no Hispanic judges.

The Senate Judiciary Committee is currently considering S. 1845, a bill that would split the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, with California, Hawaii and Guam in a new, shrunken 9th Circuit. A new 12th Circuit would be composed of Arizona, Nevada, Oregon, Washington state, Idaho, Montana and Alaska.

DOJ_NMG_0076569

"I'm a Republican and an appointee of President Bush, and it dawned on me that the resulting 12th Circuit would be without a single Hispanic judge. Nobody is focused on this," said Judge Carlos T. Bea of San Francisco.

Bea joined the court in 2003. He was raised in Spain and is one of six Hispanic judges among the 9th Circuit's 49 active and senior judges.

In general, Republican lawmakers have pushed the split efforts while Democratic legislators generally oppose the move. A majority of the circuit's judges oppose a split, according to Chief Judge Mary Schroeder.

Arizona, with a population that is 25 percent Hispanic, and Nevada, with a 20 percent Hispanic population, would join the Pacific Northwest states, but without Hispanic judges, Bea said.

The circuit's Hispanic judges, Arthur Alarcon, Ferdinand Fernandez, Kim Wardlaw (whose mother is from Mexico), Richard Paez, Consuelo Callahan and Bea, all California-based judges, would remain on the split 9th Circuit.

Diarmuid O'Scannlain, a Portland, Ore.-based 9th Circuit judge who has backed a circuit split since the mid-1990s, declined to comment on Bea's concern.

O'Scannlain, who testified on Sept. 20 before the Senate Judiciary Committee in support of the split, said his concern is with effective judicial administration. He believes the circuit has become too large to manage. The restructuring of the court should not be based on Supreme Court "batting averages and public perception of any of our decisions.

"I am quite confident the circuit will be split someday ... but I have no idea when that may be," he said.

Bea said his concern "is important to the Hispanic bar and the Hispanic community." He said Hispanics "like to be represented the same as blacks. It is a sign you are accepted in the community. People I talk to are upset ... they want to see Hispanics achieve and be recognized."

TIED TO IMMIGRATION?

"We see this as tied to the immigration debate," said James Reyna, president of the Hispanic National Bar Association and an international trade partner at Williams & Mullen in Washington, D.C.

"The bill as it is now written would take the most integrated and diverse circuit, with good representation of Hispanics, and split it with a new 12th Circuit with no Hispanics," he said. "The concentration of Hispanics has a direct adverse impact on the Hispanic community.

Reyna said the split would also impose a larger caseload on the remaining judges in a new California-centered 9th Circuit because it would retain 80 percent of the caseload, more than 500 cases per judge, as opposed to 350 for the 12th Circuit.

Among the circuit's district courts, which would be divided along the same state lines, half the 5,700 immigration-related criminal offenses in 2005, such as illegal re-entry, come from Arizona and Nevada, while most of the rest came from Southern California. Among the 6,200 asylum and other immigration appeals to the 9th Circuit so far in fiscal year 2006, more than 5,000 arise in California alone, according to circuit statistics.

Bush Making Education Bill A Priority (AP)

By Nedra Pickler, The Associated Press

AP, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- President Bush said Thursday that renewing the No Child Left Behind law will be a priority for him next year but acknowledged the law isn't working as well for parents as it should.

The law requires schools that get federal poverty aid and fall short of their yearly progress goals for two straight years to offer transfers to students. After three years of failure, schools must offer low-income parents a choice of tutors.

Bush acknowledged, however, that those promises to parents aren't working as they should.

For example, many schools report their test scores late. So many parents don't find out that their children have a right to transfer until a new school year has begun.

"It kind of looks like people are afraid to put out results for some reason," Bush said in a speech at the Woodridge Elementary and Middle Campus, a thriving charter school in a run-down neighborhood five miles from the White House. "And so we'll work with Congress to clarify the law and to strengthen the law to make sure our parents get timely information and useful information."

Of more than 2.2 million children eligible for tutoring, only 19 percen't of them got it in 2004-05, according to auditors at the congressional Government Accountability Office.

Even fewer kids take advantage of the option to transfer to another school _ about 1 or 2 percent of those eligible, according to national estimates.

It is unsurprising that Bush would tout the No Child Left Behind law, considered the centerpiece of his first-term domestic agenda. As a matter of timing, though, making the law's renewal a priority could be significant.

DOJ_NMG_0076570

The law is scheduled to be reauthorized by Congress next year, but some education observers have speculated it may be bumped until as late as 2009, after the next presidential election.

The sooner the better _ that's the view among dozens of education groups that are seeking changes in the law, such as how kids are tested and how schools are graded.

Bush outlined a series of ways in which the law could be improved, such as by expanding testing in high schools, an idea he has pitched to Congress for two years. He also said he wants the federal government to pay for 28,000 low income students across the country to transfer to private schools, an initiative he has in the current budget request at a cost of $100 million.

His comments come after Education Secretary Margaret Spellings recently told reporters that that law is "like Ivory soap: It's 99.9 percent pure or something." Spellings later said she was referring to the core principles of the law and is willing to consider improvements to the law.

The law was passed with support of some leading Democrats who now say Bush has not provided enough funding to carry out the goals. Sen. Ted Kennedy, D-Mass., said he welcomes the opportunity to "get these essential reforms back on track."

"This administration and the Republican Congress have turned the No Child Left Behind Act into a political slogan rather than the solemn oath it was intended to be to our nation's students, parents, and teachers," Kennedy said.

Bush Pitches Incentive Pay For Teachers (WP)

By Theola Labbé

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

President Bush visited a high-performing charter school in Northeast Washington yesterday to call for changes to the No Child Left Behind education law that he said would help teachers raise student performance and give more choice to parents whose children attend failing schools.

Bush said Friendship-Woodridge Elementary and Middle School, which serves 550 students, meets the high academic standards that are demanded by the federal education law. The law, scheduled to be reauthorized by Congress next year, has been hotly debated. Critics charge that it focuses too much on test-taking and does not provide enough funding to address the underlying social and academic factors that affect the quality of education.

"I know people say that we test too much, but how can you solve a problem until you measure?" Bush said in the school's gymnasium to an audience of schoolchildren and officials in suits. "Measuring is the gateway to success."

Against a backdrop of No Child Left Behind posters featuring smiling children waving American flags, Bush proposed that teachers who raise student scores or decide to teach in hard-to-serve urban or rural school districts be paid bonuses under a new incentive fund for teachers. High schools, which now graduate 75 percent of their freshmen on time, would offer more rigorous courses through a new Advanced Placement training program for 70,000 teachers, Bush said.

Students smiled and pointed at the buzz of activity in school hallways as security officers and explosives-sniffing dogs milled about during Bush's visit. Bush toured a "smart lab," a classroom where middle school students made music on an Apple computer and demonstrated robotic vehicles that started and stopped at the sound of a handclap. He encouraged students to study and asked about their college plans.

The charter school, which is publicly funded, opened in 1998 and serves students in pre-K and up to eighth grade. The school, in the 2900 block of Carlton Avenue NE, is 99 percent African American, and 81 percent of its students are considered low-income. Bush said he chose Friendship-Woodridge for a visit because it had met the academic benchmarks on standardized tests for the past three years.

On the latest test, the D.C. Comprehensive Assessment, Friendship-Woodridge was among just four of 37 charter schools under the authority of the D.C. Public Charter School Board to make the grade. Many parents place importance on the scores, but D.C. school leaders say the results do not fully reflect how much a student may have improved.

Ross Wiener, policy analyst at the Education Trust, a national nonprofit that advocates for public education, praised Bush's ideas on teacher training. But he said the speech was focused on schools that are doing well and offered little guidance on how to help struggling schools turn around.

"That's what's on a lot of people's minds right now," Wiener said in a telephone interview.

Student reviews of Bush's speech were overwhelmingly positive. The president won over even Shawntese Gunner, 10, of Northeast. She said before his speech that she liked him "just a little bit" and was surprised to hear that he was visiting her school. She said she's a fifth-grader in Mr. Lakis's class. Andrew Lakis said his class calls itself the "307 A-Team," a reference to the class's room number and to the idea that all students can make A grades.

Shawntese gave the president's speech an A. "He explained that no child should be left behind," she said. "I like him a lot now."

Bush Says He'll Strengthen Education Policy (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang And Joel Havemann, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

Focusing on domestic issues for a couple of days, the president visits a school before tackling the economy today.

WASHINGTON — With his centerpiece education policy up for renewal, President Bush said Thursday that reauthorizing and strengthening the program was one of his top priorities for next year.

The law, known as "No Child Left Behind," which he signed one year after taking office, has divided educators, drawn sharp criticism recently from the Department of Education's inspector general, and prompted Democrats to complain that the administration has not put enough money into helping school districts meet its demands.

Bush, shifting his public focus away from the war in Iraq and the campaign against terrorism, is in the midst of two days of speaking out on domestic policy. Education was the theme Thursday, with a visit to the Education Department headquarters in Washington and then to a District of Columbia charter school. Today it's the economy, to be highlighted in a speech at a FedEx distribution facility.

But neither topic is a sure winner, even as he suggests they are reason to vote Republican in the upcoming elections.

In the first of six reports on No Child Left Behind, the Education Department's inspector general found the selection of reading curricula to be rife with conflict of interest — persons with financial stakes in reading programs are deciding which programs states can use.

In the report dated last month on the Reading First component of the program, the inspector general's office examined the panel chosen to assess the states' proposals for grants. It found that six of the 25 panelists had "significant professional connections" to a particular reading program.

Three of those six had links to the Reading Mastery program published by SRA/McGraw-Hill. Rep. George Miller (D-Martinez), said McGraw-Hill's chairman and previous chairman had between them contributed more than $23,000 to Bush and the Republican National Committee since 1999.

The president's remarks today on the economy will follow the announcement of monthly job figures and Allan B. Hubbard, chairman of the White House National Economic Council, forecast an upbeat tenor. He told reporters Thursday that despite the slowdown in housing prices, the still-high price of gasoline, and the ongoing problems of the Big 3 auto manufacturers, voters had reason to be optimistic about the economy.

Hubbard said the growth of the economy in the third and fourth quarters was likely to be in the 1% to 2% range, with growth for the year at 3%, which he presented as sustainable figures. "We feel very good about the economy," Hubbard said.

With Republicans struggling against the fallout of the scandal involving former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) and the continuing political weight of the Iraq war, such events as the visit to the Woodridge Elementary and Middle School in a rundown section of the nation's capital give Bush an opportunity to focus on a domestic policy issue that's far from the political spotlight. It was his second visit to a school this week, following his stop at George W. Bush Elementary School in Stockton.

Even involving a program that was a top priority when he took office, Bush acknowledged room for improvement. The measure expires at the end of the 2007-2008 school year but can be extended automatically if no changes are made.

The president said that parents are not necessarily getting information about students' progress quickly enough to switch a child's enrollment to another school if they think a change is necessary.

"We've got to improve options," the president said. He said that in some cases, parents were not being notified about how a child was performing until a new school year had begun.

"That doesn't help," he said, adding: "It kind of looks like people are afraid to put out results for some reason."

He also suggested school districts were not taking advantage of federal help providing tutoring for students, or were using the money for other purposes.

No Bush Left Behind (BSWK)

By Keith Epstein

BusinessWeek, October 16, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076572

The President's brother Neil is making hay from school reform

Across the country, some teachers complain that President George W. Bush's makeover of public education promotes "teaching to the test." The President's younger brother Neil takes a different tack: He's selling to the test. The No Child Left Behind Act compels schools to prove students' mastery of certain facts by means of standardized exams. Pressure to perform has energized the $1.9 billion-a-year instructional software industry.

Now, after five years of development and backing by investors like Saudi Prince Alwaleed Bin Talal and onetime junk-bond king Michael R. Milken, Neil Bush aims to roll his high-tech teacher's helpers into classrooms nationwide. He calls them "curriculum on wheels," or COWs. The $3,800 purple plug-and-play computer/projectors display lively videos and cartoons: the XYZ Affair of the late 1790s as operetta, the 1828 Tariff of Abominations as horror flick. The device plays songs that are supposed to aid the memorization of the 22 rivers of Texas or other facts that might crop up in state tests of "essential knowledge."

Bush's Ignite! Inc. has sold 1,700 COWs since 2005, mainly in Texas, where Bush lives and his brother was once governor. In August, Houston's school board authorized expenditures of up to $200,000 for COWs. The company expects 2006 revenue of $5 million. Says Bush about the impact of his name: "I'm not saying it hasn't opened any doors. It may have helped with some sales." (In September, the U.S. Education Dept.'s inspector general accused the agency of improperly favoring at least five publishers, including The McGraw-Hill Companies, which owns BusinessWeek. A company spokesman says: "Our reading programs have been successful in advancing student achievement for decades; that's why educators hold them in such high regard.")

The stars haven't always aligned for Bush, but at times financial support has. A foundation linked to the controversial Reverend Sun Myung Moon has donated $1 million for a COWs research project in Washington (D.C.)-area schools. In 2004 a Shanghai chip company agreed to give Bush stock then valued at $2 million for showing up at board meetings. (Bush says he received one-fifth of the shares.) In 1988 a Colorado savings and loan failed while he served on its board, making him a prominent symbol of the S&L scandal. Neil calls himself "the most politically damaged of the [Bush] brothers."

While hardly the first brother to embarrass a President -- remember Billy Carter's Billy Beer or Roger Clinton's cocaine? -- Neil could be the first to seek profit from a hallmark Presidential crusade. And also that of a governor: Jeb makes school standards a centerpiece in Florida, too.

Neil says he never talks shop with his brothers. He attributes his interest in education to his struggles with dyslexia. His son, Pierce, also had difficulties in school, he says. "Not one of our investors has ever asked for any kind of special access -- a visa, a trip to the Lincoln Bedroom, an autographed picture, or anything."

Computer System Under Attack (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

Hackers operating through Chinese Internet servers have launched a debilitating attack on the computer system of a sensitive Commerce Department bureau, forcing it to replace hundreds of workstations and block employees from regular use of the Internet for more than a month, Commerce officials said yesterday.

The attack targeted the computers of the Bureau of Industry and Security, which is responsible for controlling U.S. exports of commodities, software and technology having both commercial and military uses. The bureau has stepped up its activity in regulating trade with China in recent years as the United States increased its exports of such dual-use items to the growing Chinese market.

This marked the second time in recent months that U.S. officials confirmed that a major attack traced to China had succeeded in penetrating government computers.

"Through established security procedures, BIS discovered a targeted effort to gain access to BIS user accounts," said Commerce Department spokesman Richard Mills. "We have no evidence that BIS data has been lost or compromised."

The significance of the attacks was underscored in a series of e-mails sent to BIS employees by acting Undersecretary of Commerce Mark Foulon since July, informing them of "a number of serious threats to the integrity of our systems and data." In an August e-mail, Foulon reported that the bureau had "identified several successful attempts to attack unattended BIS workstations during the overnight hours." Then, early last month, he wrote: "It has become clear that Internet access in itself is a vulnerability that we cannot mitigate. We have tried incremental steps and they have proven insufficient."

A source familiar with the security breach said the hackers had penetrated the computers with a "rootkit" program, a stealthy form of software that allows attackers to mask their presence and then gain privileged access to the computer system. The attacks were traced to Web sites registered on Chinese Internet service providers, Commerce officials said. "We determined they were owned by the Chinese," a senior Commerce official said. He did not say who in China was responsible or whether officials had even been able to identify the culprits. Although bureau employees were informed of the problem in July, commerce officials declined to say when the attacks were discovered and how long they had been going on. Only over time did bureau officials realize the extent of the damage from the breach.

"The more we learned, the more we did," the senior official said.

Since Sept. 1, the bureau has blocked employees from accessing the Internet from their own computers. Instead, several separate computers unconnected to the BIS computer network have been set up so employees can try to continue carrying out their duties.

Commerce officials have also decided they cannot salvage the workstations that employees had been using and instead will build an entirely new system for the bureau in the coming months with "clean hardware and clean software," the senior official said. Foulon told employees in late August that they hoped to replace all the bureau's workstations within three months.

The official acknowledged that some of the emergency measures have made it more difficult for the bureau to communicate with other government agencies and the public, including companies that turn to BIS for export licenses.

In July, the State Department confirmed that hackers in China had broken into its computers in Washington and overseas. Last year, U.S. officials reported that the Defense Department and other U.S. agencies were under relentless attack from unidentified computers in China.

China has long been a focus of high-level attention at BIS and was the destination for the largest number of licenses approved by the bureau in 2004, according to the bureau's most recent annual report. In weighing applications for licenses, bureau officials seek to protect U.S. national security interests without hamstringing legitimate commercial trade.

Commerce officials recently reported that they had taken significant steps to enhance computer security at the department, both by deploying new software and improving the management of the system.

These steps came after the General Accounting Office (since renamed the Government Accountability Office) issued a scathing report five years ago, which concluded that "significant and pervasive computer security weaknesses place Department of Commerce systems at risk." The report found that outsiders could gain unauthorized access to the computer system and access confidential data. "Intruders could disrupt the operations of systems that are critical to the mission of the department," the report found.

Justices Make Points By Questioning Lawyers (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — At the Supreme Court, oral arguments give the justices a chance to hear lawyers' best lines of reasoning. The hour-long sessions in the ornate courtroom also offer the justices a chance to make their own case — to each other.

Oral arguments, which began anew this week with the start of the 2006-07 term, provide one of the few times each week that all nine justices are together and presumably open to persuasion. As the justices fire questions at lawyers at the court's lectern, they also telegraph their views to one another.

It's a routine that is likely to become more intriguing this year on the divided court. Conservative Justice Samuel Alito begins his first full term after replacing the more moderate Sandra Day O'Connor, and Chief Justice John Roberts, who replaced the late William Rehnquist a year ago, continues to establish his presence.

“Well, the answer would be because Congress is worried that people won't comply. That's why,” Breyer said. “And there are millions of ways of harassing people. They start issuing a complaint. … You freeze them out.”

Liberal Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg then asked about a hypothetical worker whose work hours were changed after she filed a discrimination complaint, forcing the worker to choose between her job and caring for her disabled child. Scalia was not satisfied with the lawyer's response and offered his own.

“I mean, to be sure, that's a possibility,” the lawyer said when Scalia was done. “That's a possible answer.”

(In the end, Scalia — who initially had seemed skeptical of a worker's discrimination claim in the case — joined an 8-1 ruling that enhanced workers' ability to bring claims for a range of actions by employers. Alito was the lone dissenter.)

DOJ_NMG_0076574

In many oral arguments, lawyers "need to be speaking with not only the justice who has asked the question, but the one to whom the question is actually addressed," says Walter Dellinger, a former U.S. solicitor general, which is the government's top lawyer before the high court.

Roberts and Alito are relatively new to the court, so the justices also use oral arguments to get a sense of their colleagues' positions.

"They seemed to be listening more" when Roberts and Alito came on the bench last term, says Thomas Goldstein, a lawyer who argues frequently before the Supreme Court.

Goldstein notes that until the 2005-06 term, the court had gone 11 years without a change in membership, and the justices seemed to instinctively know each other's general approach, as well as what the court's overall view was likely to be.

During the 1970s and 1980s, oral arguments were not as spirited. A lawyer could talk on and on without getting a question or comment from the bench.

The court's veterans then, including William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, Harry Blackmun and Lewis Powell, had few queries, says lawyer Beth Brinkmann, a former Blackmun clerk who is in private practice and argues before the court.

Today, with the exception of the typically silent Clarence Thomas, who is perhaps the court's most conservative member, the justices each ask many questions and make known their concerns about a case.

The appointment of the voluble Scalia in 1986 marked a change in the court's open sessions. During his first days on the bench, Scalia asked so many questions that Powell, according to biographer John Jeffries, leaned over to Marshall and whispered, "Do you think he knows that the rest of us are here?"

As other justices were appointed, the bench grew livelier.

During the same period, Rehnquist, who was chief justice from 1986 to 2005 and was known for running efficient sessions, limited the discussion among justices in their private conferences. So oral arguments became a way for justices to lay the groundwork for arguments they would be making on paper later.

Cases ultimately are resolved through a series of memos and draft opinions that circulate among the justices. It's a written conversation, played out over weeks and sometimes months between the justices' preliminary private vote in the case and the public announcement of a ruling.

David Frederick, a Washington lawyer who argued four cases before the court last term, says he considers oral arguments a kind of "three-way" conversation, among a justice, the lawyer at the lectern and a potentially persuadable justice. With the Roberts court, he says, "it is at a slightly lower tone, because my sense is that the justices have more of a chance to flesh out their arguments in conference."

That does not stop justices from trying to make their case through lawyers who appear before the court. During one of his first sessions, Roberts — who often argued before the court as a lawyer for the government and then in private practice — tried to get a lawyer to alter her arguments in a dispute over public employees' speech rights. "I would have thought you might have argued that it's speech paid for by the government … so there's no First Amendment issue at all," Roberts said.

In the same case, Roberts posed a hypothetical question that involved "a memo from a law clerk that says, 'Justice So-and-So's jurisprudence is wacky.' "

Scalia cut in. "Nobody's wacko here."

Democrats Hold Edge In Election Interest (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

See updates to Washington Wire each weekday at www.washwire.com1.

In new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll, 51% of Democrats express highest possible level of interest in the elections, compared with 43% of Republicans. Democratic edge on that harbinger of motivation to vote is up slightly from 51%-46% edge in early September.

A month before Election Day, timing of Foley turmoil is "as bad as it can be" for Bush's party, says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who conducts the Journal/NBC poll with Republican counterpart Bill McInturff. Republicans hope cash and voter-turnout advantages will neutralize Democratic enthusiasm.

Poll has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.5 percentage points.

Senior citizens back Democrats to control Congress by 48%-43% -- smaller than party's overall edge among all voters.

DOJ_NMG_0076575

The Energy Department plans to lower forecast next week from earlier fourth-quarter projection of $2.58 per gallon; economists expect drop in inflation as well. Though labor-market report could show weakness, falling pump prices reduce sting of Democratic attacks on economy.

Proportion of electorate calling gas prices a top voting issue plummets to 11% from 23% a month ago. Only 12% credit the president for lower prices, suggesting few share suggestions by Bush adversaries that White House has engineered price declines to help Republican candidates.

SECURITY REMAINS Democrats' vulnerability.

Among independents, just 29% express high confidence that Democratic Party policies will keep America safe from terrorism, matching 29% who have little or no confidence. A 47% plurality of independents lack confidence in Republicans on Social Security and Medicare; Democrats hope to elevate those issues in campaign dialogue.

Two-thirds of the electorate, including 47% of Republicans, say they would be more likely to vote for a Democratic candidate who backs a minimum-wage increase. Six in 10 independents would be more likely to support a Democrat calling for "phased withdrawal" from Iraq.

By 47%-26%, voters are more likely to back a Republican who supports a Mexican border fence.

ANONYMOUS: State Department will award more than 20 grants of as much as $1.5 million for Iran-related democracy and human-rights work, most of it outside Iran. Since U.S. fears Iranian meddling, "don't expect a lot of transparency" on who gets awards, a State official says.

MORE FLAK: Former White House official David Kuo will publish a book this month slamming administration's commitment to "faith-based" programs. A person familiar with book's content says it will characterize centerpiece of Bush's compassionate conservatism as "big talk, little action."

BULL MARKET? Six in 10 say rising stock market hasn't affected their view of the economy. Retirees and Midwesterners applaud Wall Street's climb the most, with a third of each group reporting greater confidence.

FALLEN STAR: Rep. Foley's exit sets back Republican effort to build political and fund-raising ties to Hollywood. He worked with lobbying group dubbed "entertaining Republicans" that courted studio heads with an argument that the party is stronger than Democrats on protecting intellectual property.

"It's a massive task," says spokeswoman for the Senate Intelligence chairman. Among three sections not yet finished, one compares administration statements with underlying intelligence, and another looks at Pentagon's "Office of Special Plans."

By 52%-28%, conservatives say Iraq war is helping U.S. win antiterror fight, while 72% of liberals and 48% of moderates say it's hurting. Women say it's hurting instead of helping by 48%-27%; men are more evenly divided.

Majorities in all regions and income groups say Iraq is in civil war.

MINOR MEMOS: Southerners and Midwesterners narrowly approve of new law on terror tribunals, while Westerners and Northeasterners disapprove....Just 40% of voters hold favorable view of President Bush, but 66% feel warm toward the first lady.

Anti-Bush Protesters Hold Loop March (CHIT)

By Brendan McCarthy And Emma Graves Fitzsimmons

Chicago Tribune, October 6, 2006

Many of the protesters marching through downtown Thursday against the Bush administration were veteran activists, but the demonstration was a first for Gina Latinovich.

After learning of the event from a leaflet at a farmers market, the housewife from River Forest and her 11-year-old daughter attended their first protest together.

"I've been feeling hopeless about the war and global warming, and I realized I couldn't wait anymore," said Latinovich, 49. "We're actually the silent majority. Maybe this is the turning point."

Police estimated that about 1,500 people attended Chicago's march from Grant Park to Federal Plaza Thursday afternoon during a day of national protests in more than 100 cities called "World Can't Wait—Drive Out the Bush Regime."

Although the protesters had a shared distaste for the Bush administration, the name of the march held a different meaning for each one. Latinovich said it meant criminal investigations into Bush policies such as the Iraq war, wiretapping and the use of torture. For others, it meant everything from impeachment to the Democrats winning November congressional elections.

Rebecca Miller, a freshman at Columbia College, missed her afternoon cultural anthropology class to attend the rally because she said she feared the Iraq war was only breeding more terrorism. She said she hoped young people would vote to push the Republicans out of Congress to put a check on the president.

But Miller was one of many protesters disappointed with the turnout, which had "more police than protesters," she said. Police were prepared for a march of more than 10,000 people, the figure protest organizers had expected. Several protesters theorized that turnout was low because the people who shared their views weren't willing to leave school or work in the middle of the day.

More than 100 state, county and city police officers, some wearing riot gear, lined the 3½-block parade route along Jackson Boulevard. There were no problems with protesters or street closures, officials said.

The march turned out to be much shorter than planned because the group's permit application for a 2-mile route through downtown along North Michigan Avenue was denied by city officials two weeks ago.

In a last-minute effort, organizers appealed the city's decision in federal court Thursday morning. Just hours before the march began, U.S. Magistrate Judge Nan Nolan denied the group's request for a temporary restraining order against the city. She said the request for a restraining order came too late—that it would be unfeasible at the 11th hour to reroute CTA buses and make alternate plans for emergency vehicles.

Protesters started gathering shortly before noon in Grant Park at Jackson and Columbus Drives. Speakers including actors, poets and political activists addressed the crowd on subjects ranging from the response to Hurricane Katrina to the Bush administration's policies in Iraq.

Tribal drummers performed, participants carried protest signs reading "Out of Iraq" and "No War in Iran," and one man wore a mask of Bush, devil horns and a cape. The march arrived around 3 p.m. at Federal Plaza, where speeches and performances continued into the evening.

Thyandrea Adams, 29, who arrived at the protest with two busloads of people from the Cabrini-Green housing complex, said she shut down her moving business for the day to attend the march. Adams, who said she wants the president impeached, said her biggest issue is how funding for the Iraq war is keeping money from poor neighborhoods like hers.

"I told them not to come into work today," Adams said of her 15 employees. "This is a day that's important. It was worth it to show support from our community."

Hundreds Protest 'Bush Regime' (SEAPI)

By Mike Barber

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 6, 2006

One was Linda Boyd, a Clyde Hill mom and housewife. Another was Linda Strader, a West Seattle real estate agent. Patricia Thompson, a Seattle legal assistant, turned out with her law firm.

They were among several hundred protesters who rallied all day in Seattle against President Bush on Thursday, one of about 200 coordinated demonstrations nationwide organized by World Can't Wait -- Drive Out the Bush Regime. The day began at the University of Washington, moved to 11th Avenue and Olive Way on Capitol Hill and eventually to an all-night rally in front of the federal building downtown.

Police arrested five people.

Police arrested three protesters at the Capitol Hill rally and booked them into the King County Jail for obstructing and resisting arrest, including one for investigation of assault, Seattle police spokeswoman Deborah Brown said.

Police, who also guarded protesters' safety, arrested a fourth person possessing an illegal fixed blade knife.

As the protest moved downtown, police arrested a fifth person near 12th and Olive who was carrying a rifle wrapped in a blanket.

"We don't know what his intentions were," Brown said.

Asked what motivated them to protest, nearly everyone in attendance cited a litany of reasoned, passionate concerns -- the conduct of the war in Iraq, domestic spying, erosion of civil liberties and the botched federal response to Hurricane Katrina. They said Bush's recent signing of a bill authorizing tough detainee interrogation amounts to legalizing torture.

"I'm probably the only Realtor out here," Strader, 53, said of the first demonstration she has attended in her life. "I just decided today to put my convictions where my mouth is."

Having grown up an "Army brat," Strader said she has sympathy for troops she thinks are being misused by being ordered to fight in Iraq. She also said she is "mad and scared that someone could come into my home due to my convictions," referring to her fears of domestic spying and that the Constitution has been eroded during the Bush administration.

"It makes me so emotional. I feel very frustrated, and I love my country," Strader said.

Boyd, in her late 40s, said: "What has galvanized me is the erosion of our Constitution -- of the 10 amendments in the Bill of Rights, seven have been eroded. As a housewife and mom, I felt I could no longer sit by and see our government destroyed."

Boyd ticked off a list of concerns, calling the war in Iraq illegal and for Bush's impeachment.

"Torture is not an American value," she said, referring to abuses of Iraqi prisoners in the war on terrorism. "President Bush's disdain for the law is intolerable."

Patricia Thompson, 50, of Seattle, a legal assistant whose law firm turned out for the protest, said she had been joined earlier in the day by her 82-year-old father, a World War II veteran of the 10th Mountain Division. The demonstration "was a good thing for my father to come watch," Thompson said.

"He is horrified at the mess they made of Iraq. Weapons of mass destruction was a snow job. We never finished in Afghanistan. It's an absolute shambles of incompetency and profiteering," Thompson said.

One of the younger demonstrators, meanwhile, who gave her name only as Jackie, said she attended because: "I'm one person wanting to be with many. We can do a lot by being together."

Administration Foes Step Out Statewide (SEATIMES)

By Tan Vinh

The Seattle Times, October 6, 2006

Scores of anti-war activists, environmentalists and high-school students marched from the University of Washington campus to Capitol Hill and then to downtown Seattle Thursday, berating President Bush for everything from his management of the Iraq war to the handling of Hurricane Katrina.

Across the state, more than 250 related demonstrations were held, including rallies in Bellingham, Everett, Tacoma, Olympia, Wenatchee and Spokane, said organizers of the National Day of Mass Resistance. They said protests also were held as far away as Switzerland and Nepal.

In Seattle, police arrested three protesters for investigation of obstruction, resisting arrest and assault in connection with "some kind of altercation with officers at the scene," said police spokeswoman Debra Brown. Officers said one man carried a rifle wrapped in a blanket to a rally at Cal Anderson Park on Capitol Hill.

Overall, authorities called the rallies peaceful. Demonstrators did cause traffic congestion around 4 p.m. at the Federal Building in downtown Seattle, where the protest was to end at midnight with a sit-in.

In Seattle, protesters bashed Bush for his policies on the environment, abortion and in Iraq and Afghanistan, and criticized his administration for its hard stance against Iran and North Korea.

Conspiracy theorists also were on hand, accusing the administration of dynamiting levees in New Orleans and being complicit in the Sept. 11 attacks.

The rallies were organized by activists calling themselves The World Can't Wait, which called on students to walk out of class to join the protest. Dozens of high-school students, saying they were from Seattle, Woodinville and Vashon Island, joined in, holding "Impeach Bush" banners and "Drive out the Bush regime!" signs.

Event spokeswoman Maggie Lawless acknowledged principals and parents might be upset that some students cut classes but added, "It's a bigger sacrifice to not take a stand."

In Olympia, where a small group of protesters gathered on the Capitol lawn, Kenn Dzaman, 47, wore a "Got Fascism?" T-shirt and called Bush a "lunatic." Dzaman worries what will happen to the world if more people don't speak up.

"If you do not get off your couch and put on your walking shoes, there's something wrong," said Dzaman. "People need to wake up and start telling how they really feel."

Big Government Gets Bigger (WP)

By Christopher Lee

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

The federal government keeps getting bigger.

The Republican Party's oft-stated affinity for smaller government has not applied during the Bush administration. According to a recent study, not only is the number of federal civil servants on the rise, but so are the numbers of employees working for government-funded contractors and for organizations that receive government grants.

Roll all of those together -- and mix in the numbers of postal workers and military personnel on the federal payroll -- and the "true size" of the federal government stands at 14.6 million employees, said Paul C. Light, the study's author and a government professor at New York University.

That compares with 12.1 million employees in 2002, said Light, who has tracked the growth of government for years and has data for as far back as 1990. The latest increase is almost entirely due to contractors, whose ranks swelled by 2.5 million since 2002, Light wrote in his 10-page research brief.

"This time, almost all of the growth can be attributed from the war on terrorism, which boosted Defense spending for both goods and services systems and covered the continued cost of the wars in Afghanistan and Iraq," he wrote.

"The rest of the hidden workforce held steady at roughly 2.9 million grantees, while civil service employment inched up and postal employment fell."

Light calls the 10.5 million federal contractors and grantees the government's "hidden workforce" because politicians tend not to mention them when discussing the size of the federal bureaucracy. Yet such workers absorbed nearly $400 billion in federal contracting funds and $100 billion in federal grants in 2005. They often performed vital work such as researching new vaccines, running federal computer systems and making body armor, weapons and meals for the military.

The number of civil servants is increasing, too, up 54,000 since 2002 to 1.9 million workers. That is still fewer than the 2.2 million civil servants on the federal payroll in 1990, at the end of the Cold War.

Light acknowledges that his numbers of contractors and grantee employees are estimates from federal procurement and grant data, and are harder to nail down than the number of civil servants. But the trend is clear, he said.

Politicians who focus on the size of the civil service and fail to acknowledge the hidden workforce "encourage the public into believing that it truly can get more for less," Light said. And the heavy reliance on such workers, while sometimes necessary, makes it more difficult to figure out who is accountable when things go wrong, he said.

"The federal government often uses contractors and grantees to provide talent it cannot recruit, specialized services it cannot produce, competition it cannot generate among its own organizations, and equipment that it cannot and should not build itself," Light wrote.

"[I]t hardly matters who produces the goods and services as long as the federal government is honest with the public about the true cost of delivering on the promises it makes."

Tax Tidal Wave (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

Congress keeps breaking the Beltway Book of World Records for spending money, but the government will soon report that the federal budget deficit for the just-completed 2006 fiscal year fell to about $260 billion.

What's the secret of this deficit success that you aren't reading much about this election year? It isn't spending restraint. The federal budget expanded to $2.7 trillion last year, a 9% increase, or three times the inflation rate. Over the past six years the federal budget has increased by 49.2%.

The main cause of the deficit decline -- 90% of it, says White House budget director Rob Portman -- is a tidal wave of tax revenue. Tax collections have increased by $521 billion in the last two fiscal years, the largest two-year revenue increase -- even after adjusting for inflation -- in American history. If you're surprised to hear that, it's probably because inside Washington this is treated as the only secret no one wants to print. On the few occasions when the media pay attention to the rise in tax collections, they scratch their heads and wonder where this "surprising" and "unexpected windfall" came from.

One place it has come from are corporations, whose tax collections have climbed by 76% over the past two years thanks to greater profitability. Personal income tax payments are up by 30.3% since 2004 too, despite the fact that the highest tax rate is down to 35% from 39.6%. The IRS tax-return data just released last month indicates that a near-record 37% of those income tax payments are received from the top 1% of earners -- "the rich," who are derided regularly in Washington for not paying their "fair share."

More good news is that dividend-tax payments appear to be up as well, even though the tax rate was lowered to 15% from as high as 39.6%. A National Bureau of Economic Research study found that "after a continuous decline in dividend payments over more than two decades, total regular dividends have grown by nearly 20%" and that this reversal happened at "precisely the point at which the lower tax rate was proposed and subsequently applied retroactively." There hasn't been a purer validation of the Laffer Curve since Ronald Reagan rode off into the sunset.

As for the budget deficit, at $260 billion it is now about 2% of our $13 trillion economy, well below the 2.7% average of the last 40 years. Most states and localities are also afloat in tax collections, and including their revenue surpluses brings the total U.S. public sector borrowing down to roughly 1.5% of GDP. Not too shabby given that we're waging a war on terrorism and Congress spent $50 billion last year on Hurricane Katrina clean-up.

Anyway, we thought our taxpaying readers might like to know how much you've all been contributing to the falling deficit -- the best-kept secret in Washington.

Falling Into The Doughnut Hole (NYT)

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

Millions of elderly Americans enrolled in the new Medicare prescription drug program are approaching the notorious "doughnut hole," a gap in coverage that will force them to pay for their medicines out of pocket until they qualify for catastrophic coverage. Many of the heaviest users of prescription medications have already fallen into the hole — an unwelcome surprise for the many who do not pay much attention to the fine print of their policies.

The hole makes little sense from a medical or insurance perspective. Rather, it is the inevitable result of designing a program with political rather than programmatic aims in mind. And the danger is that some who are ailing, suddenly faced with higher drug bills than they expected, will forgo needed medications and get sicker.

The Medicare drug program was designed to serve three overlapping purposes. The two most important features are designed to help the elderly in greatest need. One subsidizes medication for low-income people. The other provides catastrophic coverage that pays the vast bulk of the bills for the heaviest users of prescription drugs, after they have paid $3,600 of their own money for their medications. Those elements alone justify the program and are the reason we endorsed it from the beginning.

But at the same time, Congress insisted that the program provide benefits to all eligible Americans by covering their initial drug purchases (except for deductibles and co-payments) up to a specified limit, at which point they fall into the "doughnut hole" until reaching the threshold for catastrophic coverage. In a perfect world, all elderly Americans should share in the benefits of the prescription drug plan. But given the fiscal realities in Washington, trying to include everyone was irresponsible.

The decision to offer shallow initial coverage to all beneficiaries was largely an effort to please the millions of middle-class elderly voters who had been led to expect they would benefit from the drug plan. But with nowhere near enough money in deficit-ridden Washington to pay for all this, the doughnut hole emerged as the only way to combine politics with some modicum of cost control.

A more rational approach would certainly have been to begin with complete coverage for the needy and spread that benefit to higher income levels as the money becomes available. As it stands now, reputable surveys suggest that at least three million Americans will fall into the hole by year's end.

Those who can afford to may want to pay an additional premium for a Medicare drug plan that provides coverage for the gap, although the plan frequently covers only generic drugs. The plan offerings for next year will include more options to buy coverage to fill the gap. The good news is that contrary to some analysts' expectations, the number of available plans are going to expand rather than shrink. The bad news for Medicare recipients who have become confused by the wide range of options is that beneficiaries in all but two states will be able to choose from among more than 50 free-standing drug plans for next year.

Despite the irritation over the doughnut hole and some serious start-up problems, the new program seems in general to have found its stride. It is delivering benefits at lower cost than initially projected and ranks high in surveys of consumer satisfaction. The average number of drugs covered by insurers next year will increase by 13 percent, to 4,390. And the average premium for those who remain in their current plan will remain at roughly the same level, about $24 a month. But those already enrolled in a plan would be wise to check for any changes when full details of next year's offerings are posted. In some cases, premiums are rising and drugs previously on the formularies have been dropped.

Dow Hits 3rd Straight Record Close (AP)

By Ellen Simon

AP, October 5, 2006

NEW YORK (AP) - Wall Street rose modestly Thursday, nudging the Dow Jones industrial average to its third straight record high close as investors welcomed upbeat retail sales and jobless claims figures.

The Dow closed at 11,866.69, surpassing the record of 11,850.61 set Wednesday. The blue chip index traded up to 11,870.06, which stands as its trading high.

Rising oil prices didn't smother investors' good mood.

"Considering the distance we've come over the last three months and certainly the last three days, it's interesting we could have a data point like oil's climb and not have the market backup much," said Arthur Hogan, chief market analyst at Jefferies & Co. "It's certainly a scenario where the longer term prospects for the market are looking more positive."

The Dow rose 16.08, or 0.14 percent. The blue chips have gained 196.34 over the past three sessions; on Tuesday, the index shattered closing and trading highs that had stood since Jan. 24, 2000, toward the end of the dot-com boom.

Broader stock indicators were also higher Thursday. The S&P 500 index rose 3.00, or 0.22 percent, to 1,353.22, and the Nasdaq composite index rose 15.39, or 0.67 percent, to 2,306.34.

Bonds fell as stocks wavered, with the yield on the 10-year Treasury note at 4.61 percent, up from 4.56 percent Thursday. The U.S. dollar was mostly higher against other major currencies. Gold prices rose.

The day's economic news was stronger than expected, with retailers such as Target Corp. (TGT), Nordstrom Inc. (JWN) and Limited Brands Inc. (LTD) reporting their same-store sales in September surpassed analysts forecasts. Also, the number of new unemployment claims dropped to its lowest level in 10 weeks.

Still, just where stocks are in their long recovery from their 2002-03 lows remains a topic of debate on Wall Street.

Some traders have questioned the depth of the rally, saying technical markers such as the ratio of advancers to decliners are weaker than they've hoped. And while the Dow has recovered, the S&P 500 still remains more than 11 percent off its all-time high.

Other traders say the market's biggest fears - high energy prices and additional rate hikes by the Federal Reserve - are behind it, leaving room for a greater run-up in stock prices.

Hugh Johnson, chairman and chief investment officer of Johnson Illington Advisors, said he sees this as a stock market in the more advanced stages of a recovery that has been driven, in large part, by declining energy prices.

In company news, Wyeth fell 28 cents to $50.90 after a Philadelphia jury awarded a woman $1.5 million after finding that the drug company's hormone replacement drug was a factor in her breast cancer. This is the second such case against the company to go to trial; Wyeth won the first.

Wal-Mart Stores Inc. (WMT) dropped $1.14 to $48.41 after the world's largest retailer reported disappointing September sales. Rival discounter Target Corp. rose $1.05 to $58.68 after it reported a solid sales gain for the month and beat analyst estimates.

Nordstrom Inc. rose 25 cents to $45.44 and Limited Brands Inc. dropped 12 cents to $27.87.

Marriott International Inc. (MAR), the world's largest hotel company by revenue, said its third-quarter earnings weakened, falling 5.4 percent. But its 33 cents per share net income beat estimates of 30 cents and the stock rose $2.52 to $40.85.

Class A Shares of Berkshire Hathaway Inc. (BRKA), Warren Buffett's investment company, crossed $100,000 a share for the first time Thursday, before retreating slightly. The shares closed up $1,301.00 at $99,000.

The Russell 2000 index of smaller companies rose 9.61, or 1.31 percent, to 743.08.

Consolidated volume on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.73 billion shares, compared with 2.99 billion Wednesday.

Overseas, Japan's Nikkei stock average surged, rising 2.28 percent as investors welcomed Thursday's advance on Wall Street. Britain's FTSE 100 rose 0.64 percent, Germany's DAX index gained 0.48 percent, and France's CAC-40 increased 0.61 percent.

Dow Rises To A Third Straight Record, Shaking Off Oil's Effect In Final Hour (WSJ)

By Peter A. McKay

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

The Dow Jones Industrial Average rallied modestly to a third straight record, despite a rise in oil prices that kept stocks underwater for much of the day.

The Dow industrials gained 16.08 points, or 0.1%, to 11866.69, up 10.7% so far for 2006. At its intraday low soon after midday, the industrial average was off nearly 30 points; it broke into positive territory for good in the final hour of trading. Caterpillar was the strongest of the blue-chip average's 30 components, as the equipment maker's shares jumped more than 4% on upbeat comments by Merrill Lynch about its prospects overseas.

Other major stock indexes are below their records, but are ascending nonetheless. The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index gained three points, or 0.2%, to end at 1353.22, a fresh 5½-year high and now up 8.4% so far this year. And the technology-stock-focused Nasdaq Composite Index rose 15.39, or 0.7%, to 2306.34, its highest close in five months and now up 4.6% on the year.

Treasurys eased, and the dollar was mixed.

Several retailers, including Target, Kohl's and J.C. Penney, announced better-than-expected September same-store sales, or sales at stores open at least a year.

Many investors were more curious to see job data due out today from the Labor Department. Such government releases have been closely watched lately for confirmation that a slowing economy won't result in steep employment drops or painful effects that might cut into corporate profits.

Traders bid up crude-oil prices yesterday on expectations that the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries soon will cut its production by a million barrels a day, a little less than 4% of the cartel's current output, to stem crude's slide from highs earlier this year of more than $75 a barrel. (Related article on page A2.)

Crude futures for November delivery gained 62 cents, or 1%, to $60.03 a barrel. But oil remains off 1.7% this year on the New York Mercantile Exchange, and down 22% from the Nymex record of $77.03 a barrel reached in July.

Some analysts remain skeptical that OPEC members will go through with the production cut, given that oil prices are still high in historic terms. In the past, the cartel's members have sometimes cheated on OPEC's stated production targets in order to book additional revenue.

"I've seen this movie before, and I don't have to stick around for the ending," said energy analyst Fadel Gheit, of brokerage firm Oppenheimer & Co., estimating that the cartel's members can sell oil profitably at any price higher than $45 a barrel. He added: "There's no way OPEC will actually cut production with oil at $60."

Outside the U.S., stocks rose in dollar terms, including a five-year high for stocks in Europe. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 2.42 points, or 1.1%, to 222.37.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks rose. Total trading volume for stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange was 2.79 billion shares, as 2,220 issues rose and 1,070 fell.

Bond prices fell. The 10-year Treasury note dropped 13/32 point, or $4.06 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.61%. The 30-year bond declined 24/32 to yield 4.764%.

The dollar was mixed. Against the Japanese currency, the dollar fell to 117.66 yen, compared with 117.88. The euro declined against the dollar to $1.2694, compared with $1.2713.

The War Against Wages (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

Should we be cheering over the fact that the Dow Jones Industrial Average has finally set a new record? No. The Dow is doing well largely because American employers are waging a successful war against wages. Economic growth since early 2000, when the Dow reached its previous peak, hasn't been exceptional. But after-tax corporate profits have more than doubled, because workers' productivity is up, but their wages aren't — and because companies have dealt with rising health insurance premiums by denying insurance to ever more workers.

If you want to see how the war against wages is being fought, and what it's doing to working Americans and their families, consider the latest news from Wal-Mart.

Wal-Mart already has a well-deserved reputation for paying low wages and offering few benefits to its employees; last year, an internal Wal-Mart memo conceded that 46 percent of its workers' children were either on Medicaid or lacked health insurance. Nonetheless, the memo expressed concern that wages and benefits were rising, in part "because we pay an associate more in salary and benefits as his or her tenure increases."

The problem from the company's point of view, then, is that its workers are too loyal; it wants cheap labor that doesn't hang around too long, but not enough workers quit before acquiring the right to higher wages and benefits. Among the policy changes the memo suggested to deal with this problem was a shift to hiring more part-time workers, which "will lower Wal-Mart's health care enrollment."

And the strategy is being put into effect. "Investment analysts and store managers," reports The New York Times, "say Wal-Mart executives have told them the company wants to transform its work force to 40 percent part-time from 20 percent." Another leaked Wal-Mart memo describes a plan to impose wage caps, so that long-term employees won't get raises. And the company is taking other steps to keep workers from staying too long: in some stores, according to workers, "managers have suddenly barred older employees with back or leg problems from sitting on stools."

It's a brutal strategy. Once upon a time a company that treated its workers this badly would have made itself a prime target for union organizers. But Wal-Mart doesn't have to worry about that, because it knows that these days the people who are supposed to enforce labor laws are on the side of the employers, not the workers.

Since 1935, U.S. workers considering whether to join a union have been protected by the National Labor Relations Act, which bars employers from firing workers for engaging in union activities. For a long time the law was effective: workers were reasonably well protected against employer intimidation, and the union movement flourished.

In the 1970's, however, employers began a successful campaign to roll back unions. This campaign depended on routine violation of labor law: experts estimate that by 1980 employers were illegally firing at least one out of every 20 workers who voted for a union. But employers rarely faced serious consequences for their lawbreaking, thanks to America's political shift to the right. And now that the shift to the right has gone even further, political appointees are seeking to remove whatever protection for workers' rights that the labor relations law still provides.

The Republican majority on the National Labor Relations Board, which is responsible for enforcing the law, has just declared that millions of workers who thought they had the right to join unions don't. You see, the act grants that right only to workers who aren't supervisors. And the board, ruling on a case involving nurses, has declared that millions of workers who occasionally give other workers instructions can now be considered supervisors.

As the dissent from the Democrats on the board makes clear, the majority bent over backward, violating the spirit of the law, to reduce workers' bargaining power.

So what's keeping paychecks down? Major employers like Wal-Mart have decided that their interests are best served by treating workers as a disposable commodity, paid as little as possible and encouraged to leave after a year or two. And these employers don't worry that angry workers will respond to their war on wages by forming unions, because they know that government officials, who are supposed to protect workers' rights, will do everything they can to come down on the side of the wage-cutters.

Jobless Claims At Lowest Level Since July (WSJ)

By Rebecca Christie

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The number of new applicants for unemployment insurance fell last week to the lowest level since July, suggesting some recent improvement in the U.S. job market.

Initial jobless claims dropped 17,000 to a seasonally adjusted 302,000 in the week ended Sept. 30, the Labor Department said Thursday. New claims for the week ended Sept. 23 were revised upward to 319,000 from a previously reported 316,000. Last week's claims were at the lowest level since July 22, when 299,000 new claims were reported.

The latest drop in claims was bigger than expected. The median estimate of economists in a Dow Jones Newswires survey expected that jobless claims would be down 1,000 last week. This week, however, investors are more focused on the monthly employment report, due Friday. Economists expect the U.S. added 125,000 new jobs last month, about the same as in August.

The four-week moving average of new claims fell to 313,500 last week from a revised level of 316,250 in the previous week.

The Federal Reserve last month left interest rates unchanged at 5.25%, citing an apparent slowing in economic growth. But the Fed said core inflation readings have been elevated and price pressures could be sustained in part by high "resource utilization," a reference in part to tight jobs markets.

Thursday's report shows the number of workers drawing unemployment benefits for more than a week rose in the week ended Sept. 23, the latest week for which such data are available. These continuing jobless claims rose 15,000 to 2,448,000.

In the week ended Sept. 23, the jobless rate for workers with unemployment insurance was 1.9%, unchanged from the previous week. During the same week, a total of 17 states and territories reported an increase in unadjusted claims, while 36 reported a decrease.

Michigan reported the biggest increase, citing layoffs in the automobile industry. Kentucky reported the biggest decline in new claims but didn't comment on the cause. North Carolina also reported a drop in new claims, citing fewer layoffs in the construction, service, lumber, textile and apparel industries.

Brisk Apparel Sales Give A Lift To Many Retailers (WSJ)

By Stephanie Kang And James Covert

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

Many of the nation's retailers rang up strong apparel sales last month, helped by chillier-than-average weather, late back-to-school spending and a drop in gasoline prices.

DOJ_NMG_0076583

High-end department stores and teen-specialty shops reaped the biggest gains, while Wal-Mart Stores Inc. and other discount chains turned in poor to lackluster performances overall in comparison with strong year-earlier sales figures.

An index of 57 major U.S. retailers compiled by the International Council of Shopping Centers showed same-store sales -- or sales at stores open at least a year -- rose 3.8% in September. That was shy of the year-earlier increase of 4%, as well as the trade group's forecast for a 4% gain.

Cool September weather helped accelerate sales of back-to-school merchandise. But that brisk buying may take a toll on this month's sales, and some analysts remain cautious about the coming holiday season. Those analysts point to the cooling U.S. housing market, which could damp consumers' spending. On the positive side, the jobs market appears strong, and the recent decline in oil prices is expected to curb heating bills and gasoline prices this fall.

Michael Niemira, chief economist at the International Council of Shopping Centers, said that, excluding Wal-Mart, same-store sales jumped 6% in September. "Wal-Mart and the discount segment holds back the overall picture," he said. "Overall, it's a steady and consistent performance from the rest of the industry."

Wal-Mart, based in Bentonville, Ark., said September same-store sales rose 1.3%. That fell short of Wall Street's forecast for a 2.2% increase, according to Thomson Financial. The chain's overall September sales rose 12% to $31.21 billion. Wal-Mart said clothing sales during the month were disappointing, but added that it expects better results this winter.

"Our apparel sales did not meet our expectations for the month," said Wal-Mart Chief Financial Officer Tom Schoewe, in a statement. "We're pleased, however, to see early response to seasonal merchandise for fall and the holidays. We are optimistic about holiday-related merchandise like toys and electronics." The company said it expects a same-store sales gain of 2% to 4% this month.

Department stores, particularly those that sell luxury goods, shined last month, as consumers flocked in to buy fall fashions like cigarette pants. Last year sales of fall apparel were hurt by one of the warmest Septembers on record. Mr. Niemira said same-store sales at luxury retailers rose 11% in September, the strongest performance since March 2004.

Seattle-based Nordstrom Inc. racked up a 13% same-store sales gain last month, double the consensus forecast of analysts polled by Thomson Financial. Same-store sales at Saks Inc., Birmingham, Ala., rose 10%, topping the 3.9% analysts were predicting. Federated Department Stores Inc., the Cincinnati-based operator of Macy's stores, also beat expectations, posting a same-store sales increase of 6.2%.

By contrast, big discount chains selling staples performed poorly in the face of tough comparisons with a year earlier, when sales surged from Gulf Coast consumers stocking up in preparation for hurricanes. Same-store sales at Costco Wholesale Corp., rose 4%, just missing analysts' forecasts.

However, discounter Target Corp., Minneapolis, said that favorable weather helped to lift its same-store sales by 6.7%, beating the 5% rise forecast by analysts.

Teen retailer Abercrombie & Fitch Co., New Albany, Ohio, and lower-priced rival American Eagle Outfitters Inc., Warrendale, Pa., benefited from late back-to-school shopping, as many students waited to see what peers wore to school before buying their fall wardrobes. The chains' same-store sales rose 10% and 19%, respectively. Same-store sales at Gap Inc., the San Francisco parent of Gap, Banana Republic and Old Navy, also were better than expected, falling 3%, less than the expected 3.9% decline.

Economists watch monthly same-store sales as an indicator of consumer spending, but some large retailers, such as Home Depot Inc., Sears Holdings Corp. and Best Buy Co., don't report sales on a monthly basis. The figures also exclude many online purchases and other spending.

Retail Sales Strong As Gas Prices Fall (WP)

By Nell Henderson

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

The money people are saving at the gas pump is finally showing up somewhere else: department store cash registers.

Department stores yesterday reported booming sales for September, up 8.4 percent from September 2005 at stores open at least a year, a figure known as same-store sales.

Department stores are doing better than retailers overall. In a survey by the International Council of Shopping Centers of 57 retail chains, sales were up 3.8 percent last month from September 2005.

Retail chain-store sales growth in general has held up well this year, even as rising gasoline prices and interest rates restrained consumer spending on homes, cars and trucks, said Michael P. Niemira, the council's chief economist.

"Consumer spending has been relatively steady" at retail chain stores, said Niemira, who attributed that stability primarily to income growth, which has more influence on consumer spending at retail chains than fluctuating gasoline prices.

Still, the recent decline in oil prices, from more than $77 a barrel in mid-July to around $60 a barrel, has boosted consumer buying power and reduced the risks that economic growth might slow too much, said Nigel Gault, chief U.S. economist at Global Insight Inc., a financial forecasting firm. Falling oil prices "made a soft landing for the economy look a safer bet," he said, referring to a scenario in which the economy cools just enough to lower inflation without sliding into a recession.

The retailers' results, after reports that vehicle sales rebounded in September, supported Federal Reserve Chairman Ben S. Bernanke's statement Wednesday that the economy remains strong aside from the slumping housing market.

Enjoying that strength last month were such high-end retailers as Nordstrom Inc., which reported a 13.4 percent gain in same-store sales, and Saks Inc. with a 10 percent increase.

Other stores with strong same-store sales were J.C. Penney Co., Target Corp., Limited Brands Inc. and Federated Department Stores Inc., which reported results only for its Macy's and Bloomingdale's chains. The department-store increase of 8.4 percent for September was more than triple the August increase of 2.7 percent.

Several retailers that cater to lower-income customers posted much weaker results. Wal-Mart Stores Inc., the nation's biggest retailer, reported a relatively feeble 1.3 percent gain in sales at its Wal-Mart and Sam's Club stores open since last year. The company attributed some of the softness to the comparison with its results in September 2005, which were boosted by buying related to Hurricane Katrina in late August.

Gasoline prices affect retailers differently. Wholesalers that sell gasoline benefited as prices climbed above $3 a gallon in early August, but then they were hurt as prices fell to an average $2.31 a gallon nationwide earlier this week. BJ's Wholesale Club Inc., for example, reported a 0.9 percent decline in same-store sales in September.

A 10 percent increase in gasoline prices tends to reduce chain-store sales overall by about 0.4 percent over a year, Niemira has calculated. A similar drop in prices has the reverse effect.

But sales by retailers that cater to lower-income shoppers are more affected than average by changing gasoline prices, while there is little or no effect on high-end store sales, Niemira said. At Wal-Mart, for example, a 10 percent increase in gasoline prices cuts its sales by 0.9 percent.

Wal-Mart has blamed much of its disappointing sales this year on surging gasoline prices. But the company hasn't seen much of a bounce from falling prices.

"Where's the consumer slowdown? At Wal-Mart," Niemira said.

Oil Prices Jump After Opec Cuts Output (FT)

By Chris Flood

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

Crude oil rallied on Thursday after officials from the Organisation of the Petroleum Exporting Countries said the cartel had informally agreed to cut output by at least 1m barrels a day.

ICE November Brent rose 91 cents to $60.13 a barrel after having sunk to $57.70 a barrel in the previous session, its lowest level this year.

Nymex November West Texas Intermediate increased 78 cents to $60.19 a barrel.

A move by Opec to cut production for the first time since 2004 has been widely anticipated by the market after Nigeria and Venezuela announced they would reduce output recently.

All Opec countries are expected to take part in production cuts, with Saudi Arabia, the world's top exporter, reducing its output by 300,000 barrels a day.

The announcement drew a negative reaction from Sam Bodman, the US energy secretary who said that the global market still needed Opec's supplies.

The cartel has been moved to action as US stocks of crude oil stand well above their five year average, prompting concerns that prices would decline further if markets remained oversupplied.

"It's a clear signal that Opec wants to defend the $60 level and will provide good fundamental support for prices," said Kevin Norrish of Barclays Capital.

Concerns over disruptions to supplies from Nigeria also provided support for prices yersterday. Nigerian militants claimed they killed 17 soldiers in two separate gun battles on Wednesday and threatened further attacks on strategic oil facilities.

The recovery for crude helped US natural gas prices strengthen. Nymex November Henry Hub rose almost 3 cents to $6.265 per million British thermal units after US weekly inventories data showed a 73bn cubic feet increase in stocks, in-line with market expectations. Stocks currently stand at more than 3.3 trillion cubic feet and on-track to surpass the record of 3.5 trillion by November 1.

Wheat prices reached a fresh 10-year high in Chicago, trading 14 cents higher at $4.79 a bushel on concerns about low stock levels and Brazil's move to become the latest grower to reduce its harvest forecast.

French wheat prices jumped to a 2½ year high, rising €3 to €152 a tonne after Ukraine imposed export licences which may slow export growth.

Copper rose 3.8 per cent to $7,300 a tonne supported by a decline of 2,550 tonnes in London Metal Exchange stocks, helping the price recover most of the sharp fall in the previous session.

Nickel gained 2.9 per cent at $28.900 a tonne while zinc increased 4 per cent to $3,435 a tonne a tonne after LME stocks fell 1,625 tonnes. Aluminium rose 2.9 per cent to $2,547.5.

OPEC Encounters Hurdles In Effort To Trim Output (WSJ)

By Bhushan Bahree

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

OPEC's president is scrambling to broker an agreement among the cartel's members to cut oil output in an attempt to shore up tumbling crude prices, according to people familiar with the matter. But contentious issues need to be resolved before ministers of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries reach an agreement.

Still, OPEC's attempt to orchestrate an output reduction is raising alarm bells in major consuming countries.

Crude prices have dropped 22% since hitting an all-time nominal peak in mid-July, but they remain more than twice as expensive as three years ago. By talking about tightening the spigot now, OPEC -- which supplies more than a third of the world's daily oil needs -- is signaling that it will try to prevent prices from falling further, even if demand for oil slackens as the world economy slows.

Oil-futures prices went on a roller-coaster ride on the New York Mercantile Exchange yesterday. Crude oil for November delivery settled at $60.03 a barrel, up 62 cents, or 1%. (See related article1.)

After hours of confusion about whether OPEC had already cut a deal, Edmund Daukoru, the Nigerian oil minister, who is also OPEC's president, indicated that the cartel still had a ways to go. "We are toying with the idea of an emergency meeting" that would seek an elusive consensus, he told reporters.

Earlier reports by several news organizations had said OPEC had reached an agreement to cut output by a million barrels a day, or a little less than 4% of the cartel's current production of some 27.5 million barrels a day. But Mr. Daukoru dismissed these claims. Instead, he said, the cartel is hashing out contentious details.

"We agree that something needs to be done," Mr. Daukoru said, referring to output cuts. But "we will have to agree on how much, how soon and how we distribute [the reduction] among member countries."

Under the plan being mooted by some in OPEC, the cartel would slash its oil output by as much as one million barrels a day from current production levels, and each member would cut their output by a similar percentage.

But some members, especially those whose production is lagging, are resisting. There is no agreement on when such a cut should be made. Critically, not everyone agrees on how the cuts should be shared, which has been a major stumbling point in past negotiations about market shares.

The reports that OPEC was seeking to withhold oil from markets ahead of the peak winter heating season alarmed major consumers, who were beginning to breathe a sigh of relief as oil prices swooned in recent weeks.

In the U.S., the world's largest oil market, a spokesman for Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman said the American energy czar had urged some OPEC ministers to keep crude markets well supplied. "... At $60 a barrel, it's still among the historically high prices for crude," the spokesman said. In Paris, Jean-Claude Trichet, president of the European Central Bank, told reporters that an OPEC decision to cut output might damage the global economy by artificially raising energy prices.

Despite the risk of a backlash, OPEC officials privately say the cartel is even more fearful of a price rout. They say that swelling commercial inventories of oil, and rising oil production in countries that don't belong to the cartel, could lead to an uncontrollable slide in oil prices in the months to come.

"We are not trying to set a floor at $60" a barrel, said one senior OPEC official. This official also asserted that OPEC was nearing an agreement on output cuts.

Even if OPEC can't reach a deal right away, it has other options. To quickly support prices, OPEC could fudge the issue of market share by not announcing output allocations for each member country. Under that scenario, the cartel could announce a big cut, then work out the shares later.

In any event, many industry officials expect that the bulk of the cuts will have to come from the strongest producers, those that have spare oil-pumping capacity: Saudi Arabia and neighbors such as Kuwait and the United Arab Emirates.

OPEC officials said Saudi Arabia, the cartel's largest exporter, was willing to reduce output in line with its current share of about a third of the total produced by 10 member countries, leaving out Iraq. But countries like Venezuela, Iran and Indonesia are loath to give up their shares, even if they are unused. Complicating this issue are special cases, such as Nigeria's low production levels amid domestic unrest.

All Eyes On OPEC's Actions (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

Oil prices jumped early yesterday on news reports that the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries, which supplies about 40 percent of the world's oil, was preparing to cut output to bolster sagging prices. But prices closed virtually unchanged at $60.03 a barrel because it remained unclear how big the cuts would be and whether they would ever take effect.

Early yesterday, Dow Jones Newswires cited an unnamed "OPEC governor and a senior delegate" as saying that the organization had agreed to cut production by 1 million barrels a day.

But OPEC President Edmund Daukoru was quoted by Bloomberg News Service as denying that a formal agreement had been forged. "The consensus that we can all agree on is that the market is very soft," Daukoru said. "It's more or less a free fall."

An oil trader in Europe who had talked to oil officials in three key OPEC countries said that if the cartel cut output, the reduction is unlikely to exceed 400,000 barrels a day -- 75,000 barrels a day from Nigeria, 75,000 to 100,000 barrels a day from Venezuela, 150,000 barrels a day from Saudi Arabia, and between 50,000 and 100,000 barrels a day from Iran.

As is usually the case with OPEC when prices are falling, countries are torn between the desire to pump more versus propping up prices. Many members have pressing needs. Nigeria has already shut down about a third of its output because of insurgent activity. High oil revenue has helped bolster the influence of Venezuela's president, Hugo Chavez. And the windfall for Iran has helped it aid Hezbollah in Lebanon and raise wages at home.

Gas Prices Dropping More Slowly (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Many drivers who are hoping for sub-$2-a-gallon gasoline in the near future will likely be disappointed.

The price at the pump, which until recently was rapidly plunging, has been falling at a slower rate. Such a slowdown suggests retail gasoline prices will likely still be above $2 a gallon in most of the USA at the end of October, say energy analysts from Wachovia, Oil Price Information Service (OPIS), Cameron Hanover and others.

The nationwide average price for a gallon of regular gasoline was $2.290 Thursday, down a half-cent from the day before and 44 cents below a month ago, according to motor club AAA. The U.S. average gasoline price is down nearly 25% from the peak of $3.036 two months ago.

But the nationwide average price isn't likely to drop much further for two main reasons:

·Oil. Oil prices have fallen 22% in three months and dipped below $60 a barrel for the first time in nearly eight months Tuesday.

Oil prices rose Thursday amid reports that OPEC was preparing to cut production to stem falling prices, although the organization of oil producers has not announced any official cutbacks. The price of oil trading for November delivery rose 62 cents to $60.03 a barrel.

·Refineries. Some refineries typically reduce production in the fall for maintenance. With gas prices lower, refineries may scale back even more than usual, Moody's Economy.com economist Rakesh Shankar says, reducing gas supplies and propping up prices.

Still, some consumers may see gas prices below $2 a gallon. OPIS analyst Tom Kloza says there is “great diversity” in prices across the USA. “If you were traveling from Maine to New Orleans, you could almost plan your trip with stops where you could get gas below $2,” Kloza says.

Poll Says Democrats Favored To Win House, Maybe Senate (WT)

By Ralph Z. Hallow

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

Democratic candidates enjoy an advantage "in almost every campaign" and now stand a better than even chance of winning a House majority, the bipartisan Battleground Poll released yesterday concluded.

The poll's conclusions closely resemble dismal predictions of a nearly certain net loss of at least 15 and as many as 30 House seats for the GOP that other top-rated Republican campaign pollsters and strategists confided earlier this week to The Washington Times.

Democrats also now show an increased probability of taking the Senate, according to the Battleground survey by Democrat pollster Celinda Lake and Republican Ed Goeas.

DOJ_NMG_0076587

"The numbers are just as troubling for the Senate, and this puts the Senate in big jeopardy" for Republicans, Brian Nienaber, vice president of Mr. Goeas' Republican polling firm, told reporters in a joint breakfast briefing with reporters convened by the Christian Science Monitor at the Sofitel Lafayette Square Hotel.

"As the national trend gets worse, that is a problem for a lot of our top endangered incumbents. As Republican voters are less motivated than Democratic voters, it does make it look like we could potentially lose the Senate as well," Mr. Nienaber said.

He cited Republican Sens. Mike DeWine of Ohio, Lincoln Chafee of Rhode Island and Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania as three particularly threatened incumbents. Democrats need to a net gain of six seats to take the Senate.

He said an expected depressed turnout of social conservatives will have the "greatest impact on who controls the Senate."

Mr. Nienaber said the Northeast is the GOP's worst region for the November elections. It was 37 percent Republican and 36 percent Democrat in February on the congressional generic ballot but now is only 33 percent of voters saying they will vote for the Republican and 57 percent saying they will go for the Democrat.

The Sept. 24-27 Battleground Poll of 1,000 likely voters was conducted before the scandal surrounding Rep. Mark Foley, Florida Republican, began making headlines.

"The political environment is certainly a hindrance for Republicans in almost every campaign, and voters are much more resistant to hearing the Republicans' side of the story," Mr. Goeas said in a written analysis.

In 2000, Mr. Bush had been leading most polls before it was reported that he had hidden his youthful drunken-driving arrest. Miss Lake and Mr. Nienaber yesterday agreed that revelation cost Mr. Bush at least 4 million votes. The expectation now is that the Foley scandal -- in which the former congressman is accused of making sexually explicit comments to teenage congressional pages -- may similarly depress the GOP's religious conservative turnout this year.

The so-called "security moms" -- who worry about terrorism at home and gave Mr. Bush's party the advantage in the 2002 and 2004 elections -- "are not voting terrorism this time," said Miss Lake. "They give the administration a nine-point advantage on terrorism but give Democrats a 15-point advantage on the problems that matter most to them -- education, health care and the economy."

The Associated Press reported that an AP-Ipsos poll released yesterday, "found that about half of likely voters say recent disclosures of corruption and scandal in Congress will be very or extremely important" in their decisions when they cast their votes next month.

Brian Nienaber And Celinda Lake (CSM)

By David Cook

The Christian Science Monitor, October 6, 2006

Often pollsters with different backgrounds look at the same data and come to different conclusions.

But that was not what happened when representatives from the Battleground Poll briefed reporters Thursday morning at a Monitor sponsored breakfast. Pollsters from both parties saw trouble ahead for Republicans in the 2006 elections.

What makes the Battleground Poll different from many others is its bipartisan nature. The poll, sponsored by George Washington University, is conducted jointly by the Tarrance Group, a Republican firm, and by Lake Research Partners, a company that serves Democratic clients.

When Tarrance Group vice president Brian Nienaber was asked about Republican prospects for retaining control of Congress, he said, "The trend here is negative ... if this continues and election day was tomorrow, I think control of both houses of Congress would be in jeopardy, not only the House but the Senate."

"It is a better day to be a Democrat than a Republican," said Celinda Lake, president of Lake Research Partners. "The most important number to watch is Bush's job approval number," she said. "In this poll he had popped up a little bit. He had gotten to 45 percent. In the most recent public polls in the last couple of days he is back down to 40 percent, 39 percent ... if his job approval is 38 or 39 percent ... it looks like we are guaranteed to take back the House. If his job approval is 44-45 percent, [a Democratic victory] becomes in jeopardy."

The latest version of the 15-year-old Battleground Poll was conducted September 24-27 among 1,000 registered voters and has a margin of error of 3.1 percent. Given the survey's timing, it does not capture voter reaction to the House page scandal. But the scandal's effects will not be good for Republicans, both pollsters agreed.

"The three issues on which Republicans polled a clear advantage are terrorism, safeguarding America from terrorism, keeping taxes low, and protecting moral values. I think moral values is not going to be part of our tool kit anymore," Nienaber said wryly.

"I think the turnout game is a big piece of this," Lake said. She was referring to the expectation that Christian conservatives, who are a key part of the Republican party's base, may not vote in the midterm election given their disappointment with Republican Congressional leaders.

DOJ_NMG_0076588

Lake also noted that time Republicans spend dealing with the scandal, "is two weeks when the president can't get his message through except on the Woodward book and it is two weeks when the Republicans can't get their message through. It feeds the desire for change in Washington and checks and balances."

Complete details on the poll can be found at: http://www.gwu.edu/~newsctr/battleground.cfm

Race For Senate Control Tightens (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON — Democrats are within striking distance of winning control of the Senate in the Nov. 7 elections, USA TODAY/Gallup Polls in six key states show as the campaigns head into their final month.

The number of Republican-held seats with competitive Democratic challengers has expanded to include Virginia and Tennessee, where Democrat Harold Ford Jr. now holds a 5-percentage-point lead over Republican Bob Corker among likely voters.

In Missouri, GOP Sen. Jim Talent narrowly trails Democrat Claire McCaskill, and in Rhode Island, Sen. Lincoln Chafee faces a double-digit deficit against Democrat Sheldon Whitehouse. The surveys, taken Sept. 27 to Oct. 1, have error margins of +/-5 percentage points for the likely-voter samples.

The landscape has improved for Democrats since the USA TODAY/Gallup state polls taken just before Labor Day. “You'd have to say they have at least a 50-50 shot at winning control,” says political scientist Alan Abramowitz of Emory University. “That's certainly better than anybody expected a few weeks ago.”

Democrats must gain six seats to win control.

Reports of more deadly violence in Iraq and the scandal involving a GOP lawmaker and congressional pages are factors, says Charlie Cook of the non-partisan Cook Political Report: “Clearly, we've seen momentum shift away from the Republicans and toward the Democrats.”

President Bush is a liability in the six states polled. In mostly Democratic Rhode Island, likely voters say by more than 3-to-1 that they are more likely to back a candidate who opposes Bush than one who supports him. Even in Republican-leaning Virginia, voters by 3-2 favor a candidate who would challenge Bush.

But in Maryland, another Democratic seat targeted by the GOP, Ben Cardin leads Republican Michael Steele by a wide 15 points. Among other findings:

·In Missouri, McCaskill, who trailed Talent by 6 points in late August, now leads by 3.

·In Virginia, GOP Sen. George Allen, hit by allegations of racism, has a narrow 3-point lead over Democrat Jim Webb.

Democrats also are hopeful of ousting GOP incumbents in Ohio, Montana and Pennsylvania. Fewer than half of the 33 Senate seats on the ballot are considered competitive.

In the new polls, voters in all six states combined who said they would vote largely out of party loyalty supported Democrats by 2-1 — a sign that Democratic partisans are more energized than Republican ones.

GOP's Hold On Evangelicals Weakening (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

ANOKA, Minn. -- Lynn Sunde, an evangelical Christian, is considering what for her is a radical step. Come November, she may vote for a Democrat for Congress.

Sunde, 35, manages a coffee shop and attends a nondenominational Bible church. "You're never going to agree with one party on everything, so for me the key has always been the religion issues -- abortion, the marriage amendment" to ban same-sex unions, she said.

That means she consistently votes Republican. But, she said, she is starting to worry about the course of the Iraq war, and she finds the Internet messages from then-Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) to teenage boys "pretty sickening." When she goes into the voting booth this time, she said, "I'm going to think twice. . . . I'm not going to vote party line as much as to vote issues."

Even a small shift in the loyalty of conservative Christian voters such as Sunde could spell trouble for the GOP this fall. In 2004, white evangelical or born-again Christians made up a quarter of the electorate, and 78 percent of them voted Republican, according to exit polls. But some pollsters believe that evangelical support for the GOP peaked two years ago and that what has been called the "God gap" in politics is shrinking.

A nationwide poll of 1,500 registered voters released yesterday by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center found that 57 percent of white evangelicals are inclined to vote for Republican congressional candidates in the midterm elections, a 21-point drop in support among this critical part of the GOP base.

Even before the Foley scandal, the portion of white evangelicals with a "favorable" impression of the Republican Party had fallen sharply this year, from 63 percent to 54 percent, according to Pew polls.

In the latest survey, taken in the last 10 days of September and the first four days of October, the percentage of evangelicals who think that Republicans govern "in a more honest and ethical way" than Democrats has plunged to 42 percent, from 55 percent at the start of the year.

Here in Minnesota's conservative 6th Congressional District, the loosening of the GOP's hold on religious voters is helping Patty Wetterling, an antiwar Democrat, run an unexpectedly close race against Republican state Sen. Michele M. Bachmann, who has made opposition to abortion and same-sex marriage her signature issues.

This week, Wetterling became the first Democrat in the country to air a television advertisement about the Foley scandal.

"It shocks the conscience. Congressional leaders have admitted covering up the predatory behavior of a congressman . . . ," the commercial said, adding that Wetterling is "demanding a criminal investigation and the immediate expulsion of any congressman involved in this crime and coverup."

Wetterling is best known as an advocate for missing children. Her 11-year-old son, Jacob, was abducted in 1989 and never found. The uproar over Foley's sexual correspondence with teenage employees of Congress has played into her political strength.

"This is something we all watched with churches years ago, where they didn't do anything. Congress has no excuse -- they know better," she said in a telephone interview.

The incumbent, Rep. Mark Kennedy (R), is vacating his seat to run for the Senate. The national GOP has spared no effort to bolster Bachmann. President Bush, Vice President Cheney, political strategist Karl Rove, House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) and Commerce Secretary Carlos M. Gutierrez all have been out to campaign for her.

Unlike some Republican candidates across the country, Bachmann is not running away from Bush. She says she is "thrilled" to be associated with him.

But the president's ratings have slipped even within his most loyal constituency. Since the start of his second term, Bush's favorability rating has dropped from 52 percent to 42 percent among all adults, and from 71 percent to 60 percent among white evangelical Protestants, according to Washington Post-ABC News polls.

"I think he's too set in his way to listen to what's really going on in Iraq," Sunde said. She noted that her rising concern about the war "possibly could" lead her to cross party lines and vote for Wetterling.

She is not alone in Anoka, Garrison Keillor's hometown and a place that, like the imaginary Lake Wobegon, defies stereotypes about religious conservatives.

"If you're pro-life and mad about the war, where do you go? That's the Bachmann-Wetterling race in a nutshell," said state Rep. Jim Abeler, 52, a Republican who represents part of the 6th district.

Jim Bernstein, 56, a Democrat who served as Minnesota's commerce commissioner under then-Gov. Jesse Ventura, agreed: "There are a lot of people here who say, 'I'm pro-life, but I'm also concerned about health care, about education, about jobs.' "

Across the country, many Democratic candidates are wooing religious voters by talking about their faith. Wetterling is not among them. Her campaign manager calls her "a very spiritual woman," but says: "We have her all over the district now, so much so that she's not able to attend church."

Bachmann, on the other hand, attends an evangelical megachurch and is known for her unsuccessful effort to put a state constitutional amendment against same-sex marriage on the November ballot. If same-sex marriage spreads, she has warned, "public schools would have to teach that homosexuality and same-sex marriages are normal, natural and that maybe children should try them."

Christopher P. Gilbert, a political scientist at Gustavus Adolphus College in central Minnesota, said there "haven't been a lot of candidates in Minnesota who closely associate themselves with the Christian right, but Bachmann has. She's the real deal when it comes to religion in politics."

Nationally, the Republicans' once formidable hold on churchgoing voters has begun to slip. Among those who say they attend church more than once a week, the GOP still holds a commanding lead. The main shift is among weekly churchgoers, about a quarter of all voters. Two years ago, they favored the GOP by a double-digit margin. But in the new Pew survey, 44 percent leaned toward Republicans and 43 percent toward Democrats, a statistical dead heat.

The slippage is particularly striking among evangelicals. According to Pew data, the portion of white evangelical Protestants who identify themselves as Republicans rose steadily from 2000 to 2004 but leveled off this year at about half. The percentage who support keeping troops in Iraq has dropped to 55 percent, from 68 percent in early September.

"The allegiance of evangelicals has been more in flux over the past 12 months, suggesting that the considerations going into their votes are changing," said Scott Keeter, Pew's director of survey research.

In addition to the war and congressional scandals, those considerations may include a broader definition of religious issues. Some influential ministers, such as the Rev. Rick Warren, author of the bestselling "The Purpose-Driven Life," are urging evangelicals to fight poverty, safeguard the environment and oppose torture on biblical grounds.

To the extent that evangelicals now view these issues as "matters of conscience" alongside abortion and same-sex marriage, they could shift some votes into the Democratic column, said Ron Sider, head of the group Evangelicals for Social Action.

Another factor in evangelicals' changing loyalties may be the efforts of Democrats to reach out to them. In Michigan, evangelical pastors helped write the preamble to the state party's new platform. "Democrats in this state are seeking the Common Good -- the best life for each person of this state. The orphan. The family. The sick. The healthy. The wealthy. The poor. The citizen. The stranger. The first. The last," it says.

But before Democrats take credit for the shift, they might ponder one of the findings in a recent survey of 2,500 voters by the Center for American Values, a project of the left-leaning People for the American Way Foundation: Republicans have lost more support (14 percentage points) than Democrats have picked up (4 points) among frequent churchgoers.

That rings true to Michael Cromartie, an expert on evangelicals at the Ethics and Public Policy Center, a Washington think tank. "Erosion for evangelicals doesn't necessarily lead to Democratic voting. It leads to nonvoting," he said.

Republican strategists are hoping the drop will prove temporary.

"There is a dip in support for the GOP among religious conservatives, no question," said Leonard Leo, head of Catholic Outreach at the Republican National Committee.

"People of faith were disaffected over the summer, but I think they'll come back," he added. "It's like any other election season -- people get frustrated that they haven't achieved everything they want. But as you get close to the election, you begin to look at the alternatives and realize that staying home is going to make things worse rather than better."

Iraq Still Issue Number One For US Voters (AFP-Y)

By Stephanie Griffith

AFP, October 5, 2006

Iraq remains the top issue for US voters ahead of next month's crucial midterm elections according to a national poll, which also found Americans surprisingly unmoved by the congressional sex scandal currently dominating Washington.

"Iraq has become the central issue of the midterm elections," said researchers with the Pew Research Center, in a statement that accompanied the survey.

"There is more dismay about how the US military effort in Iraq is going than at any point since the war began more than three years ago," the statement read.

"The war is the dominant concern among the majority of voters who say they will be thinking about national issues, rather than local issues, when they cast their ballot for Congress this fall."

The comprehensive poll of 1,800 respondents sampled voter opinions on a broad range of top issues, from immigration, to the war in Iraq, to the falling price of energy.

The poll found found that 58 percent of the US public believes the US military effort in Iraq is not going well, 47 percent say the war is hurting, not helping, the fight against terrorism.

The survey also found Americans remarkably unaffected by the scandal over the handling of lurid sexual messages sent by former Republican lawmaker Mark Foley to teenage pages in Congress -- at least with respect to next month's legislative and gubernatorial balloting.

The Pew Center found that Democrats had a 51 percent to 38 percent advantage over Republicans before last week's scandal broke, and 50 percent to 37 percent edge after.

Among voters who said national issues were of paramount importance for them, about half -- 51 percent -- cited the deteriorating situation in Iraq as the most important concern. Terrorism came in second place at 37 percent while 35 of respondents cited the economy.

Another important recent development -- the drop in the price of gasoline -- also appeared not to have impacted voter feelings greatly. The survey showed that while most respondents were aware of the recent fall in gas prices, they were also likely to complain about a faltering US economy.

DOJ_NMG_0076591

The poll put US President George W. Bush's job approval rating at 37 percent, with 63 percent of respondents saying they are dissatisfied with the way things are going in the country.

As with earlier Pew surveys, an unusually high percentage of voters -- 39 percent -- envision their ballot as a vote "against" Bush rather than for him.

The survey found the current climate to be particularly treacherous for incumbents, with 27 percent of voters saying they do not want to see their own representative win reelection in the fall, down from 32 percent in June.

But anti-incumbent feeling seemed less pronounced than in the historic 1994 midterm elections, when voters ousted Democrats from the leadership of the House of Representatives, the Pew researchers noted.

The survey, conducted from September 21 to October 4, had a sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points.

Former President George H.W. Bush Warns Of 'Wild' Democrats (AP)

AP, October 5, 2006

GLADWYNE, Pa. - Former President George H.W. Bush said Thursday that a Democratic takeover of Congress would be a "ghastly thing for our country."

Bush, speaking at a fundraiser for Sen. Rick Santorum, R-Pa., warned that the Republican majority of the Senate is at risk.

"This is more than party versus party, it is the idea that if we have some of these wild Democrats in charge of these committees it will be a ghastly thing for our country," Bush said.

Democrats would need to gain six seats in the Senate and 15 in the House in the Nov. 7 general election to gain control of each chamber. Bush cited the effect of a Democratic takeover on GOP members of Congress, including Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., as well as on the president.

"I would hate to think what Sen. Arlen's life would be like, what Rick's life would be like, and my son's life would be like if we lose control of the Congress," Bush said.

The Democrats, he said, "just have a very different view ... and they'd be pushing all kinds of crazy legislation."

The fundraiser raised about $270,000 for Santorum, who has trailed Democrat Bob Casey, the state treasurer, in polls. Casey received fundraising assistance Thursday from former President Bill Clinton. The event was closed to the press.

The two former presidents were in Philadelphia Thursday to receive the Liberty Medal for work on behalf of victims of Hurricane Katrina and the South Asian tsunami.

Rumble In Rhode Island (NSWK)

By Lee Hudson Teslik

Newsweek, October 6, 2006

In the increasingly binary world of American politics, Rhode Island has earned its nonconformist reputation. The state has more voters registered as “unaffiliated” than either Republican or Democrat. One of their senators, Lincoln Chafee, was the only Republican to vote against the Iraq war, opposed Samuel Alito’s nomination for the Supreme Court and refused to vote for President Bush in 2004 (he voted for the president's father as a write-in vote). But now, after eking out a primary victory last month with strong support from the national Republican Party, Chafee trails Democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse by about two points, according to the latest polls.

In a state whose symbol is “The Independent Man,” a Whitehouse victory could spell a political sea change. Whitehouse, who was formerly the state's attorney general, has campaigned on an aggressively national platform, saying not just Rhode Island's future but “the structure of power in Washington” is at stake. Opponents have criticized Whitehouse for telling people to vote for the Democratic Party without presenting any specific platform of his own. Chafee, for his part, has touted his independent voting record—with limited success—and analysts have said a Chafee loss could signal the decline of the distinctly northeastern brand of Rockefeller Republicanism.

As part of NEWSWEEK’s ongoing Face Off series, Lee Hudson Teslik interviewed both candidates. Excerpts:

Republican Sen. Lincoln Chafee

NEWSWEEK: In the past you’ve taken some heat from your own party, essentially for not being “Republican enough.” You voted against Alito, against the Iraq war—even against the president himself in 2004.

Lincoln Chafee: And his tax cuts. Don’t forget that.

And the tax cuts, right. Given all this, was it surprising to have the Republican Party come out so strongly for you in your primary?

No, I’ll take help from anybody who offers it. That was a tough primary, and I’ve worked hard at having good relations with my party, despite having differences on some issues.

Were you contacting them or did they reach out to you?

DOJ_NMG_0076592

Well I just think that due to the relationships that I've worked on over the last six years, they wanted to help. They realize that I've voted my conscience, but they respect that.

Rhode Island isn't a particularly Red State. Does it worry you that support from leaders of the Republican Party could hurt you?

Well my message to the Rhode Island voters is that I excel at working with everybody. I work with Democrats, conservatives, liberals and independents, and that pays off for Rhode Island.

But there are three times as many Democrats as Republicans in the state. You don't think people could react negatively when they see the national Republican leadership so strongly in your camp?

Yes, Rhode Island is arguably the most Democratic state in the country, so I understand what you're saying. On the same token, I vote my conscience and I'm able to develop good relations with everybody and deliver for Rhode Island when it counts.

There are Democrats in the Senate with more conservative voting records than you. Ben Nelson of Nebraska is an example. Why do you consider yourself a Republican?

Well we northeastern Republicans are what I call the original Republican Party. Fiscal responsibility, that used to be a Republican issue. Certainly caring for the environment, that is a Republican issue. Supporting personal liberties, and the freedom of people to make very personal decisions on their own—I think that's traditional Republicanism; an aversion to foreign entanglements, that too. And we've been successful in the northeast at electing Republican governors, when you think about it. New York has had a long string; George Pataki has had a long run; the mayors of heavily Democratic New York City, first Mayor Giuliani, now Mayor Bloomberg; Connecticut has had a string of Republican governors, Massachusetts, even Vermont has had a Republican governor. So in the northeast, our brand of Republicanism is maybe different from the change that has swept the [national] party.

Given this shift, is there a future for these northeastern Republicans—some people call them Rockefeller Republicans. Are they dying out?

Well I think this election is going to be important to make a stand, to say we want people governing from the middle. Certainly my candidacy is one that's in the spotlight on that.

People have said that Sheldon Whitehouse, your opponent, is telling people to vote for a party, not a man. Do you think that's a legitimate criticism?

I think eventually Rhode Island voters are going to want something more from the candidates than just to vote for a party. He has no other message. I call it the Peggy Lee campaign: "Is that all there is?"

Rhode Island has more voters registered as "unaffiliated" than Republicans or Democrats—more than 350,000 of them. Why are there so many?

That's another thing that has changed with the times. People here don't register with parties as much as they used to. Before coming to the Senate, I was mayor of my city, and the board of canvassers office was right near the mayor's office, and I'd check in every once in a while to see how people were registering. It was overwhelmingly, as we call them in Rhode Island, "unaffiliated." They like the freedom to make their votes on primary day in the Republican primary or the Democratic primary. In the old days, these people were much more aligned with parties. I know when my dad [Sen. John Chafee] served in politics, in the '60s, the party endorsements were so influential in the outcome of elections, and that's just not the case now.

Have you ever considered billing yourself as an Independent?

No, you have to caucus here in the Senate with one party. And so once you make that decision, you run under that label. And in Rhode Island, Republicans are seen as the party of reformers.

Democratic Challenger Sheldon Whitehouse

NEWSWEEK: Senator Chafee's father, John Chafee, was a Rhode Island senator before him, and the family has very prominent roots in the state. In a way you're running not just against Lincoln Chafee, but the family name and all the weight it carries in Rhode Island. Has that been frustrating for you?

Sheldon Whitehouse: I think it's an asset for Senator Chafee, and it's one that I'm very familiar with, as our families have been very friendly over the years. I knew his father extremely well. But in this particular race, I think that the voters in Rhode Island are so concerned and upset about the direction in Washington, that the question that will be in their minds in the voting booths won't be, "Is Senator Chafee a nice guy, and was his father a good guy before him?" but rather, "Is our country going in the right direction?" And clearly the answer to that question is no.

You have said many times that your race could be a key to Democrats regaining control of the Senate. Some critics have said that you've put this goal over anything specific to Sheldon Whitehouse. In other words, that you're telling people to vote for a party and not a man. Do you think that's unfair?

It's inaccurate if you actually look at how my campaign has developed. We've put out very clear policies on fixing the prescription-drug plan that is harming so many seniors. We've come out with a very specific new energy strategy. We've spoken extensively about the need for health-care reform and the role I would like to play in health-care reform. We've put forward a specific plan for shoring up Social Security. We've really been out there strong on the issues.

Senator Chafee has the most liberal voting record of any Republican in the Senate. Indeed, there are some Democrats who have more conservative records. Shouldn't those conservative Democrats be more of a concern to you than someone like Lincoln Chafee?

The game plan that Democrats will pursue in Washington is radically different from the failed course that the Bush administration has pursued. Whether individual senators might not be totally on board with every element of that game plan, that's really the ultimate determination here. Who sets the agenda, and what direction it takes us. And there's a colossal difference between what Democratic leadership would do, and what Republican leadership has shown us.

Senator Chafee voted against Samuel Alito for Supreme Court, he was the only Republican to not vote for the Iraq war—in 2004 he didn't even vote for Bush for re-election. Is it at all disingenuous to pin him too closely politically to President Bush?

Not a bit, because the key factor is that he votes to put the Republican leadership in charge that drives that agenda. He may have voted against Iraq, but we are in Iraq notwithstanding. He may have voted against Alito, but we have Alito on the Supreme Court notwithstanding. The ultimate decision is who's driving. Democratic leadership will lead us in a much better direction.

You've argued against the Republican course in Iraq and have argued for the withdrawal of U.S. troops. What kind of timetable would you want?

I think we need to announce as soon as we can that that's what we plan to do. Then it's a matter of troop safety, and getting them out as rapidly as makes practical sense, again with troop safety in mind. I think that creates a very significant diplomatic opportunity once the insurgency sees that we're not there to occupy their country, once the factions see that time is short and they're really going to have to get serious about making the decisions they have to make about their own country, and third that the international community sees that in fact we are on our way out, and it invests them in a whole different way in participating in a resolution of the Iraqi conflict. But I think the immediate thing that needs to happen to put all those things in motion is a clear and unequivocal decision that we are going to start withdrawing our troops as rapidly and sensibly as troop safety will permit.

What happens if when we're ready to go, to use a hackneyed expression, the mission isn't complete; if things are still going haywire over there. Should we still pull out?

Well the question you have to ask is: "Is the present strategy likely to lead to a better result?" My answer to that is no. Recently we've seen that confirmed by some of the internal reports that have been developed by analysts within the administration. I think we are on a path that leads toward a disaster over there, and it is pure stubbornness that keeps the administration from changing to a more effective policy.

You have a personal connection to these diplomatic issues—your father was a Foreign Service officer. Where were you when you were growing up?

Cambodia, South Africa, Congo, although they were shooting at each other then so the family stayed home, Guinea on the west coast of Africa, the United Nations, Vietnam, Laos and Thailand.

Quite a list.

It was interesting. I'll tell you one thing that stands out from my time in Vietnam. You could see intact in Saigon essentially all the infrastructure that we're trying to build now in Iraq. Political infrastructure, utility infrastructure, public safety and military infrastructure: it all was there when I was living there with him in 1973. It wasn't too long later, less than two years I believe, that we had pulled out. All that infrastructure intact, and yet this happened. I think it's the kind of thing that should have given this administration a lot more pause before it ventured on its misguided war in Iraq.

Let me ask you about the war on terror. There hasn't been a major attack since 9/11, and some people say we've disrupted the financial networks of terrorist organizations. How do you think we've done on this front?

No president following 9/11 would not engage in trying to fight the elements that want to produce terror acts in the United States of America and elsewhere. But I think a lot of the judgments that have been made—in terms of failing to fund border, container and port security; in terms of putting so many resources into the Iraq war and taking them away from Afghanistan, which was a front where we seemed to be winning—I think there clearly was a better way. We've now really compromised our military capability and the asset of our standing in the world without really improving our standing in the war on terror.

So how do we move forward?

Extracting ourselves from Iraq will help. Shoring up the effort in Afghanistan will help. And focusing really hard on the terror cells, a lot of which requires working behind the scenes with other nations. But this requires better relations than we've been able to maintain, and a more thoughtful and aggressive diplomacy.

Times Get Tougher For Ohio's Republicans (FT)

By Holly Yeager

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

Standing in front of the fire department in Zanesville, a small Ohio town near the middle of the state, Republican Mike DeWine is doing his best to persuade voters to elect him to a third term in the US Senate.

Legislation he worked on has brought $100m (€79m, £53m) to fire departments in the state, Mr DeWine says.

A few minutes later he shifts the topic to national security, holding up a sheet of paper that he says contains evidence of his opponent's past votes to cut intelligence spending.

But Mr DeWine, clad in a white shirt and tie, is having a hard time getting his message across. Only a handful of people - active Republicans in the community - had been alerted to his visit. The whistle of a passing train makes it hard to hear some of what he says.

He takes questions from the two reporters on hand - about congressman Mark Foley's exchange of suggestive messages with a young page and the need for more jobs in the region - and then mingles with the firefighters, one of whom complains about all the negative adverts this campaign season.

Recent opinion polls show him in a virtual tie with Sherrod Brown, the liberal Democratic congressman - a surprise to many in the state.

But the polls are clear evidence that the series of scandals that have engulfed Ohio Republicans at home and in Washington, including congressman Bob Ney's guilty plea in a scandal involving the lobbyist Jack Abramoff, have made a difficult political year even more troublesome for them.

The state, long a bellwether in presidential politics, is ground zero for the November 7 mid-term elections: the outcome of Mr DeWine's race and several other closely watched House contests are likely todetermine which party wins control of Congress.

Perhaps most worrying for Republican activists is the poor performance to date of Ken Blackwell, the conservative Republican who hopes to take over from Robert Taft, the unpopular Republican governor who pleaded guilty to ethics charges.

Mr Blackwell gained national attention in 2004 when, as Ohio secretary of state, he drew criticism for the long lines and other troubles that some voters faced.

Recent opinion polls show him trailing Ted Strickland, his Democratic opponent, by more than 15 percentage points, and party officials fear that having such a weak candidate at the top of the ticket could help to put several top jobs in the hands of Democrats.

Democrats sense the opportunity. "We need change at the Statehouse, at the governor's house, and we need change in the United States Congress," said Mary Jo Kilroy, the Democratic candidate for Congress, at a campaign rally this week at Ohio State University. Some of the biggest cheers during her speech came for the school's top-ranked football team.

The other big cheers came when John Kerry, the 2004 Democratic presidential candidate, declared: "We need to get those troops out of Iraq".

Ms Kilroy frequently complains that Deborah Pryce, the seven-term House member she hopes to unseat, has been a "rubber stamp" for President George W. Bush and his Iraq policy.

The close contest in this district around Columbus, the state capital, has also caught the Republicans off guard.

Ms Pryce, a member of the Republican leadership team, was forced this week to answer questions about how Mr Foley's messages were handled, and, like Mr DeWine, she says the political climate is "a tough one".

But, she says, "the earth won't stand still" - she is hoping to return soon to a debate of issues such as the "war on terror", the economy and immigration.

With just a month until election day, Ms Pryce and her fellow Republicans have their work cut out if they are to boost the enthusiasm of voters.

Robert Sicuro, a retired attorney who has voted for her in the past, says he probably will support Ms Pryce again, but only grudgingly.

"I don't think she's the most effective person in the world," he says, adding that he worries more about Ms Kilroy's support for tax increases as a county commissioner.

Mr Sicuro is "not too happy" with Mr DeWine either. But he also expects to vote for him again, calling Mr Brown "too far left for my taste" and complaining that Democrats "don't really have a plan" for Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0076595

But Bonita Hall, an office worker who is eating her lunch on a bench on the capitol grounds, says that although she calls herself a Republican, she does not think she will be able to support the party's candidates this time around.

"Right now, they seem like the good 'ole boys, a club that protects one another no matter what they do," she says. "Maybe we need some new ideas."

A Senate Race's Ads Absurdum (WP)

By Michael Kinsley

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

SEATTLE -- Here in Washington state we don't care for partisanship and negativity, which leaves our candidates with not much to talk about. "Look," says Republican Senate candidate Mike McGavick, "if the Republican Party came to me and said, 'Mike, we want you to vote against the families of your state,' I'd tell them to go jump. I'll choose the people of our state every time."

Wow. This must be one of those "hard choices" McGavick, a former insurance executive, says he is prepared to make if he is sent to the Senate. He does not supply any other examples. My idea of a hard choice would be having to choose between the short-term interests of the people -- yes, even the families -- of your state and the long-term interests of the nation. Through the fog of generalities, McGavick appears to see things differently.

A news release entitled "Mike Takes a Tough Line on Federal Spending Reforms" is mostly about federal grants to the University of Washington. But he supports this spending, of course, and deplores the cuts that have been made in it, which he attributes to "budget mismanagement." He made this point in a day spent campaigning with Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez, who was here in his capacity as a Hispanic and not as anyone who might bear responsibility for the federal budget.

If you knew nothing about Mike McGavick except what is in his TV commercials and on his Web site, you would conclude either that he is a moron or that he thinks you are a moron. Democratic incumbent Maria Cantwell's ads aren't so wonderful either. They're mainly about all the federal money and other favors she's brought to the state. But if any of this is part of the "pork barrel . . . wasteful, out-of-control spending" that upsets McGavick, he doesn't say so.

And of course there is a subtext to each of the inanities in McGavick's commercials. They have all been focus-grouped and market-tested. For example, in one news release expressing his "disappointment" (I bet) that Cantwell had voted against some tax cut, McGavick says, "This isn't really about Senator Cantwell." It's about "partisan nonsense." Cantwell is (the headline mentions) "Following Party Over State's Interests."

Now ask yourself: Why would she do that? Why would she put her party's interests over those of her constituents? Who cares enough about either party to actually put their own political futures in peril? Answer: no one. Taken literally, the charge is absurd. But it's not meant to be taken literally. It is just part of the miasma of themes and images that political professionals create around candidates. Cantwell is popular, partisanship is not. So blame partisanship and not Cantwell. Be for "families." Be for "change." Be against "Washington, D.C." and "lobbyists."

The media do a better and better job each election cycle at pointing out and analyzing these campaign constructs. But by doing so, in a way, they legitimize it all. By raising up the subtext, they diminish the importance of the text. Don't be naive: You're not supposed to take this stuff literally. Politicians are trying to push your buttons. They aren't trying to communicate with you.

In a radio spot this week called "Not Paying Attention," McGavick says, "Folks in Washington, D.C., you know they must not think we are paying attention" to "some of the things they are getting away with." In a rare particular, he blames "automatic pay raises" for creating bad incentives for members of Congress. "We've got to have change," he says, "but the only way to do that is to change who represents us."

Maria Cantwell hit it big in the dot-com boom and is a very rich woman. She has spent tens of millions of dollars on her election and reelection campaigns. Whatever her flaws, she cannot possibly care about a pay raise. Taken literally, the notion that any national politician assumes that the voters and media and opposition party are "not paying attention" is equally ridiculous. So what is her motivation? What is McGavick's, for that matter? (He's rich, too, having struck gold in just a few years in the insurance business.)

In an age when senators have almost no power to affect the actual course of events, and when most of them don't seem to have any particular notion of what they would do with that power if they had it -- McGavick certainly doesn't -- why anyone bothers to be a senator is a fascinating question. Is Cantwell devoting her life to betraying the families of Washington just for the fun of it?

McGavick has no explanation, except to say that "this stuff is nuts," that it is "partisan nonsense" and so on. But Maria Cantwell is not nuts. "Nuts" is not a plausible explanation. And without any specifics or a plausible explanation, McGavick's complaints are exceptionally empty.

Knowing virtually nothing about McGavick, I saw one of his 30-second spots last week and took an instant, personal and possibly unfair dislike to him. And I wonder why everyone doesn't have the same reaction to these patronizing, insulting commercials. Maybe some do -- McGavick is going to lose, apparently -- but more must be turned on than are turned off, because McGavick is not nuts either.

Dems Aim To Gain Majority Of Governorships (USAT)

USA Today, October 6, 2006

Thirty-six states will elect governors in November, and Democrats hope to gain a majority of the USA's governorships for the first time since 1994. Republicans now hold 28 seats nationwide, Democrats 22. More GOP-held seats are up this fall: 22 vs. 14 now held by Democrats. Taxes, charter schools, gas prices and embryonic stem cell research are among the issues defining the contests.

Big state takeovers:

Democrats are confident of winning back governorships in two of the USA's biggest states. In New York, Attorney General Eliot Spitzer has a yawning lead in statewide polls over Republican John Faso, former state Assembly minority leader. In Ohio, Democratic congressman Ted Strickland leads Republican Secretary of State Ken Blackwell by double digits in statewide polls.

Minorities:

Three African-Americans have major-party nominations for governor. They are Democrat Deval Patrick in Massachusetts and Republicans Ken Blackwell in Ohio and former Pittsburgh Steeler Lynn Swann in Pennsylvania. The only African-American who has been elected governor in the USA is Virginia's Doug Wilder, in 1989. In New Mexico, Gov. Bill Richardson, who is Hispanic, is running for a second term.

Women:

A record five female incumbent governors are running for new terms, in Arizona, Connecticut, Hawaii, Kansas and Michigan. Three are Democrats, two Republicans. Five other female candidates have major-party nominations and are in competitive contests: Democrats in Alabama and Nevada and Republicans in Alaska, Illinois and Massachusetts.

Scandals:

The Jack Abramoff lobbying investigation that has affected some congressional races isn't a factor for governors, but local scandals have scarred some contests. In Ohio, the Republican establishment is entangled in charges of improprieties in handling state pension funds. That has complicated the campaign of GOP gubernatorial candidate Ken Blackwell. Among Democrats, Illinois Gov. Rod Blagojevich and Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle have had to deal with allegations of wrongdoing in their administrations. Both races are considered competitive.

Stepping down:

One Democratic and eight Republican governors are stepping down. Five of them didn't have a choice: governors in Arkansas, Colorado, Florida, Nevada and Ohio faced term limits.

Stepping up?

At least four governors who are stepping down are testing the waters for the 2008 presidential race. They are Democrat Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Republicans Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, George Pataki of New York and Mitt Romney of Massachusetts.

Alaska:

Gov. Frank Murkowski ran a dismal third in the GOP primary. Republicans hope former Wasilla mayor Sarah Palin can hold the seat. Democrat Tony Knowles, a former two-term governor, is trying to regain it.

Michigan:

Gov. Jennifer Granholm, a rising star in the Democratic Party, is in an unexpected tossup against Republican Dick DeVos. The Amway heir is spending millions of his personal fortune on ads that hammer Granholm over the state's economic woes.

Arkansas:

Democrats hope to regain the governorship that launched Bill Clinton in national politics. Democratic Attorney General Michael Beebe faces Republican Asa Hutchinson, a former House member and Homeland Security Department official.

California:

A year ago, Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger seemed imperiled as governor of the nation's largest state. He has rebounded, though he isn't considered a safe bet yet. State Treasurer Phil Angelides is the Democratic challenger.

Massachusetts:

Whoever wins will break new ground. Democrat Deval Patrick would be the first African-American governor in the Bay State; Republican Kerry Healey would be the first woman elected governor. Republicans have held the governorship in this Democratic stronghold for 16 years.

DOJ_NMG_0076597

Florida:

Presidential brother Jeb Bush is barred by term limits from running again. After lively primaries in both parties, Republicans nominated state Attorney General Charlie Crist, Democrats Rep. Jim Davis. Both are political moderates from the Tampa Bay area.

Subsidies Keep Airlines Flying To Small Towns (NYT)

By Jeff Bailey

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

PUEBLO, Colo. — Hoping for an empty seat beside you on your next flight? No problem — just schedule a trip to someplace like Kingman, Ariz.; Brookings, S.D.; or Pueblo.

They are among more than 100 locales around the country that receive federally subsidized airline service, and the average number of passengers on each flight is about three.

Most of these flights on 19-seat prop planes have plenty of elbow room — a rare luxury in this age of jampacked commercial jets. Some major airlines have cut their fleets about 20 percent since 2001 and have abandoned unprofitable routes, meaning planes are flying fuller than at any time since World War II.

The more tranquil cabins come courtesy of the Essential Air Service, put in place when the airline industry was deregulated in 1978. The idea was to help travelers in smaller cities adjust to the new competitive era of air travel. The intention was for the service to go away after 10 years, but it was renewed for a second decade — and then made permanent.

Over time, though, the program has come to seem mostly expensive and, to its critics, unessential.

After all, travelers adjusted very well after deregulation, and started driving the extra distance to busier regional airports nearby that offered increasingly cheap and plentiful jet service. That left the program with mostly empty planes, making them more costly to fly. Add in higher maintenance and fuel costs, and spending has more than quadrupled since 1996, to $110 million.

That, of course, is not a lot in the federal scheme of things. But the program is a good case study of how poorly the government sometimes keeps pace with the free market and consumer tastes, and how entrenched interests, even in the face of some creative map-drawing, can keep such a program aloft in the face of efforts to ground it.

Mike Boyd, a consultant to airports, said truly remote routes — those in Alaska, northern Maine, parts of the Western states — should be retained. But he said that most routes should be eliminated.

"The Essential Air Service program is one of those well-meaning federal programs that often results in money wasted on trying to recreate those wonderful days of the 1950's," Mr. Boyd said in a recent note to clients. "Somebody needs to tell Congress that Ozzie and Harriet are gone."

From Lewistown, Mont., Jerry Moline, the airport manager, is used to driving 110 miles to shop at the Wal-Mart in Great Falls. Likewise, most of his neighbors drive 125 miles to the airport in Billings, which has jet service, rather than fly there on the subsidized 19-seaters. The Lewistown flights attracted fewer than three people a day in 2005; each passenger's one-way ticket was subsidized with $472.78 paid by taxpayers.

The emptier the subsidized flights, it seems, the more cherished the program became. Members of Congress regularly pressured the Transportation Department to continue subsidies to towns they represented. A lobbying group sprang up solely to fight to preserve and expand the program.

To qualify for Essential Air Service, towns must have had scheduled commercial air service in October 1978 when deregulation occurred; be at least 70 miles from a large or medium hub airport; and be able to attract service from a regional airline with a one-way per passenger subsidy of no more than $200.

For towns more than 210 miles from a large or medium hub, however, there is no cap on the subsidy per passenger.

After Sept. 11, 2001, airlines withdrew from some smaller unsubsidized markets and more cities needed subsidies to maintain service. That pinched the Essential Air Service budget.

Over the next several years, the Transportation Department tried to weed out some locales.

The agency took a harder look at its map and decided that Brookings, S.D., was less than 210 miles from the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport; that Alamogordo, N.M., was similarly close to Albuquerque's airport; and that Lancaster, Pa., was less than 70 miles from Philadelphia's airport.

At those distances, Lancaster did not qualify for any subsidy and the two other markets qualified only for $200 or less per passenger, far less than needed to sustain service.

The towns made tempting targets. Flights from Brookings, which is less than an hour's drive from jet service at Sioux Falls, were attracting about three passengers a day. Alamogordo drew four or five a day. Both required big subsidies. And Lancaster is not that far from competitive airports, with Southwest Airlines bringing low fares to Philadelphia and Baltimore.

DOJ_NMG_0076598

The towns and a lobbyist, Maurice Parker, president of Regional Aviation Partners — it is financed by the Mesa Air Group, which flies subsidized routes — swung into action. The termination notices persuaded Senator Arlen Specter, Republican of Pennsylvania, and others in Congress to pass legislation that required the Transportation Department to measure the distances along the most commonly traveled routes. It also gave the governor of each state the final word on the matter.

"Lancaster is 66 miles from the Philadelphia International Airport if you travel along Route 30, which is the old Lincoln Highway, where there is a traffic light every other block," Senator Specter said in introducing the legislation in June 2003. He added that "any rational person" would take Interstate 222 to the Pennsylvania Turnpike, a faster route, at about 80 miles. Similar arguments were made for Alamogordo and for Brookings.

The termination efforts were dropped. And all three markets retained subsidized service. Transportation Department officials declined to comment. Michael W. Reynolds, an acting assistant secretary, in testimony before a Senate subcommittee last month, said towns had come to view the program as "an absolute entitlement."

Regional airlines in the program are paid a subsidy that, combined with fares they expect to collect from passengers, will allow for a profit. Fares vary widely. A recent one-way ticket from Pueblo to Denver, bought a few days before the flight, was $124.50.

Kerry Caruselle, a tax preparer for Army employees, was ready for the unexpected when she flew a Great Lakes 19-seater prop plane from Denver to her home in Pueblo last week. On her last flight on that route, a bumpy turboprop trip about a decade ago, she said, "My kids were in middle school and they both threw up."

Last week's 30-minute flight was smooth, yet Ms. Caruselle was the only passenger. "Just me," she said. There was also a pilot and a co-pilot but no flight attendant.

Colorado Springs Airport, offering nonstop jet service to 14 major cities, is about 40 miles away. Denver's huge hub is within about 110 miles. In fiscal 2005 Pueblo's two daily subsidized flights to Denver drew a combined five passengers a day.

"That may be generous," confided Jerry Brienza, manager of the Pueblo Memorial Airport. "We were close to three a day last year." The government calculated the one-way subsidy at $255.06 a passenger.

Traffic has picked up to about eight a day in 2006, Mr. Brienza said.

Excluding Alaska, where many air routes are subsidized, the Transportation Department paid out about $74 for each one-way passenger in the program in fiscal 2005. That is more than Amtrak's famously large per passenger subsidy, which is $19 to $52, depending on how it is calculated.

The Bush administration now wants to cut funding to $50 million. So, the Transportation Department is proposing changes to reduce the program costs. Towns more than 100 miles away from a large or medium hub would have to chip in on the subsidy. Towns closer than 100 miles would get a partial subsidy — for bus service to a hub.

But a perennial favorite with much of Congress, Essential Air Service seems unlikely to face cuts. Spending panels in each house of Congress favor a slight increase in funding for fiscal 2007, to $117 million. Many in Congress regard the program as a good way to connect remote towns to the air service system.

Probably the biggest beneficiary in recent years has been the Raytheon Company. It manufactured the 19-seat Beech 1900 prop planes that fly most of the subsidized routes. Tighter safety rules enacted in the mid-1990's made operating those more expensive. And the rapid spread of regional jets preferred by passengers forced Raytheon to halt production of the 1900 in 2002.

"The average untrained traveler equates jets to safety," said David Carter, a Raytheon spokesman. "They're not so sure about turboprops."

Having financed the acquisition of most of the 1900's by regional carriers and others, Raytheon faced huge losses. It in essence still owned 511 of the planes valued at $1.6 billion. It wrote the value of those planes down by $693 million in 2001. Since then, it has slowly been selling the planes in overseas markets, but is still stuck with 218 of them as of June 25 of this year, valued at $435 million.

Without the subsidies, most of the roughly 100 1900's remaining today in the United States could be idled, said Jonathan Ornstein, chief executive of Mesa Air, which once operated 122 of the planes and has cut its fleet to 20.

"We don't make money in the program; we do it because we have the equipment" and owe more than $1 million on each of the planes, Mr. Ornstein said. Mesa, with annual revenue of more than $1 billion, mostly operates jets now. "No one I'm aware of has figured out how to operate the 1900 outside the Essential Air Service program."

By Keyonna Summers

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

For many, philanthropists are the rich and famous people who donate millions to projects.

But Greater DC Cares, a District-based nonprofit, is assigning a new definition to the word "philanthropy" by allowing donations of professional skills through pro bono consulting to hundreds of new nonprofits in the region.

Spokeswoman Dee Ellison said accountants, Web designers and college professors with communications expertise have viable skills that could help new nonprofits get started.

"People generally think of philanthropy as dollars," Ms. Ellison said. But "skilled volunteers [are] just as valuable as the dollars because they help increase the capacity of the nonprofits that serve our community. And the end result is we make the community stronger and healthier."

Founded in 1989, Greater DC Cares has 16,000 volunteers working with more than 400 nonprofits. Officials estimate that volunteers provide more than 60,000 hours of service annually in the region.

Under the pro bono consulting program, about 200 professionals are working with new nonprofits on about 30 projects, in which they help to develop Web sites, craft mission statements, create budgets, write grants and market their organizations.

The group also works with several large corporations, such as America Online, whose employees offer their professional services to build Web sites and laboratories for schools.

Noel Tieszen is a former teacher who last year founded Interstages Inc., an afterschool program that provides low-income middle school girls in the District's Ward 7 with lessons in music, history and self-esteem. The group also provides one-on-one academic help.

Ms. Tieszen called the consultation she received from a Greater DC Cares accountant, grant writer and publicist "fantastic."

"As a startup, this was a one-woman show," she said. "I know how to balance my checkbook, but you can't run a business that way. Greater DC Cares has been a great resource in helping us make our dollars go further, and it also helps me free up time to develop relationships with the students and do fundraising."

Today, about 10 Winston Educational Center girls gather each afternoon at the Hillcrest Recreation Center in Southeast for piano and voice lessons by volunteers attracted with the help of DC Cares' marketing consultant.

The grant writer is helping Ms. Tieszen develop proposals that will allow her to take the girls on field trips, buy musical instruments and school supplies, and hire more employees to help expand the program.

The girls in the class, who at a recent meeting played a game in which they named positive female role models of color, said Interstages has taught them problem-solving skills, about womanhood and respect for others.

"I learned to always be on time," said Shakiera Williams, 12. And "if you don't like somebody, it's best to write it down on a piece of paper [and talk it out]. Before, I just handled it by fighting."

Shauntice McCorkle, 12, an aspiring singer, agreed.

"They ask us what our goals are," she said.

Donny Tiengtum, director of programs at Greater DC Cares, said the group's goal is to stretch the funds of nonprofits in the region by including at least one or two pro bono volunteers.

"It would be intriguing to see if we could get any department of a nonprofit -- marketing, technical, financial -- to be completely run by a team of pro bono consultants, not having to spend [lots of] dollars on staffers in that regard," he said.

Evangelicals Fear The Loss Of Their Teenagers (NYT)

By Laurie Goodstein

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

Despite their packed megachurches, their political clout and their increasing visibility on the national stage, evangelical Christian leaders are warning one another that their teenagers are abandoning the faith in droves.

At an unusual series of leadership meetings in 44 cities this fall, more than 6,000 pastors are hearing dire forecasts from some of the biggest names in the conservative evangelical movement.

Their alarm has been stoked by a highly suspect claim that if current trends continue, only 4 percent of teenagers will be “Bible-believing Christians” as adults. That would be a sharp decline compared with 35 percent of the current generation of baby boomers, and before that, 65 percent of the World War II generation.

While some critics say the statistics are greatly exaggerated (one evangelical magazine for youth ministers dubbed it “the 4 percent panic attack”), there is widespread consensus among evangelical leaders that they risk losing their teenagers.

“I’m looking at the data,” said Ron Luce, who organized the meetings and founded Teen Mania, a 20-year-old youth ministry, “and we’ve become post-Christian America, like post-Christian Europe. We’ve been working as hard as we know how to work — everyone in youth ministry is working hard — but we’re losing.”

DOJ_NMG_0076600

The board of the National Association of Evangelicals, an umbrella group representing 60 denominations and dozens of ministries, passed a resolution this year deploring "the epidemic of young people leaving the evangelical church."

Among the leaders speaking at the meetings are Ted Haggard, president of the evangelical association; the Rev. Jerry Falwell; and nationally known preachers like Jack Hayford and Tommy Barnett.

Genuine alarm can be heard from Christian teenagers and youth pastors, who say they cannot compete against a pervasive culture of cynicism about religion, and the casual "hooking up" approach to sex so pervasive on MTV, on Web sites for teenagers and in hip-hop, rap and rock music. Divorced parents and dysfunctional families also lead some teenagers to avoid church entirely or to drift away.

Over and over in interviews, evangelical teenagers said they felt like a tiny, beleaguered minority in their schools and neighborhoods. They said they often felt alone in their struggles to live by their "Biblical values" by avoiding casual sex, risqué music and videos, Internet pornography, alcohol and drugs.

When Eric Soto, 18, transferred from a small charter school to a large public high school in Chicago, he said he was disappointed to find that an extracurricular Bible study attracted only five to eight students. "When we brought food, we thought we could get a better turnout," he said. They got 12.

Chelsea Dunford, a 17-year old from Canton, Conn., said, "At school I don't have a lot of friends who are Christians."

Ms. Dunford spoke late last month as she and her small church youth group were about to join more than 3,400 teenagers in a sports arena at the University of Massachusetts in Amherst for a Christian youth extravaganza and rock concert called Acquire the Fire.

"A lot of my friends are self-proclaimed agnostics or atheists," said Ms. Dunford, who wears a bracelet with a heart-shaped charm engraved with "tlw," for "true love waits," to remind herself of her pledge not to have premarital sex.

She said her friends were more prone to use profanity and party than she was, and added: "It's scary sometimes. You get made fun of."

To break the isolation and bolster the teenagers' commitment to a conservative lifestyle, Mr. Luce has been organizing these stadium extravaganzas for 15 years. The event in Amherst was the first of 40 that Teen Mania is putting on between now and May, on a breakneck schedule that resembles a road trip for a major touring band. The "roadies" are 700 teenagers who have interned for a year at Teen Mania's "Honor Academy" in Garden Valley, Tex.

More than two million teenagers have attended in the last 15 years, said Mr. Luce, a 45-year-old, mop-headed father of three with a master's degree from the Graduate School of Business Administration at Harvard and the star power of an aging rock guitarist.

"That's more than Paul McCartney has pulled in," Mr. Luce asserted, before bounding onstage for the opening pyrotechnics and a prayer.

For the next two days, the teenagers in the arena pogoed to Christian bands, pledged to lead their friends to Christ and sang an anthem with the chorus, "We won't be silent." Hundreds streamed down the aisles for the altar call and knelt in front of the stage, some weeping openly as they prayed to give their lives to God.

The next morning, Mr. Luce led the crowd in an exercise in which they wrote on scraps of paper all the negative cultural influences, brand names, products and television shows that they planned to excise from their lives. Again they streamed down the aisles, this time to throw away the "cultural garbage."

Trash cans filled with folded pieces of paper on which the teenagers had scribbled things like Ryan Seacrest, Louis Vuitton, "Gilmore Girls," "Days of Our Lives," Iron Maiden, Harry Potter, "need for a boyfriend" and "my perfect teeth obsession." One had written in tiny letters: "fornication."

"Lord Jesus," Mr. Luce prayed into the microphone as the teenagers dropped their notes into the trash, "I strip off the identity of the world, and this morning I clothe myself with Christ, with his lifestyle. That's what I want to be known for."

Evangelical adults, like believers of every faith, fret about losing the next generation, said the Rev. David W. Key, director of Baptist Studies at the Candler School of Theology of Emory University, in Atlanta.

"The uniqueness of the evangelical situation is the fact that during the 80's and 90's you had the Reagan revolution that was growing the evangelical churches," Mr. Key said.

Today, he said, the culture trivializes religion and normalizes secularism and liberal sexual mores.

The phenomenon may not be that young evangelicals are abandoning their faith, but that they are abandoning the institutional church, said Lauren Sandler, author of "Righteous: Dispatches from the Evangelical Youth Movement" (Viking, 2006). Ms. Sandler, who calls herself a secular liberal, said she found the movement frighteningly robust.

DOJ_NMG_0076601

"This generation is not about church," said Ms. Sandler, an editor at Salon.com. "They always say, 'We take our faith outside the four walls.' For a lot of young evangelicals, church is a rock festival, or a skate park or hanging out in someone's basement."

Contradicting the sense of isolation expressed by some evangelical teenagers, Ms. Sandler said, "I met plenty of kids who told me over and over that if you're not Christian in your high school, you're not cool — kids with Mohawks, with indie rock bands who feel peer pressure to be Christian."

The reality is, when it comes to organizing youth, evangelical Christians are the envy of Roman Catholics, mainline Protestants and Jews, said Christian Smith, a professor of sociology at the University of Notre Dame, who specializes in the study of American evangelicals and surveyed teens for his book "Soul Searching: the Religious and Spiritual lives of American Teenagers" (Oxford, 2005).

Mr. Smith said he was skeptical about the 4 percent statistic. He said the figure was from a footnote in a book and was inconsistent with research he had conducted and reviewed, which has found that evangelical teenagers are more likely to remain involved with their faith than are mainline Protestants, Catholics, Jews and teenagers of almost every other religion.

"A lot of the goals I'm very supportive of," Mr. Smith said of the new evangelical youth campaign, "but it just kills me that it's framed in such apocalyptic terms that couldn't possibly hold up under half a second of scrutiny. It's just self-defeating."

The 4 percent is cited in the book "The Bridger Generation" by Thom S. Rainer, a Southern Baptist and a former professor of ministry. Mr. Rainer said in an interview that it came from a poll he had commissioned, and that while he thought the methodology was reliable, the poll was 10 years old.

"I would have to, with integrity, say there has been no significant follow-up to see if the numbers are still valid," Mr. Rainer said.

Mr. Luce seems weary of criticism that his message is overly alarmist. He said that a current poll by the well-known evangelical pollster George Barna found that 5 percent of teenagers were Bible-believing Christians. Some criticize Mr. Barna's methodology, however, for defining "Bible-believing" so narrowly that it excludes most people who consider themselves Christians.

Mr. Luce responded: "If the 4 percent is true, or even the 5 percent, it's an indictment of youth ministry. So certainly they're going to want different data."

Outside the arena in Amherst, the teenagers at Mr. Luce's Acquire the Fire extravaganza mobbed the tables hawking T-shirts and CD's stamped: "Branded by God." Mr. Luce's strategy is to replace MTV's wares with those of an alternative Christian culture, so teenagers will link their identity to Christ and not to the latest flesh-baring pop star.

Apparently, the strategy can show results. In Chicago, Eric Soto said he returned from a stadium event in Detroit in the spring to find that other teenagers in the hallways were also wearing "Acquire the Fire" T-shirts.

"You were there? You're a Christian?" he said the young people would say to one another. "The fire doesn't die once you leave the stadium. But it's a challenge to keep it burning."

Big Ideas And No Boundaries (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

My rabbi told this joke on Yom Kippur: At the front of the lunch line at a parochial school was a bowl of apples with a sign that read: "Take only one. God is watching." At the end of the lunch line, after the entrees, was a bowl of cookies, where a student had put up a sign: "Take all you want. God is watching the apples."

Somehow that joke reminds me of the debate about free trade in America today. Right now, with the Republicans in charge, free trade is secure. Yet, while everyone is watching the front of the line, out back in the country, an erosion of support for free trade is under way. The "Doha" trade talks have stalled, because of opposition by U.S. farmers, and the White House's "fast-track" authority to negotiate free trade agreements expires soon. With protectionist-leaning Democrats likely to take the House or Senate, any new free-trade accords will probably be stalled.

I hope Democrats won't go this route. I've always believed in free trade, accompanied by better pension and health care safety nets. But I'm not a free trader anymore. I'm now a radical free trader. Why? Because in this new era of globalization, so many people now have the communication and innovation tools to compete, connect and collaborate from anywhere. As a result, business rule No. 1 today is: Whatever can be done will be done by someone, somewhere. The only question is whether it will be done by you or to you. In such a world, the way our society flourishes is by being as educated, open and flexible as possible, so more of our people can do whatever can be done first. It matters that Google was invented here.

"That society which has the least resistance to the uninterrupted flow of ideas, diversity, concepts and competitive signals wins," says Nandan Nilekani, C.E.O. of the Indian tech giant Infosys. "And the society that has the efficiencies to translate whatever can be done quickly — from idea to market — also wins."

The old left thinks free trade is something that benefits only multinationals. In fact, it is now critical for small businesses and individuals, who can now act multinationally. They are the ones who create good jobs.

Last week, I was in Nebraska, where I met Doug Palmer. He and his partner, Pat Boeshart, make insulated concrete forms for buildings. The traditional way to insulate concrete with foam is to make the foam and then truck it around the country to building sites to be attached to concrete. Mr. Palmer's company, Lite-Form, found a Korean machine that, when combined with devices added by his firm, can make the foam and concrete together on site, saving big dollars in trucking. Today, Mr. Palmer's South Sioux City company imports these machines from Korea, attaches its devices and exports them to Kuwait. His company has an Arabic brochure that tells Kuwaitis how to use the device. The brochure was produced by a local ad agency owned by the Winnebago Indian tribe of Nebraska. The agency was started by the tribe's economic development corporation. Midwest Indians publishing Arabic brochures for Nebraskans importing from Koreans for customers in Kuwait ...

"Protectionism scares me," said Mr. Palmer, who has 28 employees. "If we put up a moat and keep doing what we're doing, thinking we're the smartest in the world, we're going to die. We have to have that flexibility to barter and trade."

A few days later, in Silicon Valley, I met Arijit Sengupta, a young Indian-American educated at Stanford, whose company, "BeyondCore," developed a software algorithm able to detect and reduce errors in outsourced back-office work. When I met Mr. Sengupta, he handed me a card with his logo, which, he explained, was designed by a graphic artist he found online in Romania. His database and Web server are freeware, and he has outsourced his marketing, sales support and patent filings to Indian firms. When I asked, "Where's your office?" he held up his BlackBerry, which takes calls forwarded from numbers in India, Boston and Palo Alto. He and his seven workers already have one Fortune 500 client.

"When I started this company I never had to think about geography," he said. "All I had to think about was: Where was the best resource to get something done. ... What you need are the big ideas. That is the tough thing to come up with."

The way you keep good jobs in this country is not by building big walls, but by attracting people with big ideas — and then giving them the freedom to do whatever can be done with anyone, anywhere, anytime.

No On Proposition 1A (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 6, 2006

OF THE PACKAGE OF MEASURES, from 1A to 1E, that the Legislature placed on the November ballot, Proposition 1A is the odd man out. All the others are multibillion-dollar bond issues intended to shore up the state's crumbling infrastructure; 1A is a tweak to the Legislature's budgeting authority and a "fix" to a similar initiative from four years ago. It would tie Sacramento's hands and ensure that future fiscal emergencies cut more deeply into vital state services. Californians should vote no on Proposition 1A.

The measure is the latest of many misguided efforts to dedicate state revenue toward a specific use — in this case, transportation. This is almost never a good idea. Such earmarks restrict the government's flexibility and leave the Legislature unable to react when the money is needed for something else.

At issue is the gasoline sales tax. There are several different taxes on gasoline — the federal government takes 18.4 cents a gallon; the state charges another 18 cents in excise tax and then adds 6% in sales tax to the total purchase price. The 18-cent excise tax is a straightforward user fee, rightly charging drivers for the cost of building and maintaining roads and public transit. The sales tax is a different matter.

Until 2002, it was treated much like the sales tax on any other product — most of the revenue raised went into the general fund. Then voters passed Proposition 42, which dedicated the funds to transportation while allowing legislators the safety valve of dipping into the till with a two-thirds vote and approval from the governor. This turned out to be a low hurdle; the Legislature, citing revenue shortfalls, raided the gas sales tax twice in the last three years.

Proposition 1A makes that more difficult. It specifies that any gas sales tax money shifted out of the transportation fund has to be repaid, with interest, within three years, and that such raids be allowed only twice in a decade. It also specifies that the money already taken has to be paid back by 2016.

The underlying problem is that California's spending on transportation infrastructure isn't keeping up with demand. The 18-cent gas excise tax hasn't been raised in more than a decade, hasn't kept up with inflation and hasn't been supplemented adequately by general budget funds. The legislative analyst's office estimates that between the 1998-99 fiscal year and today, inflation-adjusted gas tax revenues declined 8% while the number of vehicle miles traveled in the state rose 16%. This will only worsen over time as vehicles get more fuel efficient.

Proposition 1A does nothing to solve this. Instead of taking sensible steps, such as gradually raising the gas excise tax, indexing it to inflation or mustering the legislative will to direct more money to transportation, Proposition 1A simply puts a straitjacket on the Legislature. Voters should reject it.

U.S. Weighs Sanctions Against North Korea (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 5 — The Bush administration is developing an extensive list of possible new sanctions against North Korea in the event that it carries through with its threat to conduct a nuclear test, senior officials said Thursday.

The measures under consideration include renewing efforts that have been unsuccessful in the past — persuading South Korea and China to cut off energy supplies and trade — and potentially confrontational steps that include intercepting and inspecting sea shipments into and out of the country.

Many of the sanctions have been considered before, as part of a long-running argument within the Bush administration over the best way to deal with North Korea. After a series of emergency meetings, including one on Tuesday at the White House, officials on each side of that debate said a nuclear test would end the argument about whether the United States should emphasize rewards or penalties.

"If the test happens, all the arguments are over," said one senior official in the midst of the debate. "We'll end up going to full-scale sanctions; the only debate is what 'full-scale' means."

On Wednesday night, Christopher R. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asia and Pacific affairs and a leading proponent of making new creative diplomatic offers to the North, announced that "we are not going to live with a nuclear North Korea."

Administration officials concede that the United States has been living with a nuclear North Korea for years. But the fact that North Korea has not yet tested its weapons has created enough diplomatic ambiguity that President Bush has not had to confront how he would enforce his own declaration in 2003 that he would never tolerate a nuclear-armed North Korea.

American intelligence agencies have long declared that North Korea has produced the fuel for nuclear weapons, but in recent days, their briefings have also included an assessment based on the expectation that the North is likely to make good on its threat to conduct an underground test.

The briefings include the important caveat that such assessments are based more on an evaluation of the political environment and North Korean strategy than on physical evidence that a test is imminent. The briefings were described by several government officials, who said they did not forecast a specific timetable.

The question of sanctions is an enormously delicate one, which officials will not discuss on the record because the issue is still under debate. The officials who did discuss them, however, came from both camps in the administration, and they appeared unified in sending North Korea a warning that a test would galvanize Washington into actions that some administration hawks have proposed for years.

Mr. Bush, several officials said, planned to call the president of China, Hu Jintao, in coming days to urge him to send an emissary to North Korea to deliver a sharp warning about the consequences of a test. They said Mr. Bush was also planning to call other leaders in the region.

Frederick Jones, a National Security Council spokesman, would only say, "Our objective is to try to use our influence, and the influence of others, to convince the North Koreans that they should not test a nuclear device."

But American officials are clearly concerned that the appeal to Beijing will not prove sufficient. "The last time the Chinese did this after the missile tests" that North Korea launched in early July, "their delegation was left cooling their heels for days," one senior official said. Others cautioned that China always shied away from the ultimate sanction, cutting off the North's oil, for fear that it could set off an economic or political collapse that would result in chaos along the border.

So for now the United States is seeking to win agreement on a "president's statement" from the United Nations Security Council warning North Korea against a test. But the threatened test comes as the administration is already trying to persuade the Security Council to make good on its threat to impose sanctions against Iran for defying a call for it to suspend uranium enrichment. That situation is the subject of a meeting in London on Friday that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will attend.

Some American officials are concerned that adding North Korea to the list of countries the United States wants punished could complicate those efforts and fracture a fragile coalition. But the under secretary of state for political affairs, R. Nicholas Burns, said in a telephone interview on Thursday that he did not believe the Council was growing either weary or leery of threatening sanctions.

DOJ_NMG_0076604

"You haven't heard a single country support the North Koreans this week," Mr. Burns said. "And we have made it very clear that should they test, we will work for a Chapter VII resolution at the Council," a reference to the section of the United Nations Charter that declares a country's act to be a threat to peace and security, and can pave the way for retaliation.

The potential sanctions against North Korea are described in a series of classified options papers that have been circulating among senior administration officials.

The proposed sanctions, which are graduated, could begin with a significant tightening on economic transactions — a process that began last year with action against a small bank in Macao that is widely believed to have handled transactions for President Kim Jong-il and other leaders, and that American investigators say was involved in money laundering.

A more escalated measure would involve inspection of all shipping, using a provision of a Security Council resolution passed after the July missile tests that allows nations to block missile or missile-related transactions.

But the reality is that North Korea receives most of its goods over the Chinese and Russian borders. Kurt Campbell, a former Defense Department official who specializes in Asia and is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said, "Without leveraging the Chinese to put firm pressure on, very little can be accomplished by the U.S. through sanctions."

North Korea Urged To Cancel Nuclear Test (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 6, 2006

Security Council experts reached agreement late Thursday on a statement urging North Korea to cancel its planned nuclear test and return immediately to talks on scrapping its nuclear weapons program, but the text needs final approval from council members.

Japan's U.N. Ambassador Kenzo Oshima said a statement "most likely" would be approved and read out on Friday morning after capitals give final approval.

"There are some changes, new inputs from members, but basically the original draft that we presented for discussion — the thrust of it is maintained," he said.

The original Japanese draft expresses "deep concern" over North Korea's announcement Tuesday that it would conduct a nuclear test and urges the North not to carry it out.

It warns Pyongyang that a nuclear test would bring international condemnation, "jeopardize peace, stability and security in the region and beyond," and lead to further unspecified council action.

The Japanese draft also urges North Korea to return immediately to six-party talks on its nuclear program and work toward implementation of a September 2005 agreement in which the North pledged to give up its nuclear program in exchange for aid and security guarantees. The six-party talks involve the two Koreas, the United States, China, Japan and Russia.

North Korea has boycotted the six-nation talks for a year, angered by American financial restrictions imposed over the North's alleged illegal activities such as money laundering and counterfeiting.

Oshima said still to be settled is whether the council will issue the text as a presidential statement or a press statement. Presidential statements become part of the council's official record, but press statements do not, though they reflect the council's unanimous thinking.

While all council members view the possibility of a North Korea test with alarm, there were different views on how to approach Pyongyang's announcement.

U.S. Ambassador John Bolton said the United States wanted "a strong response" from the Security Council, not just "a piece of paper." But China, Russia and Japan indicated they wanted a more moderate initial response.

S. Korea, Russia Try To Stop N. Korea (AP)

By Jae-Soon Chang, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 6, 2006

The president of South Korea reportedly ordered his government to send a "grave warning" to North Korea about the consequences of a nuclear test, and Russia said it was trying to dissuade Pyongyang from conducting it.

Amid the rising tensions, Japan's Kyodo News agency said a U.S. military plane capable of detecting radiation took off from southern Japan, believed to be part of U.S. efforts to monitor for signs of a North Korean test.

North Korea threatened Tuesday to conduct a nuclear test to prove it is a nuclear power. Pyongyang claims it has nuclear weapons and needs them to deter a U.S. attack, but hasn't performed any known test to verify that.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun huddled in Seoul with his top security adviser and ordered his government to send the "grave warning" to North Korea about the consequences of a test, Yonhap news agency reported.

DOJ_NMG_0076605

Roh also ordered the government to draw up a "contingency plan" if the nuclear standoff with North Korea worsens, Yonhap reported, citing unidentified presidential staff. At the same time, he instructed his government to step up diplomatic efforts to forestall a North Korean test, the report said.

Calls to the presidential office went unanswered on the first day of a three-day holiday.

In Warsaw, Poland, Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow was trying to dissuade North Korea from testing a nuclear weapon.

"We must do everything so that that doesn't happen," Lavrov said at a news conference. "We are working with the leadership of North Korea to stop steps that could negatively impact the situation."

The North's announcement also prompted outcry from China, the North's main ally. Beijing's ambassador to the United Nations urged Pyongyang Wednesday not to go ahead with a test, warning of "serious consequences."

Wang Guangya said at the U.N. that "no one is going to protect" North Korea, if it goes ahead with "bad behavior."

"I think if North Koreans do have the nuclear test, I think that they have to realize that they will face serious consequences," Wang said Wednesday.

The comment was China's most forceful public response yet to its ally's announcement Tuesday, and a break with Beijing's usual conciliatory strategy of avoiding warnings to or criticism of the North.

Beijing — the North's main source of food and fuel aid — had previously appealed for restraint but hasn't said what it might do if Pyongyang detonates a bomb.

The rebuke could spell trouble for North Korea, which faces a relatively united front against its nuclear aspirations, in sharp contrast to the fractured reaction to a series of North Korean missile tests in July. At that time, China accused Japan of overreacting in calling for sanctions.

Kyodo reported the U.S. military plane had taken off from southern Japan, and public broadcaster NHK carried video of what it said was a U.S. plane taking off from the U.S. air base at Kadena, Okinawa.

Col. Anne Morris of U.S. Forces Japan refused to confirm the Kyodo report, saying she was not authorized to talk specifically about ongoing operations, but she said U.S. forces were on alert for any moves by the North.

"Of course, everybody is being vigilant. But the U.S. position remains that we hope North Korea will allow the situation to be resolved diplomatically," she said.

Earlier Thursday, a pro-North Korean newspaper based in Japan warned that Pyongyang was not bluffing.

"The nuclear test statement was not empty language, but announced on the premise of action," the Choson Sinbo said. "Carrying out a nuclear test is an inevitable conclusion ... under a condition where (the country) declared possession of nuclear weapons in February last year."

The paper, run by an association of North Korean residents in Japan, is not part of the North's official media but is considered one of its propaganda tools. Its articles are believed to reflect the country's position.

It hedged its warning by saying the crisis can be overcome if the U.S. begins to take action toward denuclearization of the Korean Peninsula with "the same goal" of North Korea.

In his first reaction to the North's announcement, Roh called Wednesday for a "cool-headed and stern" response and ordered his government to let the North know what the consequences would be if it goes ahead with a test.

Associated Press writers Edith M. Lederer at the United Nations and Ryan Lucas in Warsaw, Poland, contributed to this report.

New UN Leader To Tackle N Korea (FT)

By Anna Fifield

Financial Times, October 6, 2006

South Korean foreign minister Ban Ki-moon, who is set to be confirmed as the next United Nations secretary-general on Monday, said on Thursday he would use his UN mandate directly to tackle North Korea over its nuclear programme.

Amid the international uproar over Pyongyang's threat this week to conduct a nuclear test, Mr Ban told the Financial Times he would visit North Korea in a bid to convince the rogue state to join diplomatic negotiations rather than indulge in "negative activities".

"Secretary-general Kofi Annan has made a lot of contributions and taken initiatives by appointing a special envoy, but unfortunately during the last 10 years he has not been able to visit North Korea," Mr Ban said.

"As I have gained a much deeper understanding and experience into the inter-Korean relationship, including North Korea, I think I will be in a much better position to handle this issue as secretary-general," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0076606

"As the South Korean foreign minister there may be some limitations, but as secretary-general of UN, I think I will be able to handle this with North Korean authorities and South Korean authorities to facilitate inter-Korean co-operation and the six-party process."

"If necessary, I will take my own initiatives to visit both North and South Korea and I will try to engage [Pyongyang] myself," he said.

Japan and South Korea warned of severe consequences should Pyongyang undertake a nuclear test. China also warned North Korea of "serious consequences" – Beijing's sharpest rebuke yet in response to Pyongyang's stated intentions.

Wang Guangya, China's ambassador to the UN, said "no one is going to protect" North Korea, if it went ahead with "bad behaviour".

Rumsfeld Ponders Nuke Test Ramifications (AP-Y)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, October 5, 2006

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Thursday if North Korea successfully tests a nuclear weapon, it will show weakness on the part of the international community.

"And that failure ... is something that the international community would have to register and ask itself how comfortable are we being that ineffective in this situation," Rumsfeld told reporters at the Pentagon during a visit by Croatian Defense Minister Berislav Roncevic.

His comments came as U.S. officials warned North Korea anew not to test a nuclear weapon.

"It isn't in their interest and it isn't in anyone's interest," Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, the top U.S. negotiator on the communist country's nuclear program, told AP Television. "We will not accept a nuclear state."

Rumsfeld also said that a successful North Korean test could prompt other countries to pursue nuclear weapons.

"Because of the ineffectiveness, and the lack of cohesion and the inability to marshal sufficient leverage to prevent North Korea from proceeding toward a nuclear program ... it will kind of lower the threshold, and other countries will step forward with it," Rumsfeld said.

He added that depending on whether the test is above or below ground, the United States has as good a capability of detecting it as any country. But he declined to say whether or not it would trigger any U.S. military action.

"I wouldn't be the person who would make a decision like that. That's a decision for the country, and a decision for president," Rumsfeld said.

The United States has sent a message of "deep concern" to the North through diplomatic channels at the United Nations in New York, Hill said Wednesday, adding that the North Koreans had received it and had not yet responded.

The North Korean announcement gave no date for any test, but U.S. intelligence agencies are keeping close watch over activity at possible test sites in the North, even while cautioning against reading too much into every movement.

The United States and North Korea have no diplomatic relations outside deadlocked six-nation nuclear talks and rarely communicate with each other so directly.

Hill would not discuss policy options, but he said senior U.S. diplomats, including Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, were in steady communication with their counterparts in Asia and Europe.

In the event of a nuclear test, Hill said, "We would have no choice but to act and act resolutely to make sure (North Korea) understood, and make sure every other country in the world understands, that this is a very bad mistake."

U.S. and international officials also said the U.N. Security Council would consider sanctions against the North if the test occurs.

A U.S. intelligence official, speaking on condition of anonymity because of the highly sensitive situation with North Korea, said the United States is now seeing the movement of people, materials and vehicles and other activity around one possible test site. But, the official said, it could be similar to activity seen a couple of months ago. No test occurred then.

The United States has spy satellites and other eavesdropping equipment aimed at North Korea, including ground-based seismic sensors.

While North Korean leader Kim Jong Il may decide to hold the test, it cannot be ruled out that Tuesday's threat was saber-rattling, an effort to force a change in stalled nuclear negotiations or some other motivating factor.

North Korea And The Dominoes (NYT)

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076607

Here's a scenario to keep you up nights. North Korea tests a nuclear weapon, and Japan, South Korea and Taiwan start thinking they need one too. Meanwhile, over in the Middle East, Iran's neighbors start asking themselves why they should even wait for Tehran to go nuclear before starting their own programs.

Which is why the Bush administration, and other critical players, need to do a lot more to talk North Korea back from the nuclear ledge — and to keep it there.

It has been months since negotiators even sat down at a table. And the two countries with the most potential leverage — China and the United States — have found it easier to play down the urgency of the threat than to do what's needed to deal with Pyongyang's undeniable craziness.

In China's case, that means delivering an unambiguous warning to its longtime client that a nuclear test will be followed by an immediate and painful reduction in Chinese subsidies and aid. And President Bush will have to make his own unambiguous commitment that the United States will not try to overthrow the North Korean government — if it gives up its weapons program.

Experts still debate whether China got the North Koreans to the table by briefly cutting off oil deliveries — or doling out cash. There's no doubt China has the leverage. But China's autocrats are so enamored of any status quo — and so nervous about having to house and feed the North's refugees — that they have resisted using it. Instead, Chinese officials say that the North probably hasn't built a weapon, or if it has, wouldn't ever use it. That's what we call being in denial. It is a luxury Beijing can no longer indulge.

Mr. Bush cannot indulge his own ambivalence over whether it would be better to negotiate with Kim Jong-il or try to overthrow him. North Korea may have the most erratic, brutal and opaque leadership in the world. And it's impossible to know whether the "dear leader" would really trade away his weapons program for any price. But this White House has yet to test him. In the most recent whipsaw, Mr. Bush agreed to offer economic and security incentives to Pyongyang but then undercut the offer by imposing new sanctions on North Korean banks. Pyongyang has refused to come back to the table ever since.

While you're contemplating nuclear dominoes, here's another reason to stay up at night. In its search for cash, North Korea has become expert at selling pretty much anything to anyone: counterfeit dollars, bootlegged cigarettes, ballistic missiles. Can plutonium be far behind?

The dangers are very real. What's needed now is real pressure and real diplomacy to get the North out of the nuclear weapons business — preferably before a nuclear test shows potential buyers just how well its weapons work.

By Edith M. Lederer, The Associated Press

USA Today, October 6, 2006

LONDON — The United States, Britain, France, Germany, China and Russia will confer here today to assess Iran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

They are expected to refer the nuclear case to the United Nations Security Council for talks next week on possible sanctions, Britain's U.N. Ambassador Emyr Jones Parry said Thursday. Russia's foreign minister, however, said he believes it is too soon to impose sanctions on Iran and that further diplomatic efforts are needed.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad reiterated Thursday that his country would not be intimidated by sanctions threats. "Those who threaten Iran by sanctions and embargo should know that this nation lived under the hardest situation in the past 27 years and achieved nuclear technology. This nation will not be frightened by the threats," state-run TV quoted him as saying.

Iran insists its enrichment of uranium is for nuclear energy. The United States and many European nations believe Iran wants to produce nuclear weapons.

Britain's U.N. ambassador said he expects "the Iran dossier" to return to the Security Council "in the course of next week." Jones Parry said Britain "will be discussing with its partners and with members of the council the basis for action by the council to adopt measures under Article 41 against Iran."

Article 41 authorizes the Security Council to impose sanctions that do not involve the use of armed forces such as economic penalties, breaking diplomatic relations or banning air travel.

Iran was initially referred to the Security Council in February by the International Atomic Energy Agency. The U.N. nuclear watchdog said Iran's suspicious activities represented breaches of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. The Vienna-based agency also said it could not be sure Iran was not trying to make weapons.

The council gave Iran until Aug. 31 to suspend enrichment in return for incentives or face punishments under Article 41. The council has held off on any action because of talks between European foreign policy chief Javier Solana and Iran's negotiator Ali Larijani.

Solana conceded Wednesday that “endless hours” of talks with Larijani had made little progress and suggested the dispute could wind up at the U.N. soon. He stressed Thursday, however, that dialogue with Iran must continue even if the nuclear talks fail. “I think that even if we fail now, we should keep the doors open for dialogue with Iran,” Solana said in Rome.

Russia's Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Moscow opposes sanctions against Iran. “Some members of the six nations already want to impose sanctions against Iran. We, however, think first we must continue multilateral actions,” he said.

World Powers To Discuss Sanctions Against Iran Over Nuclear Issue (WP)

By Robin Wright, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 6, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 5 -- Months of intense negotiations with Iran about its nuclear program have failed and the United States and its diplomatic partners will meet in London on Friday to discuss which punitive actions to include in a new U.N. resolution, U.S. and European officials said Thursday.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack announced in Baghdad that Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and counterparts from Britain, France, Russia and China -- the four other permanent members of U.N. Security Council -- plus Germany will hold talks.

The United States wants to impose sanctions on Iran, but divisions are still deep among the six countries over whether to go that far and, if so, in what form. Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov said Thursday that his country does not back sanctions as a means to punish the Islamic republic for failing to comply with a U.N. resolution that requires it to suspend uranium enrichment. Iran maintains that the fuel program is part of a peaceful nuclear energy program, but U.S. officials and others worry that it could be subverted for making weapons.

"I believe that until diplomatic means are exhausted, sanctions would be too radical," Lavrov said at a news conference in Warsaw. "We have to do everything to persuade Iran to begin negotiations. . . . The issue needs to be resolved diplomatically."

European Union foreign affairs chief Javier Solana, who has taken the lead in recent last-ditch talks with Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, also said talks should not be closed off. "Even if we fail now, we should maintain the doors open to continue dialogue with Iran," he said Thursday in Rome.

China also has been reluctant to impose tough sanctions, while France has not been as adamant as the United States and Britain. "We've done the Solana effort and now we'll have to move to sanctions. That's the ministers' role," Rice said en route to Baghdad on Thursday.

The first stage of sanctions could include a travel ban on Iranian officials involved in the nuclear program and a ban on selling Iran so-called dual-use equipment that can be adopted for weapons. Tougher actions could follow if Iran continues to balk.

At the United Nations, Britain's ambassador, Emyr Jones Parry, said the Security Council is likely to discuss specific language for a resolution on Iran next week that would include nonmilitary sanctions under Chapter 7, Article 41 of the U.N. Charter.

U.S. officials remain optimistic that they can win agreement -- in large part because of Iran itself. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeated several times in recent weeks, including during a trip to the United Nations last month, that Iran would not give up its enrichment program because it is operating within the rules of the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

During a visit to Spain, French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said that Iran is "gaining time" and that the time had come "to look at the consequences of Iran's attitude." But Douste-Blazy also said the route to dialogue would remain open if Tehran suspends its nuclear program.

US Nuclear Specialists To Visit Egypt (AFP)

AFP, October 5, 2006

US nuclear experts are to offer technical advice to their counterparts in Egypt, which last month announced it was relaunching its civil nuclear program after a 20-year freeze, official media said.

The experts were to arrive in Egypt "soon to share their experience," according to US ambassador to Egypt Francis Ricciardone, quoted by the MENA news agency.

Ricciardone did not specify when the nuclear experts would arrive but said Washington was prepared to help Egypt relaunch its civil nuclear program.

Ricciardone said last month that "the United States encourages the peaceful use of nuclear power for civilian purposes throughout the world."

Egypt's nuclear program was frozen in 1986 following the accident at the Chernobyl power plant in what was then the Soviet Union.

DOJ_NMG_0076609

Egypt signed in 1968 the international nuclear non-proliferation treaty and officially supports the elimination of nuclear weapons in the region.

The Egyptian government regularly criticizes Israel over its alleged atomic arsenal, whose existence Israel has never acknowledged though the Jewish state is widely believed to possess hundreds of nuclear warheads.

Israeli Bomblets Plague Lebanon (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Sept. 29 — Since the war between Israel and Hezbollah ended in August, nearly three people have been wounded or killed each day by cluster bombs Israel dropped in the waning days of the war, and officials now say it will take more than a year to clear the region of them.

United Nations officials estimate that southern Lebanon is littered with one million unexploded bomblets, far outnumbering the 650,000 people living in the region. They are stuck in the branches of olive trees and the broad leaves of banana trees. They are on rooftops, mixed in with rubble and littered across fields, farms, driveways, roads and outside schools.

As of Sept. 28, officials here said cluster bombs had severely wounded 109 people — and killed 18 others.

Muhammad Hassan Sultan, a slender brown-haired 12-year-old, became a postwar casualty when the shrapnel from a cluster bomb cut into his head and neck. He was from Sawane, a hillside village with a panoramic view of terraced olive farms and rolling hills. Muhammad was sitting on a hip-high wall, watching a bulldozer clear rubble, when the machine bumped into a tree.

A flash of a second later he was fatally injured when a cluster bomblet dropped from the branches. "I took Muhammad to the hospital in my car, but he was already dead," said Yousef Ftouni, a resident of the village.

The entire village was littered with the bomblets, and as Mr. Ftouni recounted Muhammad's death, the Lebanese Army worked its way through an olive grove, blowing up unexploded munitions in a painfully slow process of clearance.

Cluster bombs are legal if aimed at military targets and are very effective, military experts say. Nonetheless, Israel has been heavily criticized by United Nations officials, Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch for using cluster bombs, because they are difficult to focus exclusively on military targets. Israel was also criticized because it fired most of its cluster bombs in the last days of the war, when the United Nations Security Council was negotiating a resolution to end the conflict.

Officials calculate that if they are lucky, and money from international donors does not run out, it will take 15 months to clear the area. There are now about 300 Lebanese Army soldiers and 30 other clearance teams, each of up to 30 experts, working on the problem of unexploded bomblets.

The United Nations Mine Action Coordination Center in southern Lebanon recorded 745 locations across the south where unexploded bombs had been found. Of the million estimated to be scattered around, so far 4,500 have been disposed of, according to the center.

"Our priority at the moment is to clean houses, main roads and gardens so that the displaced people can return to their villages," said Col. Mohammad Fahmy, head of the national mine clearing office. "The next stage will be cleaning agricultural lands."

In Lebanon there are two explanations of why Israel unleashed cluster bombs at the end of the war: to inflict as much damage as possible on Hezbollah before withdrawing, or to litter the south with unexploded cluster bombs as a strategy to keep people from returning right away.

The United States has sold cluster bombs to Israel in the past and says it is investigating whether Israel's use of cluster bombs in its war with Hezbollah violated a secret agreement that restricted when they could be used.

The final days of the war — a conflict that began when Hezbollah launched rockets from Lebanon into northern Israel and sent militiamen across the border to capture Israeli soldiers — were marked by a huge Israeli offensive. Israel hoped its final push would, in part, help force the Security Council to adopt a tougher resolution on Hezbollah than appeared to be taking shape.

Israel has said it leafleted areas before bombing and provided Lebanon with maps of potential cluster bomb locations to help with the clearing process. United Nations officials in Lebanon say the maps are useless.

The Israeli newspaper Haaretz published an article on Sept. 12 anonymously quoting the head of a rocket unit in Lebanon who was critical of the decision to use cluster bombs. "What we did was insane and monstrous; we covered entire towns in cluster bombs," Haaretz quoted the commander as saying.

Repeated efforts to get Israeli officials to explain the rationale behind the use of the bombs have proved fruitless, with spokesmen referring all queries to short official statements arguing that everything done conformed with international law.

DOJ_NMG_0076610

In Lebanon the problem of the unexploded munitions is magnified by the desire to return to villages and lives in a region that is effectively booby-trapped. People want to begin rebuilding and harvest their crops. In some cases they have tried to clear the bomblets themselves, and some people have begun charging a small fee to clear away bombs — a practice that officials have discouraged as dangerous.

But the people are desperate.

"If I lost the season for olives and the wheat, I have no money for the winter,"' said Rida Noureddine, 54, who farms a small patch of land on the main road in the village of Kherbet Salem. There was a small black object at the entrance to his farm, and he thought it was a cluster bomb.

"I feel as if someone has tied my arms, or is holding me by my neck, suffocating me because this land is my soul," he said.

The bomblets, about the size of a D battery, can be packed into bombs, missiles or artillery shells. When the delivery system detonates, the bomblets spread like buckshot across a large area, making them difficult to aim with precision. A fact sheet issued by the Mine Action Coordination Center says cluster bombs have an official failure rate of 15 percent.

That means that 15 percent of the bomblets remain as hazards. According to the fact sheet, the failure rate in this war is estimated to be around 40 percent. "We estimate there are one million," said Dalya Farran, the community liaison officer of the mine action center.

Ms. Farran has worked at the center for nearly three years. It was set up in 2000 to help deal with the mines and unexploded ordnance left behind after the Israeli occupation of southern Lebanon and from other wars.

After this war, Ms. Farran said, there are two types of cluster bomb fragments across the south. The most commonly found type is known as M42, a deceptively small device resembling a light socket.

She said a large percentage of the unexploded bomblets were made in America, while some were produced in Israel. Each one has a white tail dangling off the back, like the tail of a kite. As they fall to the ground, the tail spins and unscrews the firing pin.

When the device hits, the front end fires a huge slug while the casing blasts apart into a spray of deadly metal fragments. When they fail to detonate they cling to the ground, and with their white tails look deceptively like toys, so children are often those who are injured.

"This is what they are living with every day," said Simon Lovell, a supervisor with one of the clearance teams as he looked at five unexploded bomblets poking out of the soft, rocky soil of the Hussein family farm.

Across the street, Hussein Muhammad, 48, at home with his wife and four children, waited for the clearance team. His olive trees were heavy with fruit, but he could not tend to the harvest.

"I feel that the land has become my enemy," he said. "It represents a danger to my life and my kids' lives."

New Envoy Shares Olmert Views (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

TEL AVIV -- Sallai Meridor, Israel's newly appointed ambassador to the United States, is not known to be a close associate of his boss, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. But whatever they lack in a personal friendship may be offset by the understanding that comes from traveling a parallel ideological journey.

Both come from the same political lineage of prominent revisionist Zionist families who dreamed of a Jewish state stretching from the Mediterranean eastward beyond the Jordan River. In recent years, both have departed with that mind-set, moving to Israel's pragmatic center and acknowledging that holding on to all of the West Bank and Gaza Strip doesn't square with the concept of a Jewish state.

To be sure, when Mr. Meridor, the consensus nomination for ambassador by Mr. Olmert and Foreign Minister Tzippi Livni, arrives in Washington in the coming weeks, his top duty will be keeping Israel in step with U.S. policy on confronting Iran's drive to nuclear power, analysts said.

The media-shy ambassador-appointee is the most genuine reflection of Mr. Olmert because of his recognition of the need for a Palestinian state and territorial compromise after years of activism in the right-wing Likud Party.

Mr. Meridor's transformation is perhaps even more complete because of his three-decade residency in the West Bank settlement of Ma'aleh Adumim.

"The prime minister views Sallai as a figure who can transcend his pro-settler orientation by putting a premium on some of the broader issues that confront Israel," said David Makovsky, a fellow at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "Judge him more by the positions he puts forward than where he lives."

DOJ_NMG_0076611

After finishing a six-year tenure last year as head of the Jewish Agency -- the quasi-governmental agency that cultivates ties between Israel and the Jewish diaspora -- Mr. Meridor may hold his most valuable asset in the relationships forged with the United States rather than his geopolitical expertise.

The 51-year-old envoy-designate sharpened his diplomatic skills as a top aide to the Likud's Moshe Arens, who was defense minister during the 1991 Madrid Peace Conference.

The new Washington diplomat is less comfortable in the limelight than his father, who served in the first Israeli parliament, and an older brother, Dan, who was appointed as a minister in several Likud governments.

While on visits in the United States for the Jewish Agency, he was known to have preferred cabs to Lincoln Town Car limousines.

"As a human being he's shy and modest," said Michael Jankelowitz, the foreign press spokesman at the Jewish Agency.

"Everything he does is low-profile. Nothing he does is bombastic. He's not going to steal Olmert's thunder. Sallai is going to be behind the scene."

Straw Asks Muslim To Take Off Veils (WT)

By Katherine Haddon

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

LONDON -- Former British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw triggered a dispute yesterday by revealing that he asks Muslim women to remove veils from their faces when they visit his constituency office to seek his help.

Mr. Straw, whose Blackburn, northwest England, constituency has a 22 percent ethnic minority population, said he had expected that his request would cause problems but has found that most women are "relieved" to comply.

"I thought a lot before raising this matter a year ago," he said.

Two years ago, Muslim schoolgirl Shabina Begum lost a High Court battle for the right to wear a long Islamic dress, which does not include a veil, to school in Luton, central England.

"I defend absolutely the right of any women to wear a headscarf," Mr. Straw wrote in his regular column in the Lancashire Evening Telegraph newspaper. "As for the full veil, wearing it breaks no laws."

However, he wrote that "the conversation would be of greater value if the lady took the covering from her face."

"Indeed, the value of a meeting, as opposed to a letter or phone call, is so that you can -- almost literally -- see what the other person means and not just hear what they say."

He said he now ensures he has a female member of staff with him during meetings in his office.

"I can't recall a single occasion when the lady concerned had refused to lift her veil; and most I ask seem relieved to have done so."

Massoud Shadjareh, chairman of the Islamic Human Rights Commission, said he was astonished that Mr. Straw does not realize his job "is to represent the interests of the constituency, not to selectively discriminate on the basis of religion."

Nasrullah Anwar, a spokesman for the Lancashire Council of Mosques, told Sky News that he was "shocked and dismayed" by the comments.

"You would think that someone in his position would be a little more sensitive," Mr. Anwar said.

Mr. Straw was appointed the leader of the House of Commons in May.

After Prime Minister Tony Blair, he is the politician most closely associated with Britain's decision to join the invasion of Iraq in 2003.

In March, when he was foreign secretary, Mr. Straw took Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to Blackburn, where they were greeted by a series of anti-war demonstrations.

Straw Draws Criticism From Muslim Groups (AP)

By Maria Hegstad

AP, October 6, 2006

Former British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw said Thursday he asks Muslim women visiting his office to remove their veils, drawing criticism from some Muslim groups.

Straw wrote in a column for the Lancashire Telegraph newspaper that he feels uncomfortable talking with someone whose face he cannot see, and described the veil as a "visible statement of separation and difference."

"I explain that this is a country built on freedoms. I defend absolutely the right of any women to wear a headscarf," Straw wrote.

DOJ_NMG_0076612

But, he said, "The value of a meeting, as opposed to a letter or phone call, is so that you can — almost literally — see what the other person means, and not just hear what they say."

Straw, who is now leader of the House of Commons, a senior Cabinet position, represents a low-income, heavily Muslim community in northwestern England.

He said in the column he worries that what he described as an increasing number of British Muslim women wearing the veil would hinder ties with non-Muslims.

Scarves that cover the face are "bound to make better, positive relations between the two communities more difficult," he wrote.

Straw said none of his constituents had refused to remove her veil, and thought most seemed relieved to do so.

But a leader of the Islamic Human Rights Commission said Straw's position "put barriers" in the way of Muslim women at a time when they are encouraged to participate more in British society.

"We're really astonished that someone so senior and responsible as Mr. Straw would make such a statement," chairman Massoud Shadjareh said. "I'm sure many people go (to his office) with many different types of clothing and fashions. Why does he suddenly have a problem with this? It's outrageous."

But Daud Abdullah, of the Muslim Council of Britain, told Britain's Press Association news agency that he understood Straw's position.

"The veil does cause some discomfort to non-Muslims. One can understand this," he said.

Abdullah said Muslim scholars differ over whether it is obligatory for women to cover their faces, but agree that they should cover their hair, Press Association reported.

Backers To Lobby For Vote On India Deal (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

U.S. backers of a civilian nuclear deal with India say they plan a major lobbying push over the next month to ensure a final vote on the bill before Congress adjourns for the year, after the Senate failed to take up the measure before it left town last week.

Bush administration officials, calling the deal a centerpiece of a new strategic relationship with India, are hoping the Senate will vote on the enabling legislation for the pact early in the planned lame-duck session set to take place soon after the Nov. 7 congressional elections.

Sanjay Puri, executive director of the U.S. India Political Action Committee, said his group was "obviously disappointed" about the Senate's failure to act, but he added he was "cautiously optimistic" that the deal remained on track for passage this year.

"There's good support on both sides of the aisle," he said. "The issue now is just to get the bill on the calendar for a vote."

Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said Monday that the administration was "sorry" the Senate vote did not come off last week.

"We were really hoping it would be voted on," Mr. Burns said in an interview with reporters and editors at The Washington Times. He described the nuclear pact as key to the burgeoning relationship between Washington and New Delhi, strongly backed by President Bush.

The agreement struck by Mr. Bush and Indian Prime Minister Manmohan Singh in July 2005 would end a U.S. ban on nuclear trade and cooperation with India, which has not signed the international treaty on nuclear nonproliferation. India, in turn, would open its nonmilitary nuclear sites to international inspection for the first time.

The House passed its version of the bill in July. Even if the Senate votes in the lame-duck session, lawmakers still must reconcile the differing House and Senate versions of the bill.

Failure to send the bill to the White House before the end of the year would mean the new Congress elected in November would have to start the process from the beginning next year.

Supporters such as Mr. Puri argue that the agreement could cement ties with an emerging South Asian economic and military power, while opening the way to billions of dollars in business for U.S. firms. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce also has lobbied energetically in support of the accord.

But opponents say the deal would blow a huge hole in efforts to contain nuclear weapons, spur a South Asian arms race and undermine U.S. efforts to rally support against the nuclear programs of Iran and other adversaries.

Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, Tennessee Republican, said last week that Senate Democrats had failed to agree to an expedited debate on the bill in the closing days of the regular session. But Capitol Hill staffers said part of the delay was due to reservations by Republican lawmakers over an unrelated provision added to the bill regarding U.S. obligations to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

DOJ_NMG_0076613

The delay has drawn criticism in India, where opposition groups say the Singh government gave up too much to secure the deal with Washington.

Moscow Trumps West In Battle For Clout In Former Soviet States (WSJ)

By Marc Champion And Guy Chazan

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

In the struggle over influence, energy and the spread of democracy in its former empire, Moscow has scored big gains and is taking off the gloves at a time when the West is increasingly preoccupied.

Russia imposed a trade and transport embargo to pressure the pro-Western government in neighboring Georgia this week akin to the U.S. embargo on Cuba, following a nasty espionage dispute between the former Soviet states. The move laid bare the Kremlin's determination to reassert itself in what Russians call their "near abroad."

When Georgia's arrest of four Russian military officers on spy charges came up during a presidential phone call Monday, Vladimir Putin's message to George W. Bush was: Don't interfere.

Hosting Russian minorities and pipelines taking Siberian and Caspian Sea oil and gas to markets in the West, the former Soviet region has become the front line of conflict between an increasingly assertive Russia and the West. The Kremlin appears to have read the spy dispute as a sign that the West's willingness to intervene for Georgia is limited.

Just two years ago, it looked like Russia was losing its grip over what had been part of its empire for centuries. U.S. troops were based across energy-rich Central Asia, where Moscow was struggling to rebuild its influence. Pro-Western governments had swept to power in Georgia and Ukraine, emboldening the White House to talk about a wave of democratic change sweeping the region. Russian officials blamed the U.S. for orchestrating the revolutions and worried openly that Washington had similar plans to install a friendlier government in Moscow.

Since then, the most important of the uprisings, Ukraine's Orange revolution, has seen its leaders become mired in infighting, opening the way for the appointment of an openly pro-Russian prime minister in August. Last month, he said Ukraine was putting its NATO membership bid on hold. Central Asian governments that had sought to play the West off against Moscow have largely shifted into the Russian camp, ousting U.S. military bases and tightening security and other ties to Moscow. This year, Russia secured long-term contracts to purchase Central Asian gas, tightening its control over the supply to Europe.

The turning point in Central Asia came in May 2005, when Uzbekistan's government killed hundreds of protesters in Andijan. Criticized by the U.S., the Uzbek government turned to Moscow, which concurred that it had faced a terrorist threat. Uzbekistan then kicked U.S. troops out of a military base established to support the war in Afghanistan. This summer, it joined the Russian-led Collective Security Treaty Organization. Next door, Kyrgyzstan -- where the so-called Tulip Revolution toppled the government last year -- yesterday wound up joint military antiterrorist exercises with Russia. The U.S. still runs a military base in Kyrgyzstan, but the rent it pays increased sharply this year.

As Moscow has reasserted its influence in a region the Kremlin openly refers to as its backyard, the West's willingness to confront Russia over these issues has waned. Preoccupied with problems in Iraq, Washington also needs Russia's support on critical priorities such as moving to control Iran's nuclear program. Key European countries, many heavily dependent on Russian natural gas for energy, are reluctant to pick fights with Moscow.

Georgian President Mikheil Saakashvili has emerged as the most-conspicuous exception to the Russian tide in the region. The U.S.-educated lawyer has stuck to his pro-Western policies and anti-Russian rhetoric, despite Moscow's steadily increasing pressure on his government. His commitment to pull Georgia out of Russia's orbit and into Western institutions such as the North Atlantic Treaty Organization has made him a favorite in the White House. But at a time of rising assertiveness and national pride in Russia, it has also made him a figure of hate across the border.

"This is not about Russia's conflict with Georgia, but with the West in general. It's hard to strike at the West, but Georgia is in reach," Mr. Saakashvili said in an interview Wednesday.

Mr. Saakashvili says he believes that if push comes to shove, Western capitals will back him because "core Western values are at stake in Georgia."

But both U.S. and European officials have been trying to hold Mr. Saakashvili back from further actions that could provoke Moscow and precipitate a crisis, diplomats say.

"Europe's reliance on Russian energy has given the Kremlin the confidence to risk trying to restore its status in the post-Soviet space," says Dmitry Rogozin, an influential Russian nationalist lawmaker. "Putin knows that Europe won't want to have an argument with Russia over Georgia."

Moscow's determination to make a showcase of Georgia and demonstrate the cost of defiance to its neighbors came through clearly when Russia imposed sanctions even after Georgia returned the detained servicemen under Western pressure.

"They knew from the very first moment that we would hand the soldiers over," said Mr. Saakashvili. A Western diplomat familiar with the matter confirmed that Russia was informed last Friday the soldiers would be returned. Georgia, Mr. Saakashvili added, had arrested others Russians on spying charges before and quickly handed them over, though without going public. "It looks like for months they had been looking for an excuse to do something" to Georgia, he said.

When Mr. Bush called his Russian counterpart to talk about the latest diplomatic moves on Iran, Mr. Putin brought up the Georgia dispute. Washington had hoped that with the immediate cause of the tensions resolved, both sides would step back and find ways to ease their differences, according to American officials.

Mr. Putin, however, had a different message for Mr. Bush. A terse Kremlin statement after the meeting said he had underlined "the unacceptability and danger of any actions by third nations that could be interpreted by the Georgian leadership as an encouragement of its destructive policy."

Within hours Moscow was tightening the screws. It announced it was cutting off all flights, trains, shipping, roads and postal links to Georgia, which has a population of about 4.7 million. Since then, it has closed down Georgian-owned businesses, including a popular Moscow casino, and imposed restrictions on visas for Georgians. Parliament this week will consider a bill preventing Georgians making bank transfers to relatives back home. That could prove a powerful blow, because hundreds of thousands of Georgians rely on the transfers.

Russian officials have given no indication when they might ease the restrictions, insisting Georgia take a more deferential line. "Russia does not want to be provoked. Russia wants to be respected," deputy foreign minister Alexander Yakovenko said yesterday. "Russia wants the anti-Russian campaign to stop."

But the pressure could escalate much further. At a meeting with Russian parliamentary leaders in the Kremlin Wednesday, Mr. Putin discussed the possibility of Russia recognizing the independence of South Ossetia and Abkhazia, two areas of Georgia controlled by Russian-backed separatists since the early 1990s.

"I think we'll do it by the end of the year," said Sergei Baburin, a nationalist lawmaker who is deputy speaker of the Russian Parliament, and who took part in the Kremlin meeting. "If NATO wants Georgia at any price, then it can have it without Abkhazia and South Ossetia."

Some observers worry the confrontation could even lead to war, although both Georgian and Russian officials say that is highly unlikely and there are numerous pressures to deter it -- including U.S. influence over Mr. Saakashvili.

"There is a growing problem, with no real attempt at negotiations. The border is closed, there are trade embargoes, blockades. All this leads to war. There are clear military objectives on both sides," said Pavel Felgenhauer, a Moscow military analyst, naming the Russian objective as regime change, and the Georgian as retrieving Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

Mr. Felgenhauer described Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov's suggestion this week that Russia would accelerate the withdrawal of some troops still based in Georgia -- but outside the enclaves -- as a worrisome sign. "Those troops aren't assets, but liabilities, potential hostages. You want to get them out before any conflict," he said.

Mr. Saakashvili said he is now trying to avoid doing or saying anything that could be seen as a provocation of Russia, something he hasn't always succeeded with. He said he is focusing on local elections, which took place yesterday and could prove a referendum on his popularity. And he opened two big new hospitals, one of them a teaching facility in Tbilisi, the capital. The language of the curriculum is English; it used to be Russian.

New Indonesia Calamity, A Mud Bath, Is Man-Made (NYT)

By Raymond Bonner And Muktita Suhartono

The New York Times, October 6, 2006

KEDUNGBENDO, Indonesia, Oct. 5 — It started as a natural gas well. It has become geysers of mud and water, and in a country plagued by earthquakes, volcanoes and tsunamis another calamity in the making, though this one is largely man-made.

Eight villages are completely or partly submerged, with homes and more than 20 factories buried to the rooftops. Some 13,000 people have been evacuated. The four-lane highway west of here has been cut in two, as has the rail line, dealing a serious blow to the economy of this region in East Java, an area vital to the country's economy. The muck has already inundated an area covering one and a half square miles.

And it shows no signs of stopping.

The mud is rising by the hour, and now spewing forth at the rate of about 170,000 cubic yards a day, or about enough to cover Central Park.

Foreign companies, environmental groups and political observers are now watching closely to see whether the government will hold the company that drilled the well accountable for the costs of the cleanup, which could easily reach $1 billion.

The company is part of a conglomerate controlled by Aburizal Bakrie, a cabinet member and billionaire who was a major contributor to the campaign of President Susilo Bambang Yudhoyono.

The disaster occurred as the company, Lapindo Brantas, drilled thousands of feet to tap natural gas and used practices that geologists, mining engineers and Indonesian officials described as faulty.

But as the liabilities have escalated, Lapindo was sold — for $2 — last month to an offshore company, owned by the Bakrie Group, and many fear it will declare bankruptcy, allowing its owners to walk away.

Mr. Bakrie declined to be interviewed. A spokeswoman for Lapindo, Yunawati Teryana, said that it was too early to conclude that Lapindo had acted negligently. She noted that some geologists had said this was a natural disaster, a natural mud volcano, perhaps set off by seismic activity in the area.

Government officials and company engineers are not hopeful that they can contain the problem. In what Indonesian officials describe as the best of the worst options, the government plans to pump the mud into the Porong River, which flows into the sea 20 miles north of here.

"It will be the death of the ecosystem around that area," said Amien Widodo, an environmental geologist who teaches at the November 10 Institute of Technology in Surabaya. There is debate whether the mud is toxic. But the sheer volume alone will smother just about everything in its path, he said.

The area's commerce has already been devastated.

"We are angry because we were living comfortably in our own home and now we are forced to leave," Reni Matakupan said as she stood here looking across 200 yards of mud at her family's factory, DeBrima, which was filling with mud.

The problems began in late May when the company had reached about 9,000 feet, Mr. Widodo said. It continued to drill to this depth even though it had not installed what is known as a casing around the well to the levels required under Indonesian mining regulations, and good mining practices, he said.

The company experienced problems with the drilling that led to a loss of pressure in the well. That is when the mud started seeping in from the sides of the unprotected well bore, at a depth of about 6,000 feet.

The mud was stopped by cement plugs that the company had inserted into the well hole. The mud then sought other avenues of escape, eventually breaking through the earth, and creating mud volcanoes in several places that resemble the geysers of Yellowstone.

If the proper casing had been in place, the mud would not have entered the well, Mr. Widodo said, and would not have discovered these other avenues to the surface, a conclusion supported by mining engineers. Several Western and Indonesian mining engineers spoke about the matter, some offering graphs and mining details that have not been made public, but only on the condition that they not be identified, for fear of running afoul of Mr. Bakrie, the billionaire company owner.

So far there does not appear to be any government investigation into what set off the mud eruptions. After the first eruptions, in late May, the police in Sidoarjo, the district at the center of the disaster, began an investigation, but it appears to have languished. "I am not confident that anyone will ever be prosecuted," said H. Win Hendrarso, the regent for Sidoarjo, choosing his words carefully. In an interview in his high-ceilinged office, Mr. Hendrarso, who was elected a year ago, said he had no authority to investigate. Any investigations would have to be by the central government in Jakarta, he said. He added that he was not aware of any.

"I just want Lapindo to take responsibility," he said.

But Lapindo no longer exists, and the company to which it has been sold may not have any assets.

Last month, Lapindo's parent company announced that it was selling Lapindo for $2 to Lyte Ltd., a company that is registered in the offshore island of Jersey. The majority shareholder in the parent company is the Bakrie Group, and the Bakrie Group is also the sole owner of Lyte, according to public documents.

Lapindo's parent company, Energi Mega Persada, had said in an official securities filing that it was selling Lapindo because of the huge costs it faced in cleaning up after the mud flow, and it was better to use its assets for its other oil and gas projects.

An Energi spokesman, Herwin Hidayat, said the Bakrie Group remained committed to cleaning up the mud, through Lyte. He declined to say what assets Lyte had, if any. He said it was a "functioning company." He declined to give any examples of any business that it had done.

A concern now is whether Lyte, which has been renamed Bakrie Oil & Gas, will declare bankruptcy, which seems almost inevitable.

"That's what I'm afraid of," said Mr. Hendrarso, the senior elected executive official in Sidoarjo, the district that is at the center of the mud disaster. If the Bakrie Group does not pay, the Indonesia government will be left with the bill, government officials said.

Dutch Hospital Plans For Muslims Only (WT)

By David Rennie, London Daily Telegraph

DOJ_NMG_0076616

The Washington Times, October 6, 2006

BRUSSELS -- Plans for a Muslim-only hospital in the Netherlands have sparked a heated debate over its separate all-male and all-female wings, halal food and roster of duty imams.

A populist nationalist party described the plan for the clinic in south Rotterdam as "a step backwards to the Middle Ages."

The sexes will be segregated, with male patients treated by an exclusively male nursing and medical staff and similar arrangements for female patients.

The Netherlands' once proud multicultural model, which promoted tolerance of a rapidly growing immigrant population, has been questioned in recent years, especially after the slaying of filmmaker Theo van Gogh by an Islamist.

It is the brainchild of a health industry entrepreneur, Paul Sturkenboom, who plans to employ 45 doctors and 275 nurses. Staff will not have to be Muslims.

The plan has been attacked by the Rotterdam-based Leefbaar Rotterdam, or "Liveable Rotterdam" party, which controlled the local council until March.

Last month, the party unsuccessfully tried to have the hospital banned.

Mr. Sturkenboom defended his project.

"If Mr. Wilders is saying in a xenophobic way that this will prohibit integration of Muslim Dutch citizens, we just point to the fact that 20 or 30 years ago, Jewish, Roman Catholic and Protestant Dutch people had their own schools, their own hospitals, their own trade unions and employers' organizations" he said.

"That autonomy helped those people integrate at their own speed into Dutch society. This compact hospital will give Muslims time to integrate at their own speed."

He said that 40 of the 100 hospitals in the Netherlands were run by Catholic or Protestant foundations.

Mr. van Gogh, a relative of the famous painter Vincent Van Gogh, was killed in November 2004 while bicycling to work in Amsterdam after a film on Muslim women he had produced angered Islamist militants.

Ayaan Hirsi Ali, a Somali-born Dutch politician known for her outspoken criticism of Islam, partnered with Mr. van Gogh on the film. She went into hiding after Mr. van Gogh's murder and returned to parliament several months later. She still lives under heavy guard and is working on a sequel to the film she made with Mr. van Gogh, on Islam's treatment of homosexuality.

Another Dutch anti-immigration politician lived in a maximum-security prison to protect himself from attack owing to his criticism of radical Islam.

Geert Wilders went into hiding after the van Gogh killing and the subsequent arrest of a group of suspected radical Islamists who are accused of plotting to kill him and other prominent politicians.

"It feels like being trapped and the word freedom has become a totally different concept for me," Mr. Wilders said in an interview in the Dutch parliament, where he returned to work in December 2004.

Mr. Wilders is seen as an heir to populist anti-immigration politician Pim Fortuyn, who was killed in Rotterdam by an animal rights activist.

Hong Kong Wrong (WSJ)

By Milton Friedman

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

It had to happen. Hong Kong's policy of "positive noninterventionism" was too good to last. It went against all the instincts of government officials, paid to spend other people's money and meddle in other people's affairs. That's why it was sadly unsurprising to see Hong Kong's current leader, Donald Tsang, last month declare the death of the policy on which the territory's prosperity was built.

The really amazing phenomenon is that, for half a century, his predecessors resisted the temptation to tax and meddle. Though a colony of socialist Britain, Hong Kong followed a laissez-faire capitalist policy, thanks largely to a British civil servant, John Cowperthwaite. Assigned to handle Hong Kong's financial affairs in 1945, he rose through the ranks to become the territory's financial secretary from 1961-71. Cowperthwaite, who died on Jan. 21 this year, was so famously laissez-faire that he refused to collect economic statistics for fear this would only give government officials an excuse for more meddling. His successor, Sir Philip Haddon-Cave, coined the term "positive noninterventionism" to describe Cowperthwaite's approach.

The results of his policy were remarkable. At the end of World War II, Hong Kong was a dirt-poor island with a per-capita income about one-quarter that of Britain's. By 1997, when sovereignty was transferred to China, its per-capita income was roughly equal to that of the departing colonial power, even though Britain had experienced sizable growth over the same period. That was a striking demonstration of the productivity of freedom, of what people can do when they are left free to pursue their own interests.

The success of laissez-faire in Hong Kong was a major factor in encouraging China and other countries to move away from centralized control toward greater reliance on private enterprise and the free market. As a result, they too have benefited from rapid economic growth. The ultimate fate of China depends, I believe, on whether it continues to move in Hong Kong's direction faster than Hong Kong moves in China's.

Mr. Tsang insists that he only wants the government to act "when there are obvious imperfections in the operation of the market mechanism." That ignores the reality that if there are any "obvious imperfections," the market will eliminate them long before Mr. Tsang gets around to it. Much more important are the "imperfections" -- obvious and not so obvious -- that will be introduced by overactive government.

A half-century of "positive noninterventionism" has made Hong Kong wealthy enough to absorb much abuse from ill-advised government intervention. Inertia alone should ensure that intervention remains limited. Despite the policy change, Hong Kong is likely to remain wealthy and prosperous for many years to come. But, although the territory may continue to grow, it will no longer be such a shining symbol of economic freedom.

Yet that doesn't detract from the scale of Cowperthwaite's achievement. Whatever happens to Hong Kong in the future, the experience of this past 50 years will continue to instruct and encourage friends of economic freedom. And it provides a lasting model of good economic policy for others who wish to bring similar prosperity to their people.

Sued In Singapore (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 6, 2006

Seems like old times. It's been a while since this newspaper or our sister publication, the Far Eastern Economic Review, has found itself in litigation in Singapore. Like virtually every other foreign publication that circulates there, we've had that dubious pleasure before, in actions brought by the government or by the city-state's famously litigious founding Prime Minister, now Minister Mentor, Lee Kuan Yew.

Review Publishing Co. and Editor Hugo Restall are now the subjects of defamation lawsuits brought by Mr. Lee and his dutiful son, Singapore Prime Minister Lee Hsien Loong. Review Publishing is a Hong Kong-based subsidiary of Dow Jones & Co., which publishes The Wall Street Journal.

In addition to being sued, the Review is also banned in Singapore per an edict by the Ministry of Information, Communications and the Arts handed down last week. It is now a criminal offense to subscribe to the Review or import or reproduce it for distribution. Starting with the October issue, which goes on sale everywhere else in Asia today, the Review will no longer circulate in Singapore.

Anyone with a passing understanding of how Singapore operates will understand that these two events -- the Lees' libel suits and the Ministry of Information's ban -- are no coincidence. In any event, the idea that a journal of opinion published 10 times a year in Hong Kong with a Singapore circulation of approximately 1,000 is interfering in the country's domestic politics -- the underlying basis for the ban -- is absurd. So, too, is the Singapore government's apparent belief that the free flow of information is not essential for a first-world economy. * * *

The offending column in the July issue of the Review was an interview Mr. Restall conducted with that rara avis in Singapore, an opposition politician. Chee Soon Juan criticized the Lees in the article, which also briefly mentioned the 2004 scandal at the country's largest charity, the National Kidney Foundation. "The scandal was a gift for the opposition," Mr. Restall wrote, "which naturally raised questions about why the government didn't do a better job of supervising the highly secretive NKF."

Mr. Restall reported Mr. Chee's view that the elder Mr. Lee is the man behind Singapore's suppression of dissent. "If we had parliamentary debates where the opposition could pry and ask questions, I think he [Mr. Lee] is actually afraid of something like that," he said.

Mr. Restall went on to raise several questions that are in the public interest, specifically having to do with the non-transparency of government institutions: "The government controls huge pools of public money in the Central Provident Fund and the Government of Singapore Investment Corp., both of which are highly nontransparent. It also controls spending on the public housing most Singaporeans live in, and openly used the funds for refurbishing apartment blocks as a bribe for districts that vote for the ruling party. Singaporeans have no way of knowing whether officials are abusing their trust as [NKF Chief Executive] Mr. Durai did."

The Review's editor also noted that "Singaporean officials have a remarkable record of success in winning libel suits against their critics." And he asked, "Are libel suits deliberately used as a tool to suppress questioning voices?"

These passages are the crux of paragraphs that the Lees allege are defamatory. Briefly, the Minister Mentor's lawsuit contends that the words "in their natural and ordinary meaning" mean "that the Plaintiff is unfit for office because he is corrupt and has set out to sue and suppress those who would question him as he fears such questions would expose his corruption." Similarly, the Prime Minister's pleading interprets the Review's article "to mean that the Plaintiff is unfit for office because. . . [he] has retained Minister Mentor Lee Kuan Yew, who is corrupt. . . ."

Huh? If English weren't an official language of Singapore, we'd wonder if something went missing in translation. The meaning the Lees allege is preposterous, all the more so given Singapore's justifiable reputation for efficient, clean government. We certainly don't believe -- nor do we think any reasonable reader of the Review would infer from the article -- that the Lees are personally corrupt.

Clearly, though, the Review article touched a defensive nerve. Last month a Singapore court ruled that Mr. Chee and his sister had defamed the Prime Minister and the Minister Mentor for linking the scandal at the National Kidney Foundation to the way the country is run. Three days later the World Bank issued its latest report on governance. "Singapore," the report says, "has one of the best rankings in the world on control of corruption, but it ranks in the middle of the pack on voice and accountability, below much poorer countries such as Brazil and Botswana."

Finally, let us turn our attention back to the publication ban and note another curious aspect of this case. The Lees' attorneys first wrote to the Review on July 13, indicating that their clients were contemplating bringing suit and demanding certain concessions, including damages. The Review has no assets in Singapore.

On August 3, the Ministry of Information announced changes in its interpretation and application of Singapore's Newspaper and Printing Presses Act, requiring the Review and four other international publications to appoint a local representative to accept service of legal process and to post a security deposit of S$200,000 ($126,000) that would be available to satisfy any legal judgments. The giveaway was that changes would be retrospective -- the money would go toward any damages obtained by the Ministers against the Review for the Chee interview.

How convenient. As the Review's counsel said in a letter to the Minister of Information on August 24, "the handling of this matter pointlessly exposes the Government of Singapore to the charge that it has acted in bad faith in altering the conditions regulating foreign publications because it will appear to have acted to benefit its two most powerful members." When the Review declined to comply with the retroactive regulations, it was banned.

As it happens, Singapore's Newspapers and Printing Presses Act does not cover the online version of the Review at www.feer.com1, where, the Review tells us, it will do its best to make its October issue available free of charge to Singaporeans. In addition -- and free to all readers -- the Review is posting the disputed article, the Lees' court pleadings and its correspondence with the Lees' attorneys and the Ministry of Information.

Among these documents is Appendix A to the Minister Mentor's lawsuit, which contains a list of defamation suits brought by the elder Mr. Lee and dating back to 1965. Socrates observed that old men are themselves, only more so, and we can only assume that Singapore will remain locked in its old ways until Mr. Lee passes from the scene.

Virtually every foreign publication that circulates in Singapore has faced the government's wrath at one time or another, starting with a contempt action against this newspaper in 1985, when Singapore's inferiority complex was perhaps more understandable. This is not the behavior of a prosperous, self-confident nation.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Documents: CIA Warned Of Plane Bomb Plot (MH)

By Andrew O. Selsky

The Miami Herald, October 10, 2006

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico - An anti-Castro militant now in a Texas jail warned the CIA months before the 1976 bombing of a Cuban airliner that fellow exiles were planning such an attack, according to a newly released U.S. government document.

The document shows that Luis Posada Carriles - who had worked for the CIA but was cut off by the agency earlier that year - was secretly telling the CIA that his fellow far-right Cuban exiles opposed to Fidel Castro's communist government were plotting to bring down a commercial jet.

The document does not say what the CIA did with Posada's tip. A CIA spokesman said he had no comment on Monday, a federal holiday.

The CIA had extensive contacts with anti-Castro militants and trained some of them, but has denied involvement in the bombing.

The documents were posted online Thursday by the National Security Archive, an independent research institute at George Washington University that seeks to declassify government files through the Freedom of Information Act.

The Cubana Airlines plane, on a flight from Venezuela to Cuba, blew up shortly after taking off from a stopover in Barbados on Oct. 6, 1976, killing all 73 aboard, including Cuba's Olympic fencing team.

The bombing remains an open wound in Cuba. Weeping relatives of the victims met in a Havana cemetery on Friday, the 30th anniversary of the bombing. They demanded that Posada - who is now 78 and in a Texas detention center on an immigration violation - be put on trial.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez is seeking the extradition of Posada, a naturalized Venezuelan who served as the country's counterintelligence chief. He accuses the U.S. government of protecting a terrorist.

The National Security Archive's Peter Kornbluh urged the U.S. government to tell everything it knows about Posada.

"Now is the time for the government to come clean on Posada's covert past and his involvement in international terrorism," Kornbluh said. "His victims, the public, and the courts have a right to know."

Separating deception from truth in the intelligence world is notoriously difficult, and the newly released documents contain mixed messages about Posada. Much remains murky.

In a report dated a month after the bombing, then FBI Director Clarence Kelly told Secretary of State Henry Kissinger that a confidential FBI source ascertained the bombing had been planned in Caracas by Posada, Venezuelan intelligence agency official Ricardo Morales Navarrete and Cuban exile Frank Castro, who is not related to the Cuban leader.

Two Venezuelan employees of Posada's private security agency were arrested in Trinidad the day after the bombing, and one of them - who said he had worked for the CIA - admitted the two had planted the bomb, documents posted by the National Security Archive show.

Posada trained with the CIA for the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion and served in the U.S. Army in the early 1960s. In 1965, he allegedly plotted to overthrow the Guatemalan government and blow up a Soviet or Cuban freighter in Mexico, according to the FBI. In 1967, he moved to Venezuela, eventually leading its counterintelligence agency, and was running his own security firm in the mid-1970s.

In 1973, Posada was investigated by the CIA for allegedly smuggling cocaine, but was cleared after he convinced interrogators he was "guilty of only having the wrong kind of friends," a declassified document says. The same document says the CIA "formally terminated" its relationship with him on Feb. 13, 1976.

Yet Posada still contacted the agency.

DOJ_NMG_0076626

"After 2/76 contacts with (deleted by censors) were at Posada's own initiative to volunteer information in exchange for assistance U.S. visa for self and family," said the document, an annotated list of still-secret records on Posada's CIA career that was marked "sanitized."

It tells how Posada contacted the CIA in February 1976 to describe an assassination plot by Orlando Bosch and Frank Castro, two fellow right-wing Cuban exiles, against leftist Andres Pascal Allende, the nephew of slain Chilean President Salvador Allende. Posada worried that his allies would discover he was giving up their secrets.

"Posada concerned that Bosch will blame Posada for leak of plans," the report says. Andres Allende was not assassinated, and it is unclear whether the Cuban exiles ever made an attempt on his life.

Then, four months later, Posada came back to tell of a sinister plot to blow up an airliner.

On June 22, 1976, "Posada again contacts (deleted by censor) reptd info concerning possible exile plans to blow up Cubana Airliner leaving Panama and requested visa assistacne," read the document, filled with typographical errors.

Shortly after, a bomb aboard a Cubana Airlines plane leaving Panama failed to detonate, and the following month, a bomb in a suitcase exploded before being loaded onto a Cubana plane leaving Jamaica, according to a confidential State Department memo previously posted by the National Security Archive.

The day after the Cubana Airlines flight was bombed near Barbados, the CIA tried unsuccessfully to contact Posada, according to the annotated list. Five days later, Posada was arrested in Venezuela. He denied involvement in the bombing and escaped from prison in 1985 before a civilian trial was completed.

Allegations that he masterminded mass murder did not keep U.S. covert operatives from hiring Posada again. Within months, he was delivering weapons to Nicaraguan Contra rebels in an illegal Reagan administration operation. Posada also acknowledged, and then denied, a role in Havana hotel bombings in 1997 that killed a tourist.

And in 2000, Posada was arrested for allegedly plotting to assassinate Castro during a summit in Panama. He was pardoned in 2004 by then Panamanian President Mireya Moscoso.

Posada was detained in Florida in May 2005 for entering the United States illegally. A U.S. immigration judge has ruled that he cannot be sent to Cuba or Venezuela, citing fears that he would be tortured.

Castro Foe Puts U.S. In An Awkward Spot (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

EL PASO, Oct. 6 — Thirty years ago, long before liquids and gels were restricted on airliners, a tube of Colgate toothpaste may have brought a plane down from the sky.

Cubana Airlines Flight 455 crashed off the coast of Barbados on Oct. 6, 1976, killing all 73 people aboard. Plastic explosives stuffed into a toothpaste tube ignited the plane, according to recently declassified police records.

Implicated in the attack, but never convicted, was Luis Posada Carriles, a Cuban exile who has long sought to topple the government of Fidel Castro.

Today, Mr. Posada, 78, is in a detention center in El Paso, held on an immigration violation while the government tries to figure out what to do with him. His case presents a quandary for the Bush administration, at least in part because Mr. Posada is a former C.I.A. operative and United States Army officer who directed his wrath at a government that Washington has long opposed.

Despite insistent calls from Cuba and Venezuela for his extradition, the administration has refused to send him to either country for trial.

Intensifying the problem is that Mr. Posada, who was arrested last year in Miami after sneaking into the country, may soon go free because the United States has been reluctant to press the terrorism charges that could keep him in jail.

That prospect has brought a hail of criticism of the Bush administration for holding a double standard when it comes to those who commit terrorist acts.

DOJ_NMG_0076627

"The fight against terrorism cannot be fought à la carte," said José Pertierra, a Washington lawyer who is representing the government of Venezuela in its effort to extradite Mr. Posada. "A terrorist is a terrorist."

The Bush administration has stopped short of prosecuting him as a terrorist, however, even though the Justice Department called him as much this week. In papers filed in federal court in El Paso on Thursday, it described him as "an unrepentant criminal and admitted mastermind of terrorist plots and attacks on tourist sites."

Instead, Mr. Posada faces immigration charges, as the Bush administration tries its best to deport him somewhere else, where he would walk free.

Few countries seem willing to take him. So far, Canada, Costa Rica, El Salvador, Guatemala, Honduras, Mexico and Panama have all turned down American requests to take Mr. Posada, who denies that he bombed the plane but who is linked to the case in declassified C.I.A. and F.B.I. files.

"Who would want him?" asked one lawyer close to the case, who spoke on the condition that he not be identified because of the delicacy of the litigation. "Wherever he goes there will be intelligence agents from a variety of nations following him, not to mention hit squads."

Two countries do want Mr. Posada: Venezuela, where he is wanted for blowing up the plane, and Cuba, where he is viewed as an enemy of the state who has repeatedly tried to assassinate Mr. Castro.

An immigration judge has ruled that Mr. Posada may be subject to torture in those two countries. But because no other country has stepped forward, and because he has not been officially deemed a terrorist by the American government, a federal judge recommended last month — coincidentally on Sept. 11 — that Mr. Posada be released.

The Bush administration is now invoking a law that bars the release of an illegal immigrant who poses adverse foreign policy consequences for the United States. That tack has placed it in the awkward position of, in effect, having to call Mr. Posada a terrorist even as it refuses to charge him as one.

Mr. Posada has longstanding links to American intelligence agencies, and his colorful past helps to explain why this is not a garden variety terrorism case. One immigration judge involved in the proceedings described them as being "not unlike one of Robert Ludlum's espionage thrillers."

A former sugar chemist and exterminator in Cuba, Mr. Posada has been working in the shadows to carry out a policy not unlike the one Washington has advocated over the decades — the removal of Mr. Castro.

"How can you call someone a terrorist who allegedly committed acts on your behalf?" asked Felipe D. J. Millan, Mr. Posada's El Paso-based lawyer. "This would be the equivalent of calling Patrick Henry or Paul Revere or Benjamin Franklin a terrorist."

Mr. Posada received military training in the United States and worked for the C.I.A. as far back as the failed Bay of Pigs invasion. He played a role in supplying the contras in Nicaragua. He has admitted, but subsequently denied, involvement in a string of bombings of Cuban tourist facilities.

By the time the Cubana Airlines plane exploded, Mr. Posada was no longer in the employ of the C.I.A. But records show that he may have notified his former bosses that a bomb was going to be set off on a plane shortly before it happened.

Venezuela and Cuba staged events on Friday, the 30th anniversary of the airplane bombing, where Mr. Bush was condemned for his government's failure to turn over Mr. Posada. A billboard posted outside the United States Interest Section in Havana features the image of Mr. Bush, Mr. Posada and Hitler.

Some of the anger directed at the Bush administration's handling of the case originates closer to home. Roseanne Nenninger Persaud, whose 19-year-old brother, Raymond, was one of the passengers who perished, recently wrote a letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales urging him to brand Mr. Posada a terrorist.

"It feels like a double standard," Ms. Nenninger, who was born in Guyana but has since become an American citizen, said in a telephone interview from New York. "He should be treated like bin Laden. If this were a plane full of Americans, it would have been a different story."

A majority of the victims were Cubans, including the entire Olympic fencing team, which was returning from a competition in Venezuela. Guyanese and North Koreans made up most of the other passengers.

DOJ_NMG_0076628

"Luis Posada Carriles is a terrorist, but he's our terrorist," said Peter Kornbluh of the National Security Archive at George Washington University, which has been unearthing documents on Mr. Posada's case. "The historical baggage that he brought with him when he sneaked into the U.S. has created this dilemma for the Bush administration."

Getting out of jail has not been a problem for Mr. Posada in the past. In Venezuela, where he was held in the prison bombing, he had associates bribe a guard and he walked out dressed as a priest in 1985. In Panama, where he was implicated in a plot to kill Mr. Castro during a visit there, the departing president pardoned him in 2004.

He appears headed for release again, this time from a nondescript holding center ringed by barbed wire near El Paso's airport.

Mr. Posada's cloak-and-dagger past — his aliases, his fake passports, his life on the run through Latin America — is over, insists his Miami-based lawyer, Eduardo R. Soto.

In fact, even before Mr. Castro fell ill and ceded power to his brother, Mr. Posada declared his campaign to topple the Cuban leader by force to be over.

"The Cuban government is in a very deteriorated condition, inexorably reaching its end, and I sincerely believe that nothing would help to go back to the past with sabotage campaigns," Mr. Posada said.

Mr. Posada's case has eerie parallels with the case of Orlando Bosch, an associate who has also been accused of playing a role in the bombing. The administration of Mr. Bush's father released Mr. Bosch from prison in 1990, a step praised by many in Florida's Cuban community. Now 80, he lives outside Miami.

Mr. Posada is two years younger and in failing health, partly the result of a 1990 assassination attempt against him. His application to become a United States citizen has been rejected by the government, but Mr. Posada, who is a naturalized Venezuelan citizen, is pursuing the matter on appeal.

Mr. Soto says Mr. Posada wants to devote whatever time he has left in life to members of his family who live in South Florida, and to a hobby he picked up years ago in prison — painting.

Way Radical, Dude (WP)

Now Playing: Video Games With an Islamist Twist

A new video game lets players kill President Bush. It's called "Quest for Bush." It looks a lot like a game that hit the market three years ago, called "Quest for Saddam."

In the venerable shoot-'em-up genre, who's the hero and who's the enemy depends on who's programming the game.

"Quest for Bush," a.k.a. "Night of Bush Capturing," is a free online game released by the Global Islamic Media Front, a radical organization that has ties with al-Qaeda. Armed with a rifle, a shotgun or a grenade launcher, players navigate various missions that include "Jihad Growing Up," "Americans' Hell" and "Bush Hunted Like a Rat." In the final stage, you fight Bush.

It's the latest -- and most extreme -- addition to a small but growing list of Islamic video games, monitored by the Defense Department and much blogged about in gaming circles. Some are free, others are not. Either way, they champion issues from an Islamic perspective, in stark contrast to many Western-made games that generally cast Muslims and Arabs as the bad guys. Furthermore, they underscore a brewing game-design war between East and West, a simmering tension of who's writing (and rewriting) history.

"There's a very interesting tit-for-tat going on here, a weird kind of dialogue," says Ed Halter, author of the book "From Sun Tzu to Xbox: War and Video Games," published in May, and a contributing writer for the Village Voice. "And what's disconcerting about it is that the conversation is often reduced to the lowest common denominator of violent action in games, which is in a way very reflective of the overall way things are going right now in real life."

Radwan Kasmiya, a 31-year-old gamer, can't stand titles such as "Counter-Strike," "Close Combat: First to Fight" and "America's Army," the free online game -- with more than 7.5 million users -- released in 2002 by the U.S. Army to help bolster recruitment.

"We're the terrorist, the enemy, in these games," says Kasmiya. He runs the Syria-based Afkar Media, one of a handful of struggling commercial game publishers in the Islamic world. Speaking on the phone from his Damascus office, he's quick to distinguish his games from "Quest for Bush," which has been downloaded a few thousand times on the Internet. Two clips on the video-sharing site YouTube.com have been viewed nearly 11,000 times. "Nothing but propaganda," he says of that game. He's played it, he says, and calls it "hateful."

"UnderAsh," released by Afkar Media in 2002, views the first intifada from the eyes of Ahmad, a Palestinian teenager resisting the Israeli occupation. Last year a sequel was released. A teaser to "UnderSiege," which tells the stories of five Palestinian families during the second intifada, shows a Palestinian teenager being shot on the street; an Israeli soldier appears to pound him with a concrete block seconds later. "Our games are not propaganda," Kasmiya says. "Our games are a reflection of our history -- past or present. The fact is, most movies, most TV shows, most video games put Muslims in a bad light, so we have to try to tell our side of the story."

Retired Maj. Chris Chambers, deputy director of the Army Game Project, insists "America's Army" doesn't "pick on a single enemy." The country is at war, he says, and the terrorists depicted in "America's Army" come from "all over the world," including the Middle East. "There's no focus on one particular region or one particular people," says Chambers, who helped design the game.

But as with anything, people are free to interpret the game any way they want, he adds.

One of the first Islamic games to gain attention in the Middle East is a free online game called "The Stone Throwers," says Halter. It was created by a Syrian medical student and released in 2000, weeks after the start of the second intifada. According to its Web site, the game is "dedicated to those who lost their lives for the homeland and all those who are fighting for freedom." Other game publishers such as Techniat 3D and Imaginations -- the former based in Syria, the latter in the United Arab Emirates -- developed fantasy-based adventure games such as "Zoya" and "Legend of Zord." But both companies folded in the past five years, unable to find a sizable audience in the Middle East, where piracy is commonplace and U.S.-made games are popular, Kasmiya says. None of these games -- free or not -- have been purchased or downloaded "more than a few thousand times," he adds.

The Washington-based Middle East Media Research Institute, a nonpartisan group that translates Arabic language television and Web sites, says that in June, Sheik Nabil Al-Awadhi, who has a weekly show on the Kuwaiti channel Al-Rai TV called "Sa'at Saraha" ("An Hour of Sincerity"), spoke of the need for Islamic games that compete with Western games. He also suggested developing a game in which the Muslim player "slaughters the Jews and liberates the Al-Aqsa Mosque." In the West, they turn their wars against Muslims into games, he said, and Muslims should do the same.

Dennis McCauley, who runs the blog Gamepolitics.com, says: "There is a game design war taking place, at least in the sense that today's games are a mass communications vehicle for reaching young people. The Defense Department distributes 'America's Army' for free as both a recruiting tool and a way to market the image of our armed forces. The game is hugely popular. It's no surprise that Islamic extremists are trying to achieve the same goal and imitate that success."

This past summer, the Union of Islamic Student Societies, an Iranian political group, announced that it was developing a game -- as a retort to a U.S.-made game. Last year, the New York-based Kuma Games released a free online game called "Assault on Iran," in which players take on the role of a U.S. Special Forces soldier trying to destroy Iran's nukes. In the Iranian group's game, set for release this March, a fictional "Commander Bahman" fights U.S. Special Forces and rescues Iranian atomic scientists. In response to that response, Keith Halper, head of Kuma Games, said his company will create a sequel to the Iranian-made game from the United States' point of view.

"It's propaganda, but it's also a form of debate," Halper says. "We have made a point, they have responded."

The gunplay in "Quest for Bush" is crude, akin to "Doom," the godfather of shoot-'em-up games. The goal is to kill. It's in English and Arabic and takes about 30 minutes to play. In the beginning, the player goes around what looks like a U.S. military camp, with walls plastered with photos of President Bush, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld and British Prime Minister Tony Blair, among others.

"Quest for Bush" is a "mod"-- or modification -- of "Quest for Saddam," released by the California-based Petrilla Entertainment in 2003 for $14.95. The company sold about 3,000 copies of the game.

DOJ_NMG_0076630

"They say imitation is the highest form of flattery. But I'm not flattered," says Jesse Petrilla, who created "Quest for Saddam." Last year he founded the United American Committee, a political action group that has used techniques such as hanging Osama bin Laden in effigy in front of a mosque in Culver City, Calif. He says his group seeks to remind Americans of "the threat that radical Islam poses to all of us."

His latest response in this gaming war, says the 23-year-old, is to make "Quest for Saddam" free for players.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Treasury Weighs Broader Scrutiny Of Wire Transfers (WSJ)

By Damian Paletta

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Treasury Department, amid a backdrop of industry protests, is considering whether to require banks and other financial companies that allow international wire transfers to give the government data on about 500 million transactions each year.

Financial institutions are required to retain some of this information, but the government requests it only in specific circumstances. The financial institutions complain it isn't clear whether regulators are effectively analyzing this information and other records they already provide.

A senior Treasury Department official said he has asked Secretary Henry Paulson to approve the massive new data-collection regime. More than a year ago, the Treasury Department's Financial Crimes Enforcement Network began reviewing whether such a data-collection exercise would be feasible in preventing and tracking money laundering and terrorist financing.

Robert Werner, director of the Financial Crimes Enforcement Network, said his agency has sent the review on to Treasury Department officials and is waiting for a determination from Mr. Paulson. "Based on the work we've done, it's clear there is value" in this information, Mr. Werner said after a speech to the American Bankers Association. "The money trail is just going to be that much more robust."

The banking industry has objected to the planned data-collection regime. Now, banks and wire-transfer companies have to retain wire-transfer information only in case the government asks for it later. The new program would require companies to directly send information about each wire transfer to the government.

Mr. Werner said any program would take into account complaints registered by the banking industry. Specifically, banks have said that a massive government program could make it difficult to protect the privacy of each wire-transfer customer. It also could become costly for banks to comply with such a program, the banking industry has said.

"Our feasibility study will outline these issues and propose an approach for addressing them," Mr. Werner said.

An announcement from the Treasury Department regarding the program could come in the next few weeks.

Mr. Werner said the proposed program would be different from an existing program that allows the government to monitor thousands of wire transfers for links to terrorism through a database in Belgium, known as Swift.

Homeland Security Bill Helps 9/11 Lawsuits (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

A little-noticed provision of the Homeland Security Appropriations Act signed by the president last week will help move forward a multibillion-dollar September 11 lawsuit against two U.S. airlines by making it easier for plaintiffs to get restricted information about the nation's pre-attack aviation security system.

Section 525 of the conference report that is part of the law, instructs Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to draft within 30 days new regulations for the system of sensitive security information, or SSI, administered by the Transportation Security Administration (TSA).

The regulations, says the report, should provide for the release of most SSI more than three years old, unless the information is still current or the secretary makes a written determination that it must stay protected. To do so, he must provide "a rational reason," which will "identify and describe the specific risk to the national transportation system."

The regulations should also include a mechanism for SSI to be made available in civil court cases if the judge determines it is needed and if the party needing it cannot get it elsewhere without "undue hardship." The lawmakers say they "expect that a party will be able to demonstrate undue hardship to the judge if equivalent information is not available in one month's time."

To get access to the information, plaintiff's lawyers will have to pass a background check of criminal and terrorism-suspect watchlists like that any aviation worker with access to the information would require, according to the report. The language still allows officials to block the court's access to SSI, if they can "demonstrate" that it "presents a risk of harm to the nation."

The new law instructs Mr. Chertoff to report back to the Appropriations committees within 120 days on his compliance.

The provision was welcomed by relatives of victims of the September 11 attacks. Family members who support the lawsuits have long contended that the TSA is using restrictions on information to hide the culpability of the airlines and the federal authorities.

"We call on TSA to comply fully with both the letter and the spirit of this new law," said Alice Hoagland, mother of Mark Bingham.

Her son was one of the United Airlines Flight 93 passengers who stormed the cockpit, preventing the hijackers from striking their intended target -- thought to have been either the White House or the Capitol.

"This is information about a defunct aviation system," said former Federal Aviation Administration Special Agent Brian Sullivan of the documents that TSA is trying to protect. He accused officials of "protecting the FAA from embarrassment and the airlines from liability."

About 60 cases in which relatives of the victims of the September 11 attacks are suing United and American Airlines have been consolidated in the U.S. District Court of New York. The plaintiffs say the airlines' negligence allowed the attackers to board with the short knives and box cutters used in the attacks.

WAR NEWS:

G.O.P.'s Baker Hints Iraq Plan Needs Change (NYT)

By David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8 — James A. Baker III, the Republican co-chairman of a bipartisan panel reassessing Iraq strategy for President Bush, said Sunday that he expected the panel would depart from Mr. Bush's repeated calls to "stay the course," and he strongly suggested that the White House enter direct talks with countries it had so far kept at arm's length, including Iran and Syria.

"I believe in talking to your enemies," he said in an interview on the ABC News program "This Week," noting that he made 15 trips to Damascus, the Syrian capital, while serving Mr. Bush's father as secretary of state.

"It's got to be hard-nosed, it's got to be determined," Mr. Baker said. "You don't give away anything, but in my view, it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

Mr. Bush refused to deal with Iran until this spring, when he said the United States would join negotiations with Tehran if it suspended enriching nuclear fuel. Iran has so far refused. Contacts with both Syria and North Korea have also been sharply limited.

But the "Iraq Study Group," created by Mr. Baker last March with the encouragement of some members of Congress to come up with new ideas on Iraq strategy, has already talked to some representatives of Iran and Syria about Iraq's future, he said.

His comments Sunday offered the first glimmer of what other members of his study group, in interviews over the past two weeks, have described as an effort to find a politically face-saving way for Mr. Bush slowly to extract the United States from the war. "I think it's fair to say our commission believes that there are alternatives between the stated alternatives, the ones that are out there in the political debate, of 'stay the course' and 'cut and run,' " Mr. Baker said.

He explicitly rejected a rapid withdrawal from Iraq, saying that would invite Iran, Syria and "even our friends in the gulf" to fill the power vacuum. He also dismissed, as largely unworkable, a proposal by Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., the ranking Democrat on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, to decentralize Iraq and give the country's three major sectarian groups, the Kurds, Shiites and Sunnis, their own regions, distributing oil revenue to all. Mr. Baker said he had concluded "there's no way to draw lines" in Iraq's major cities, where ethnic groups are intermingled.

According to White House officials and commission members, Mr. Baker has been talking to President Bush and his national security adviser, Stephen J. Hadley, on a regular basis. Those colleagues say he is unlikely to issue suggestions that the president has not tacitly approved in advance.

"He's a very loyal Republican, and you won't see him go against Bush," said a colleague of Mr. Baker, who asked not to be identified because the study group is keeping a low profile before it formally issues recommendations. "But he feels that the yearning for some responsible way out which would not damage American interests is palpable, and the frustration level is exceedingly high."

At 76, Mr. Baker still enjoys a reputation as one of Washington's craftiest bureaucratic operators and as a trusted adviser of the Bush family, which has enlisted his help for some of its deepest crises, including the second President Bush's effort to win the vote recount in Florida after the 2000 presidential election. Mr. Baker served as White House chief of staff, as well as secretary of state under the first President Bush.

Andrew H. Card Jr., President Bush's former chief of staff, acknowledged recently that he had twice suggested that Mr. Baker would be a good replacement for Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld. Mr. Bush rejected that advice, and some associates of Mr. Baker say they do not believe he is interested, at his age, in taking the job, which could put him in the position of having to carry out his group's advice.

Those proposals — which he has said must be both bipartisan and unanimous — could very well give Mr. Bush some political latitude, should he decide to adopt strategies that he had once rejected, like setting deadlines for a phased withdrawal of American forces.

Given his extraordinary loyalty to the Bush family — Mr. Baker was present on Saturday at the formal christening of a new aircraft carrier named for the first President Bush — it was notable on Sunday that Mr. Baker also joined the growing number of Republicans who are trying to create some space between themselves and the White House.

On Sunday, on "This Week," Mr. Baker was shown a video of the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, who said last week that Iraq was "drifting sideways" and urged consideration of a "change of course" if the Iraqi government could not restore order in two or three months. The American ambassador to Iraq, Zalmay Khalilzad, has offered a similar warning to the Iraqi government.

Asked if he agreed with that timetable, Mr. Baker said, "Yes, absolutely. And we're taking a look at other alternatives."

The Iraq Study Group, created with the reluctant blessing of the White House, includes notable Republicans and Democrats, among them William J. Perry, a former defense secretary under President Clinton; former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York; the former Supreme Court justice Sandra Day O'Connor; and Vernon E. Jordan Jr., a longtime civil rights leader. Mr. Baker's Democratic co-chairman is Lee H. Hamilton, the former Congressman who once served as the chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Committee and was co-chairman of the 9/11 commission.

In interviews, members of the study group have privately expressed concern that within months, whatever course the group recommended could be overtaken by the chaos in Iraq. "I think the big question is whether we can come up with something before it's too late," one member said late last month, after the group had met in Washington to assess its conclusions after a trip to Baghdad. "There's a real sense that the clock is ticking, that Bush is desperate for a change, but no one in the White House can bring themselves to say so with this election coming."

Like other members, he declined to speak on the record, saying public comments should come only from Mr. Baker or Mr. Hamilton.

Several members said they were struck during their visit to Baghdad by how many Americans based there — political and intelligence officers as well as members of the military — said they feared that the United States was stuck between two bad alternatives: pulling back and watching sectarian violence soar, or remaining a crucial part of the new effort to secure Baghdad, at the cost of much higher American casualties.

It was a measure of how much the situation had deteriorated that only one member of the group, former Senator Charles S. Robb of Virginia, ventured beyond the protected walls of the Green Zone, the American and government center of Baghdad. The study group is just now finishing its interviews, and Mr. Baker has not yet begun to draft the report, members said.

Some who have already met with the group, like Mr. Biden, who may seek the Democratic nomination for president, have emerged saying they think their ideas are being heard. On Friday, Mr. Biden said he thought he saw "heads nodding up and down" about his ideas on creating autonomous regions of the country, but Mr. Baker made clear on Sunday that he was not among them.

"Experts on Iraq have suggested that, if we do that, that in itself will trigger a huge civil war because the major cities in Iraq are mixed," Mr. Baker said.

Mr. Baker has been critical of how the Bush administration conducted post-invasion operations, and he has not backed away from statements he made in his 1995 memoir, in which he described opposing the ouster of Saddam Hussein after the Persian Gulf war in 1991. In the book, he said he feared that such action might lead to a civil war, "even if Saddam were captured and his regime toppled, American forces would still be confronted with the specter of a military occupation of indefinite duration to pacify the country and sustain a new government."

On Sunday, the interviewer, George Stephanopoulos, said, "It's exactly what's happened now, isn't it?" Mr. Baker replied, "A lot of it."

Baker Predicts 'Civil War' If Iraq Divided (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

Iraq Study Group co-chairman James A. Baker III yesterday denied reports suggesting that his government-advisory group would recommend breaking up Iraq along ethnic lines, saying such a move could "trigger a huge civil war."

At the same time, Mr. Baker, who was secretary of state during the 1990-91 Persian Gulf War, agreed with assessments that Iraq has about "two or three months" to improve its security situation.

During an appearance yesterday on ABC's "This Week," Mr. Baker was asked whether a proposal by Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. for breaking up Iraq into semiautonomous regions is supported by members of the Iraq Study Group.

Mr. Biden, Delaware Democrat, recently told "This Week" moderator George Stephanopoulos that "he saw a lot of heads nodding in agreement" when he presented his plan to the group.

"A lot of the people we've talked to, particularly experts on Iraq, have suggested that, if we do that, that in itself will trigger a huge civil war because the major cities in Iraq are mixed," Mr. Baker said.

A weekend report in the Times of London said the Iraq Study Group was prepared to deliver a recommendation to President Bush and Congress that would call for dividing Iraq into three mostly autonomous regions. The paper quoted a source close to the group as saying, "The Kurds already effectively have their own area. The federalisation of Iraq is going to take place one way or another. The challenge for the Iraqis is how to work that through."

However, Mr. Baker appeared to reject such a proposal yesterday.

"There's no way to draw lines between Sunnis, Shia and Kurds in the major cities of Baghdad, Basra, Mosul, Kirkuk. And furthermore, there are no boundaries between the Sunni areas and the Shi'ite areas in Iraq," Mr. Baker said. "And the minute you say you're going to do that and make three autonomous regions, you're likely to kick off a big civil war."

However, Mr. Baker also said his group has not rejected Mr. Biden's proposal.

"We haven't rejected a lot of suggestions. We simply haven't concluded our report yet."

During an appearance on CNN's "Late Edition" yesterday, Mr. Biden said his plan was more reasonable than Mr. Bush's Iraq strategy.

"I'm not a person calling for cut and run. The president of the United States has not given the military commanders all they've needed," Mr. Biden said.

DOJ_NMG_0076634

"The fact of the matter is, everyone from John Warner on," he said referring to the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, "knows there's a need for radical change in policy and a political settlement here. There needs to be a political solution."

After his recent trip to Baghdad, Mr. Warner, Virginia Republican, said, "In two to three months' time, if this thing hasn't come to fruition and this government [is not] able to function, I think it's a responsibility of our government internally to determine: Is there a change of course we should take?"

Although the Iraq Study Group is holding its findings until after the November elections, Mr. Baker has said he does not think an immediate withdrawal of U.S. forces from Iraq should be under consideration.

"I think that if we picked up and left right now that you would see the biggest civil war you've ever seen," Mr. Baker said. "Every neighboring country would be involved in there, doing its own thing, Turkey, Iran, Syria, you name it, and even our friends in the Gulf. So I do not think that that is an option."

A Capital Gumshoe Hits It Big (USNEWS)

By Liz Halloran

U.S. News and World Report, October 16, 2006

On its face, it looked like a Washington version of a "did not, did so" schoolyard standoff. But the stakes were a whole lot higher. At issue are the assertions in Bob Woodward's new book about what Bush administration officials knew about the terrorists' plans in the months leading up to 9/11.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice insisted she had no recollection of a July 10, 2001, meeting described in Woodward's State of Deial-a meeting at which she was allegedly dismissive of CIA warnings that an attack was imminent. Days later, however, Rice acknowledged through her chief spokesman that she had been briefed by the CIA "on or around" that date-and added that she had instructed her staff to pass on the CIA's information to then Attorney General John Ashcroft and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld.

Rice's embarrassing flip-flop illustrates once again the unique clout that Woodward still wields 3 1/2 decades after he and Carl Bernstein uncovered the Watergate scandal. "When Bob Woodward speaks," says John Walcott, chief of the McClatchy newspaper chain's Washington bureau, "the secretary of state has to respond."

Though it was overshadowed last week by the evolving congressional page scandal, the new book was instantly a No. 1 bestseller, like 10 of the 14 books he has either written or coauthored. Unlike his past two books on the Bush administration, State of Denial takes an unsparing look at the administration's bungled post-invasion policy in Iraq. "This is a do-over," said commentator Arianna Huffington, who is among those who say Woodward's reputation was damaged by his previous favorable "Bush at war" books. "He wants to make it appear that he hasn't changed, the facts on the ground have changed. That's simply not true." Woodward has responded to such criticism by saying his latest round of reporting simply turned up new information.

Hot topics. Debate about Woodward's reporting has raged since the 1970s, although his influence has never waned. There have been several illuminating books published in the past year about the Bush administration's prosecution of the war in Iraq-from Ron Suskind's One Percent Doctrine to Thomas Ricks's Fiasco: The American Military Adventure in Iraq. But only Woodward's drew a White House press-release rebuttal.

The most common criticisms of Woodward, 63, are that he is too easily manipulated by the accounts of Washington insiders who cooperate with his reporting efforts and that he recounts endless strings of facts without context. Woodward was given access to President Bush and other top officials for his first two books on the administration, but he was refused interviews with the president for State of Denial. (The administration has said it believed Woodward had an agenda.) Some dramatic scenes Woodward reported in previous books-a teary Richard Nixon praying with Secretary of State Henry Kissinger; CIA Director William Casey's deathbed admission of the Iran-contra scheme-have been questioned.

There are other criticisms, as well. Thomas Edsall, a retired Washington Post reporter now teaching at Columbia School of Journalism and writing for the New Republic, says his former colleague, along with some reporters for other A-list newspapers, has ready access to high-level government officials but often fails to check their accounts of events with secondary and tertiary sources.

Old-fashioned. Woodward calls such criticisms unfounded. "I understand that there can be a misperception about my method, but if you look in the book's index, you'll see just as many midlevel staffers and Rumsfeld aides as high-profile names," he said last week. "This book makes me feel good about old-fashioned, straight journalism." Woodward defended his past glowing characterizations of the Bush administration as describing their actions during a different time. But he says he feels he erred in his earlier reporting on Rumsfeld, who comes off very poorly in State of Denial. "I should have looked at him sooner," he said.

Even his sternest critics, however, give Woodward credit for his work ethic and determination, his keen interviewing skill, his exhaustive knowledge of the nation's capital and how it works, and for not harboring a political agenda.

So what's Woodward's next book likely to be? "For the country's sake," he said, "I hope it's Bush at Peace." Whatever it is, it almost certainly will be a bestseller that will kick off yet another spirited dissection of one of the nation's most famous journalists.

Secret Iraq Meeting Included Journalists (NYT)

By Julie Bosman

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

It was the kind of shadowy, secret Washington meeting that Bob Woodward is fond of describing in detail. In his new book, "State of Denial," he writes that on Nov. 29, 2001, a dozen policy makers, Middle East experts and members of influential policy research organizations gathered in Virginia at the request of Paul D. Wolfowitz, then the deputy secretary of defense. Their objective was to produce a report for President Bush and his cabinet outlining a strategy for dealing with Afghanistan and the Middle East in the aftermath of 9/11.

What was more unusual, Mr. Woodward reveals, was the presence of journalists at the meeting. Fareed Zakaria, the editor of Newsweek International and a Newsweek columnist, and Robert D. Kaplan, now a national correspondent for The Atlantic Monthly, attended the meeting and, according to Mr. Kaplan, signed confidentiality agreements not to discuss what happened.

While members of policy research groups often dispense advice to administration officials, journalists do not typically attend secret meetings or help compile government reports. Indeed, many Washington journalists complain that the current administration keeps them at an unhealthy distance.

Mr. Zakaria takes issue with Mr. Woodward's account, saying that while he attended the meeting for several hours, he does not recall being told that a report would be produced.

"I thought it was a brainstorming session," he said. "I was never told that there was going to be a document summarizing our views and I have never seen such a document." (Mr. Woodward wrote that the report, which supported the invasion of Iraq, caused Mr. Bush to focus on the "malignancy" of the Middle East situation.)

Mr. Kaplan said much of the meeting was spent drafting and reworking the document, which in the end carried the names of all 12 participants and was "a forceful summary of some of the best pro-war arguments at the time." Could any of the participants have been unaware there was a document in the making? "No, that's not possible," he said.

Mr. Kaplan, who was then a freelancer at The Atlantic Monthly, said he spoke to his editor before attending, and was given approval to attend because "everybody was in a patriotic fervor."

Mr. Zakaria said he felt participating was appropriate because his views, as a columnist for Newsweek, were public, although he has never divulged his involvement to his readers.

"My column is an analytical column," he said, adding that he gives advice to policy makers and elected officials: "If a senator calls me up and asks me what should we do in Iraq, I'm happy to talk to him." JULIE BOSMAN

Death Squads Online (NSWK)

By Christian Caryl And Michael Hastings, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 9, 2006

As if things weren't bad enough, now Iraq's sectarian butchers are posting their execution lists on the Internet.

Not long ago, Mohammed Kika found out that his name had appeared on a London-based Web site run by Sunni exiles from Iraq. The Baghdad man was accused of betraying other Sunnis to a Shiite militia in the mixed neighborhood of Mansour, receiving a $200 bounty for each one he identified. The posting even disclosed the name of the barbershop where Kika could be found. He ran for his life, friends and family told NEWSWEEK. At first he hid out in the Shiite neighborhood of Karrada, and then he fled the country.

Iraq's sectarian war is spreading onto the Web. Some Iraqis, like Kika, have been forced into hiding or exile after being targeted on the Internet. Others may have run too slowly. Sunni and Shiite Web sites offer warnings to Iraqis about neighborhoods and ministries that may have been infiltrated by militias, but the sites are also increasingly used as tools by those seeking names, addresses and occupations of citizens to kill. (NEWSWEEK has found at least eight of these sites, but we have decided not to publish their Web addresses.) The outings are openly endorsed by some Iraqi leaders. Jalal al-Din Saghir, an influential Shiite cleric and parliamentary deputy, sponsors several sites. "Some of the Web sites can be used to catch spies by tracking their movements," he told NEWSWEEK.

Rising sectarian violence has become the No. 1 threat to Iraq's stability, with more than 2,500 Iraqis killed violently in September. Much of the killing is linked to death squads in Iraq's heavily Shiite police force, an agency that would scarcely exist without U.S. training and funding. Last week the U.S. military removed an entire Iraqi national police brigade from duty after American soldiers received reports that the unit was involved in death-squad activities. Military investigators are tracing possible links to the notorious Mahdi Army militia, which is believed to be running Shiite death squads in Baghdad. Efforts to build a reliable Iraqi police force seem nearly hopeless anyway: this summer alone the Interior Ministry reportedly fired at least 1,700 bad cops.

And the violence in the streets keeps getting nastier. Until recently, death threats in Iraq arrived the old-fashioned way—a flier found on a family's doorstep, warning them to leave the neighborhood or suffer the consequences. Now Iraq's sectarian killers have discovered the anonymity and long reach of the Internet.

Sunni sites provide Arabic-speaking users with a place to swap information—true or not—about alleged collaborators with Shiite death squads in Baghdad. One site's Iraqi correspondents write in with news and views—as well as exposés of corrupt officials or snitches alleged to be aiding the death squads. One of the site's organizers, Ali Ahmad, denies that he promotes violence with his site, and says he just "publishes information to fill a vacuum that the authorities can't. People can't go to the police," says the 48-year-old, an Iraqi exile and British citizen. Last week the site published a warning "not to go to the Ministry of Higher Education to accept fellowships, because it is a trap by a death squad." Another site lists more than 300 names, birthdays and locations of suspected Shiite militia members. Shiites have sites of their own, where believers are urged to avenge suicide car-bomb attacks by slaughtering Sunnis. "Let's torture them and don't be silent," wrote one recent poster.

The U.S. military tries to monitor the e-traffic, hoping to head off the killers. But the stepped-up drive against the death squads is tough on both sides: last week at least 13 U.S. troops were killed in Baghdad, one of the city's worst weeks for Americans since the war began. More bad weeks may be ahead as the fight continues. One post last week offered advice to members of the Mahdi Army on how to avoid capture by U.S. forces. "Don't wear black," the writer advised, referring to the standard Mahdi Army uniform. Other tips: "Hide your weapons," don't stand in groups, and "never admit you're a member of the militia." Just what Iraq needs: online hints for sectarian butchers.

Arrest Made In Iraq Food Poisoning Case (AP)

By Qassim Abdul-Zahra, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

Authorities arrested the head of the mess hall where at least 350 Iraqi policemen suffered food poisoning, and a military spokesman said Monday that it was likely the poisoning was intentional.

Brig. Qassim al-Moussawi, a senior spokesman for the Iraqi military, denied that anyone had died after Sunday's evening meal breaking the daily Ramadan fast.

On Sunday night, an official in the Environment Ministry, Jassim al-Atwan, said 11 policemen had died. Wasit provincial Gov. Hamad al-Latif said "hundreds of soldiers were poisoned" at the police base in Numaniyah, but nobody had died.

Al-Moussawi put the number of poisoned policemen at 350 to 400, but said only four victims were hospitalized.

"A number of people have been arrested, including the man in charge of the mess hall," al-Moussawi said.

DOJ_NMG_0076637

He said investigators were pursuing two theories — the first that spoiled food was used in the meal, perhaps as part of a corruption scheme by the contractors or officers at the base to skim off funds for the food. But al-Moussawi said that possibility was "less likely."

The stronger possibility, he said, is that it was "intentional sabotage."

Al-Latif said the base's food and water are supplied by an Australian contractor working through Iraqi subcontractors. He did not identify the Australian company. The food is prepared elsewhere and brought to the base.

Al-Moussawi said the contractors, workers at the location where the food is prepared and others were under investigation, but would not say how many had been detained.

Sunni insurgents fighting the police and military have not been known to use poison as a weapon. The afflicted policemen belong to the 4th Division of the National Police, whose officers are mainly Shiites.

The division normally operates around the town of Salman Pak on the southeastern outskirts of Baghdad — an area of intense Shiite-Sunni fighting.

The division was sent to the base in Numaniyah, 60 miles southeast of the capital, for further training.

Poisoning Suspected After Hundreds Fall Ill At Iraqi Post (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Officers Had Just Broken Ramadan Fast

BAGHDAD, Oct. 9 -- Hundreds of Iraqi army and police officers became violently ill after breaking their Ramadan fast Sunday evening at a base in southern Iraq, in what authorities are investigating as a possible mass poisoning attack.

At least 10 people died and 1,200 were sickened at a base in Numaniyah after eating a chicken dinner that may have been laced with cyanide, according to recruits and an army colonel with knowledge of the investigation. He said the food was undergoing laboratory tests.

Brig. Gen. Qassim al-Moussawi, a spokesman for the Iraqi armed forces, said the head of the base's mess hall and several other employees there had been arrested. But he said that only 350 to 400 people fell ill, that four had to be treated at a hospital and that none died.

The U.S. military announced the deaths of four troops, a soldier who was killed Monday morning by small-arms fire in eastern Baghdad and three Marines assigned to Regimental Combat Team 7 who were killed Sunday in Anbar province, the volatile Sunni insurgent stronghold.

In the southern city Diwaniyah, clashes continued Monday between U.S. troops and militiamen loyal to Shiite cleric and political leader Moqtada al-Sadr. The two sides battled a day earlier in a skirmish that the American military said left 30 militiamen dead.

Abdul Razaq al-Nadawi, the head of Sadr's office in Diwaniyah, said three people were killed at sunset when an American convoy tried to arrest a cleric loyal to Sadr. Members of Sadr's Mahdi Army responded by detonating a roadside bomb and opening fire on the convoy.

Earlier in the day, armed men connected with the Mahdi Army attacked an Iraqi police checkpoint in the northern part of the city, killing 12 officers and wounding three others, according to Brig. Gen. Hazim Mohammed Ameen of the Interior Ministry. He said joint Iraqi-American patrols cordoned off the area and all roads leading into the city and arrested 20 suspected fighters.

In Baghdad, armed men assassinated the brother of Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, one of the country's most prominent Sunni Arab politicians. The killing of Amir al-Hashimi makes him the third sibling of Hashimi to be assassinated this year.

Also in the capital, armed men in four pickup trucks without license plates kidnapped 11 Iraqi soldiers at a checkpoint in Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite Muslim slum, Ameen said.

The genocide trial of deposed president Saddam Hussein resumed Monday after a two-week break, with a 31-year-old Kurdish woman accusing Hussein's regime of burying her family alive. Prosecutors have accused Hussein of trying to annihilate the country's Kurdish population during the 1980s.

In Diyala province, northeast of Baghdad, statements were distributed threatening widespread violence and civil disobedience if the government does not remove the commander of the 5th Iraqi Army Division and bring him to court for unspecified crimes allegedly committed during a military operation last week.

The statements, signed by "the Mujaheddin of Diyala," said that if these demands were not met, they would fire rockets and mortars at government buildings, force the closure of all schools, bar government officials from going to work and shutter all gas stations.

"And we call on all citizens who were robbed of any valuables to submit a complaint to the criminal court in the province," the statement concluded, "and they will find honorable, honest judges there who will give them back their rights."

Special correspondent Saad Sarhan in Najaf and other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

Meal Sickens Hundreds Of Iraqi Police Recruits (LAT)

By Doug Smith And Zeena Kareem

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — Several hundred Iraqi police recruits were being treated today in an outbreak of severe food poisoning that triggered a mutinous episode in southern Iraq, and the capital was shaken by the assassination of the vice president's brother.

Officials in Numaniyah, about 75 miles southeast of Baghdad, said disorder broke out at a military base there today, the day after the recruits became ill. Angry recruits stoned the car of their commander. FOR THE RECORD:

'Iraq Food Poisoning': The chronology of events involving a food poisoning incident in Iraq have been corrected from an earlier online version of the story. —

Authorities said they had not yet established that the food poisoning, which broke out Sunday evening, was intentional. However, several people connected with the base dining facility were arrested, including the food supplier, military spokesman Brig. Gen. Khasim Mosawi said in a televised news conference.

Some local officials feared that the poisoning reflected a new and more frightening form of terrorism in an area that has been relatively free of violence. But a security official who requested anonymity said he thought the soldiers were poisoned by meat served after its expiration date.

About 350 of the soldiers remained in two local hospitals today, officials said.

The soldiers began to collapse in pain Sunday while doing field drills after eating the large evening meal that breaks the day's fasting during the holy month of Ramadan.

"I thought someone hiding somewhere was sniping at them with a silencer," said a base security official who would only give the name Ali.

Soldiers who did not eat the evening meal were not sickened, officials said.

Several members of the Wasit provincial council and the mayor of Numaniyah, who all asked not to be named out of fear for their safety, said they had received complaints from soldiers about abuse by Col. Amer Flaih Hasoon Dulaimi, commander of the 1,800-member National Police brigade.

They said the colonel publicly reproached the recruits after they celebrated the birth date of one of the Muslim imams with a meal and the singing of religious anthems.

In Baghdad, meanwhile, armed men arriving in a convoy of about 10 vehicles stormed the house of Amer Hashimi, killed him and his guards and kidnapped his son. Hashimi was the eldest brother of Vice President Tariq Hashimi, a top-ranking Sunni Arab politician.

Some of the attackers wore uniforms and others were in civilian clothes, a spokesman for the Iraqi Interior Ministry said.

Amer Hashimi was the third sibling of the vice president to be assassinated. Their sister, Maysoon Hashimi, was killed along with her driver in April, two weeks after a brother, Mahmoud Hashimi, was killed while driving with friends.

Amer Hashimi was an officer in Saddam Hussein's army and became the army's chief of staff from April to September 2004. He and four subordinates were dismissed after the assassination of a high-ranking officer in the Defense Ministry.

DOJ_NMG_0076639

Sunni political leaders said they held the government of Prime Minister Nouri Maliki responsible for the killing because it had failed to bring Shiite Muslim militias under control. The militias have been widely accused of carrying out killings of minority Sunnis.

"What makes us wonder, is that why they make promises about the militias that they can't fulfill?" said Saleem Abdullah of the Iraqi Accordance Front. "Every time we think there is a solution it disappears."

The trial of former dictator Saddam Hussein resumed today after a nearly two-week recess. During testimony, a Kurdish woman accused the deposed government of burying her family alive after destroying her village, rounding up men, women and children and herding them into camps where they were tortured and left hungry and exposed to the elements.

"I want you to ask Saddam Hussein a question," the Kurdish woman said while testifying from behind a curtain in a heavily protected Baghdad courtroom. "What was the guilt of the women and children?"

The woman, who was 13 at the time of a large-scale counterinsurgency operation carried out by Hussein's forces in 1988, added, "I know what happened to my family. They were buried alive."

Hussein's defense attorneys again boycotted the trial, objecting to the court's decision to remove the first judge in case, who was widely perceived by Shiites and Kurds as too lenient toward the former president and the defense.

In addition to four witnesses, the prosecution presented identification cards of Kurdish victims of the 1988 campaign discovered in mass grave sites in southern Iraq. Though Iraqi security forces tried to seize the identification cards during the roundup of suspects, some victims managed to hide them on their person and smuggle them to their graves, giving forensic scientists valuable clues in building up the case.

In other developments today:

The U.S. military reported the deaths of three Marines and two Army soldiers. The Marines were killed by enemy fire in Al Anbar province in western Iraq. The soldier was killed by small-arms fire in Baghdad. Their names were not released.

Parliament set a vote for Wednesday on implementation of a federal system to transfer power from Baghdad to the provinces. The parliament will be choosing between four competing plans.

Disturbances continued in the southern city of Diwaniya where the U.S. Army said it killed 30 militants in a firefight Saturday, said Shiekh Abdul-Razaq Nadawi, manager of Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr's office in the city. He said American forces raided a mosque attempting to arrest Sheik Khudair Ansari, a leader in Sadr moment in the city. The Americans withdrew after clashing with worshippers, several of whom were injured, he said.

Besides Hashimi, at least 35 violent deaths were reported in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq.

Eleven 11 Iraqi soldiers were reported kidnapped in a dawn raid on a checkpoint in a Sadr stronghold in the Baghdad neighborhood of Sadr City.

U.S. Gains In Parts Of Iraq In Jeopardy (WP/AP)

By Antonio Castaneda

The Washington Post/AP, October 10, 2006

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- For months, soldiers from the 172nd Stryker Brigade fought in riverside towns of western Iraq, trying to clamp off the flow of foreign fighters and suicide bombers that commanders said were terrorizing Baghdad. Now hundreds of these same U.S. soldiers have been sent to deal with what U.S. officials say is an even greater threat _ rising attacks between Sunnis and Shiites in the capital itself.

Left behind in the dusty towns along the Euphrates River in Anbar province are fewer U.S. troops _ and fears that hard-won gains could be in jeopardy from a Sunni Arab insurgency that is far from defeated.

"Seeing the fruits of your labor lost is frustrating," said Capt. David Ramirez of the 4th Squadron, 14th Cavalry Regiment, who was sent to Baghdad from western Iraq.

The shift from Anbar to Baghdad underscores the problems facing the overstretched, 140,000-strong U.S. military force in Iraq.

To secure Baghdad, the Army had to extend the tours of thousands of soldiers from two brigades, including hundreds from the 172nd who had already returned home only to be shipped back to Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0076640

"We do not have sufficient troop strength to secure the entire country simultaneously," Andrew Krepinevich, a military analyst, said in an e-mail to The Associated Press. "Trying to be strong everywhere will lead us to being strong nowhere."

Krepinevich said he had personally recommended drawing down forces in western Anbar to U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Vice President Dick Cheney's staff.

Lt. Gen. Peter Chiarelli, the No. 2 commander in Iraq, defended the new strategy, saying it was necessary to "winning the main effort" in Baghdad.

Chiarelli insisted the troops were moved from the less violent parts of Anbar province.

However, four Marines were killed July 29 by a suicide truck bombing in Rawah even as U.S. soldiers were pulling out of that area.

Commanders in western Anbar have long complained privately that they do not have enough troops to control their area, which is about the size of South Carolina and includes notoriously violent cities such as Haditha, Rawah and Haqlaniyah.

"Any time you reduce forces it's a concern," said Marine Lt. Col. Norm Cooling, commander of the 3rd Battalion, 3rd Regiment which is scattered across western Anbar.

Few dispute that the U.S. military had to do something about the deteriorating security in the Iraqi capital, which threatened to spiral into full-scale civil war.

The question is whether the U.S. has enough forces in the country to regain control in Baghdad while also preventing Sunni insurgents in the west from using the U.S. military drawdown there to gain strength.

About a third of the 102 U.S. troops who have died in Iraq since Sept. 1 have been killed in Anbar, according to Pentagon reports.

"Where we're not, the insurgency goes there. That's just how an insurgency works," said Capt. Chris L'Heureux, 30, of Woonsocket, R.I., who was among those relocated to Baghdad.

U.S. commanders have also said that the reshuffling of forces makes it difficult to build trust among civilians and convince them to cooperate with American forces.

For example, five different U.S. units were based in the western city of Hit last year.

"It's been like a transient area" in Hit, said Lt. Col. Ronald Gridley, the executive officer for Marine Regimental Combat Team 7.

"In a counterinsurgency," he said recently, "you can't throw someone in there for 45 days and expect them to understand the communities, the different tribes, the different personalities involved."

Iraq Fuel Shortages Buoy Separatists' Stance (WSJ)

By Philip Shishkin

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

Kurds in North Seek Solutions, Serve as Model for Southern Shiites; Sunnis Fear Being Shut Out

ERBIL, Iraq -- As governor of Erbil province in northern Iraq's Kurdish autonomous region, Nawzad Hadi Mawlood has spent months rationing fuel among public transport, government cars and -- supplies permitting -- regular motorists, whom he says he may have to advise to refrain from driving altogether.

The recurrent shortages are draining Kurdish officials' patience with the central government, which they accuse of fumbling fuel imports. Fuel interruptions also are aggravating the wider debate over how Iraq's abundant oil supplies are divided among its factionalized regions, and the resolution could determine whether the country splinters. In Baghdad last week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said "oil needs to be a unifying factor."

But here in Iraqi Kurdistan, officials are moving in the opposite direction, embracing policies that are putting it on track to oil independence from Baghdad. The Kurds' frustrations -- and ambitions -- are summed up by Ashti Hawrami, their newly appointed energy minister: "We are supposed to be an oil country, and we have this? Baghdad is failing us. We could do a better job."

The Kurdish example is inspiring Iraq's Shiite Muslim Arabs, most of whom live in the oil-rich South, to seek similar autonomy. The country's Sunni Muslim Arab minority -- fearing the Kurds will gain control of northern oil reserves -- is increasingly alarmed by Kurdistan's oil moves, fearful of being cut out of oil income that is currently apportioned by the central government.

When the central government's oil minister questioned the validity of exploration contracts signed by the Kurdistan regional government, Nechirwan Barzani, the region's prime minister, offered a strong response: "I resent [the oil minister's] efforts to sabotage investment in Kurdistan's oil sector. He would better spend his time getting his ministry working rather than tearing down our achievements." Mr. Barzani then warned that if Baghdad continues to impinge on the Kurdish region's autonomy, the Kurds may consider seceding from Iraq.

The thirst for independent fuel supplies -- and the broader autonomy that implies -- could also exacerbate age-old tensions with neighboring Turkey, which views Iraqi Kurdistan's growing self-rule with concern.

While Iraq is among the world's largest oil producers, the country's refineries, often targeted by insurgents, can't keep up with the domestic demand for refined petroleum products, such as gasoline. So Iraq's State Oil Marketing Organization uses the crude-oil revenue to buy the shortfall from foreign suppliers, including Turkey, which has no oil reserves of its own but fields a vibrant refining industry.

Hobbled by the insurgency and poor management, Iraq's oil production stood at two million barrels a day in August, lower than the pre-invasion level of two and a half million barrels in February of 2003, according to the International Energy Agency. SOMO has been struggling to manage the oil trade, held back in part by obsolete technology.

Last year and early this year, SOMO ran up a debt of $980 million importing refined-petroleum products from Turkey, says Falah al-Amri, its director. Tanker trucks that used to stream across the border between Turkey and Northern Iraq stopped earlier this year, worsening the gasoline shortage.

Sirwan Osman, who drives a taxi in the Iraqi Kurdish city of Suleimania, often spends several days in a row living out of his battered cab as it inches its way through a giant gas line. As the shortage goes on, Iraqi Kurds are getting angry at their leaders.

The fuel crisis added urgency to Kurdish efforts to craft oil policies that would leave their region less reliant on the vagaries of Baghdad's oil management. "Unfortunately, the funding for fuel purchases is still in the hands of the federal authorities," Mr. Hawrami, Iraqi Kurdistan's oil minister, said in a recent email, warning that the fuel situation could become worse as the harsh winter approaches. He adds that the Kurds are planning to build two refineries to prevent similar crises in the future.

Those refineries would augment the region's nascent oil infrastructure that is gradually taking shape. Iraqi Kurdistan has no producing oil fields, but it has signed contracts with several foreign companies -- including Norway's DNO ASA, Genel Enerji of Turkey and Addax Petroleum Corp. of Canada -- to drill for oil. The first crude production could begin as early as next year. It is those contracts that provided fodder for a bitter dispute between Mr. Barzani and Iraq's oil ministry in Baghdad.

Iraq's constitution, approved in a referendum last year, is intentionally vague on how oil revenue should be allocated. Income distribution from existing fields is the purview of the federal government in Baghdad, but management of future discoveries isn't explicitly regulated by the constitution, allowing Iraqi Kurdistan to claim that authority for itself.

"We have the right to conduct new oil searches," says Mr. Mawlood, the Erbil governor.

The new petroleum law enacted by the regional Parliament says future oil revenue will be shared with Baghdad only on a voluntary basis. Iraqi Kurds also hope voters in the ethnically mixed, oil-rich province of Kirkuk will decide in a referendum next year to join Iraqi Kurdistan. Sunni Arabs worry that the loss of Kirkuk could deprive them of crucial oil revenue and further damage national unity.

Turkey, which has a problem with its own restive -- and sizable -- Kurdish minority, fears the annexation of Kirkuk could further stoke Kurdish separatism throughout the region. Northern Iraq has already become a safe heaven for bands of Kurdish guerrillas who stage attacks across the Turkish border.

Iraqi Kurdish officials, who depend on Turkey for refined petroleum products and other imports, suspect their neighbor is using its trade leverage to thwart the region's moves toward greater autonomy.

Mr. Mawlood says the fuel shipments from Turkey stopped not only for financial reasons, but because the Turkish government is trying to punish Iraqi Kurdistan for harboring anti-Turkey guerrillas and for making moves on Kirkuk, home not only to the Kurds, but also to Sunni Arabs and to Turkomans, who are ethnically linked to Turks.

DOJ_NMG_0076642

A Turkish trade official says shipments were curtailed only because of the Iraqis' debts, and once the payments resume, so will the flow of gasoline to Iraq. Mr. Amri, head of SOMO, says he is working hard with Turkish counterparts to pay the arrears through an installment plan.

Witness In Saddam Trial Details Abuse (USAT/AP)

USA Today, October 10, 2006

BAGHDAD — The genocide trial of Saddam Hussein resumed Monday with testimony that his troops buried prisoners alive and abused female prisoners by shackling them for hours in the sun and firing over their heads as they bathed.

Saddam and his six co-defendants are on trial for offenses allegedly committed against Iraqi Kurds during a crackdown in the late 1980s. If convicted, the defendants could be sentenced to death by hanging.

One woman, who testified behind a curtain and whose name was withheld apparently for fear of reprisal, told the court she was 13 years old when she was detained during the crackdown.

The woman said Iraqi troops destroyed her village in northern Iraq in 1988 and that she and some family members were imprisoned in southern Iraq.

A prison warden she identified as Hajaj "used to drag women, their hands and feet shackled, and leave them in scorching sun for several hours," she told the court.

"Soldiers used to watch us bathe," she added, saying the guards would also fire weapons over the women's heads as they washed.

The woman said several relatives disappeared during the offensive. "I know the fate of my family. They were buried alive," she testified.

The prosecution presented the court with documents showing that remains of the women's relatives turned up in a mass grave.

"I'd like to ask Saddam: 'What crime did women and children commit?' " the witness told the court.

Saddam has insisted that the crackdown, known as Operation Anfal, was directed against Kurdish rebels who were allied with Iran in the 1980-88 Iran-Iraq War.

The prosecution maintains that about 180,000 people, most of them civilians, were killed in the crackdown, during which Iraq forces used poison gas against Kurdish villages.

In other Iraq news:

•The brother of Iraqi Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi was assassinated Monday when gunmen wearing military uniforms broke into his north Baghdad home, said Brig. Qassim al-Moussawi, a military spokesman.

Lt. Gen. Amir al-Hashimi, a Defense Ministry adviser, was the third of the politician's four siblings to be slain this year. The vice president's sister and another brother were killed within two weeks of each other in April.

•Iraqi authorities arrested the head of the mess hall at a base in the southern town of Numaniyah, where up to 400 policemen suffered food poisoning at a Ramadan meal.

Al-Moussawi said the poisoning was likely intentional, though he did not rule out that spoiled food was used in the meal. The policemen — mainly Shiites — fell ill after eating their iftar, the meal that ends the sunrise-to-sunset fast in the holy month of Ramadan. The Iraqi contractor hired to provide food for the base and other people also were detained, al-Moussawi said.

•A car bomb ripped through a market in a Shiite district of Baghdad, killing at least 10 people and wounding 23.

•Gunmen kidnapped 11 policemen in an assault on their checkpoint in Sadr City, a Baghdad neighborhood dominated by the Mahdi Army, the country's most powerful Shiite militia.

Rules Of Engagement: What Were They At Haditha? (CSM)

By Richard Whittle

The Christian Science Monitor, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON

On the morning of Nov. 19, 2005, after a roadside bomb killed a young US marine driving a Humvee through Haditha, Iraq, marines in his unit killed as many as 24 civilians.

DOJ_NMG_0076643

It's not clear why. The marines say they were fired upon. Iraqi witnesses say the marines went on a rampage. Now, as the marines await possible charges, a key question is: Were they following their rules of combat? These "rules of engagement" are under increasing scrutiny as American and civilian losses mount in Iraq.

The Haditha incident and other alleged atrocities by US troops in Iraq posed "some questions about leadership, about whether the military has done all that it can do to make it clear to troops on the ground what they're entitled to do," says John Sifton, a lawyer with Human Rights Watch, based in New York.

If charges are brought against the marines, the key to their defense will be that they were following the rules of engagement, defense lawyers say. "It's clear that that is the direction one must take," says attorney Gary Myers, if it's proved his client killed a civilian. He declined to identify which marine he represents in the Haditha controversy to protect the young man's reputation.

Whether such a defense can prevail depends both on the facts of what happened in Haditha and on whether those who did the killing acted "reasonably," even if they killed civilians, military law experts say.

"No soldier or marine is going to be tried for an honest mistake," says Gary Solis, a former Marine Corps lawyer who teaches the law of war at Georgetown University in Washington.

But if the marines knowingly gunned down innocent civilians, no rules of engagement would condone such behavior, experts say. Lt. Gen. James Mattis, commander of the 1st Marine Expeditionary Force at Camp Pendleton, Calif., is expected to decide in coming weeks whether to bring charges against any of the marines. Vary from war zone to war zone

Rules of engagement tell troops when they can apply force. They can vary from war zone to war zone, operation to operation, and even mission to mission. They're usually set by "combatant commanders" - those in charge of an entire region, such as Gen. John Abizaid, head of US forces in the Middle East. But some rules must be approved by the secretary of Defense or even the president.

In conflicts like the one in Iraq, applying the rules can be difficult, especially when troops must make split-second decisions. Sometimes, the rules even allow troops to shoot at civilians, if they can't be distinguished as such and appear to pose a threat.

The rules stem from the Joint Chiefs' Standing Rules of Engagement, which are based on laws of war that bar harming unarmed civilians who can be identified as such, says Lt. Col. John "Jay" Mannle, a Marine Corps lawyer. But firing on a car that contains civilians yet fails to slow or stop for a checkpoint - something US troops have done often in Iraq - is justified if those firing have a "reasonable" belief the car is a threat, he adds.

During the November 2004 battle of Fallujah, marines - including some from the unit under suspicion in Haditha - tossed hand grenades into houses or rooms where they believed insurgents to be. That's the tactic that was used in Haditha, too, according to Staff Sgt. Frank Wuterich, who led the squad accused of the killing.

In court papers filed last summer, Sergeant Wuterich said the squad - made up of about 10 marines - went into the houses after taking fire from them and accidentally killed the civilians while clearing rooms with grenades and rifles. (The papers were part of Wuterich's defamation lawsuit against Rep. John Murtha (D) of Pennsylvania, who said in May that the marines killed those civilians in cold blood.)

Residents of Fallujah, however, had been told to leave the city before US and allied forces went in, according to Mr. Solis of Georgetown. Anyone who didn't was regarded as hostile, and US forces were authorized to fire on them. No such warning had been issued in Haditha.

Iraqi witnesses in Haditha claim the marines went on a rampage after a roadside bomb killed Lance Cpl. Miguel Terrazas. The Iraqis say the marines killed four students when the young men happened upon the scene in a taxi, then massacred civilians in nearby houses, including women and children.

Human Rights Watch has asked the Pentagon for copies of the rules of engagement used in Iraq, and the American Civil Liberties Union has filed Freedom of Information Act requests seeking them, but rules of engagement are often classified. "We don't want to tell the bad guys what we might do," says Lt. Col. Scott Fazekas, a Marine Corps spokesman.

Such rules are usually general, Solis says, and, in any event, "are not tactical instructions on how to proceed in a combat situation." Practice and reminders

Troops are instructed on the rules and practice using them during predeployment training. How such training is conducted falls to unit commanders to decide. Before going into combat, troops also are issued unclassified "ROE cards" as a reminder of the key rules.

The cards are next to useless, says Lt. Col. David "Bo" Bolgiano, an Air Force Reserve lawyer and former Baltimore police officer who teaches a course in rules of engagement to members of the military. Troops in combat "are not going to have time to consult them," he says. In any event, problems arise not from the rules "but rather their application," he adds, which makes training in how to respond to potential threats the key.

Generally speaking, "the rules are pretty simple," he says. Troops may respond "with force - to include deadly force - to an imminent threat of death or serious bodily harm."

Although defense lawyers are likely to use rules of engagement as a justification if Haditha charges are brought, the outcome is more likely to turn on the facts surrounding the killings, says retired Army Lt. Col. Geoffrey Corn, who teaches at South Texas College of Law in Houston.

If the civilians were killed by mistake as the marines went after insurgents, he said, the legal question is whether the mistake "was a reasonable one."

"The discipline of a military force in battle is built around the core principle that killing on the battlefield is not just permitted, it's required," Colonel Corn said. "But not all killings are justified."

The Realities Of Trying To Rebuild Iraq (WP)

By Dan Senor

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

A recent excerpt from a new book by Rajiv Chandrasekaran of The Post paints a highly distorted portrait of the postwar administration of Iraq. Given that the article has prompted some senators to call for a government investigation into the hiring practices of the Coalition Provisional Authority (CPA), it's important to correct the record.

Chandrasekaran's thesis is that young and inexperienced neoconservative political hacks and Bush loyalists ran and ruined the occupation of Iraq. In pinning the shortcomings of the reconstruction effort on the mishaps of a handful of low-level political appointees, he virtually ignores the fact that the senior tiers of the CPA were populated with a bipartisan and generally nonpolitical corps of experts.

His book makes no mention, for example, of Richard Jones, who was the CPA's chief of policy and Ambassador Paul Bremer's top deputy. A career diplomat, Jones had served as President Bill Clinton's ambassador to Lebanon and Kazakhstan, and he was ambassador to Kuwait when he relocated to Baghdad. He was at the center of practically every decision and every meeting about the Iraqi political process from the moment he arrived. Indeed, during the first major crisis in Fallujah, Jones was the CPA's lead negotiator with the city's Sunni leadership, as was reported widely.

Nor does Chandrasekaran discuss Ryan Crocker, a striking omission since Chandrasekaran once described Crocker as Bremer's "top political aide" [news story, July 13, 2003]. Crocker, the senior State Department official with responsibility for Iraq before the war, led the CPA's political reconstruction team. A fluent Arabic speaker widely regarded as among the State Department's most distinguished Arabists, Crocker had served as ambassador to Syria and Kuwait under Clinton. He is a consummate professional diplomat, neither inexperienced nor an ideologue. And he was extraordinarily influential in the early months of the occupation; along with Bremer and senior British envoy John Sawers (another Middle East expert, who had come to the CPA from his post as ambassador to Egypt), Crocker played the most influential role in selecting the Iraqi Governing Council in July 2003. But reading Chandrasekaran's book, you would be left with the impression that Crocker had nothing to with Iraq -- he does not even get a mention.

Chandrasekaran ignores countless other CPA leaders who also fail to substantiate his one-sided thesis, including Gen. Keith Kellogg, the CPA's chief of operations. Kellogg is a retired lieutenant general whose 32-year Army career included two tours in Vietnam and service as the 82nd Airborne Division's chief of staff during Operations Desert Shield and Desert Storm. He was succeeded by Vice Adm. Scott Redd, who served as director of strategic plans and policy for the Joint Chiefs of Staff under Clinton.

David Oliver, the CPA's budget director, does appear in the book. But Chandrasekaran curiously omits any description of Oliver's background. Oliver, a retired Navy rear admiral, had served as a principal deputy undersecretary of defense for Clinton, and by the time he was sent to Baghdad he had already taken a role as a public and financial supporter of one of the Democratic candidates challenging President Bush in 2004. Other prominent Democrats recruited to work in Iraq included former Clinton senior defense official Walt Slocombe and constitutional experts Noah Feldman and Larry Diamond -- both of whom had publicly opposed the decision to go to war in Iraq.

Most of the CPA's senior officials came from the career ranks of the State Department or the military and had served in Republican and Democratic administrations. And whatever the politics of the non-career staff, the majority -- at all levels of the organization -- were dedicated and hardworking and risked their lives to serve.

That said, there is no question that CPA staffers, both senior and junior aides, made mistakes. And there were certainly some positions that were filled by less than perfect matches, as one would expect when a willingness to relocate to a war zone was a key criterion. But a fairer book would have simply critiqued our policy decisions without getting into personal attacks and lopsided analysis.

Speaking of policy, Chandrasekaran argues that the CPA should have listened more to professional civil servants and State Department Arabists. Yet his book concludes that the formal occupation of Iraq was itself America's biggest mistake. Instead of creating the CPA, he argues, the Bush administration should have moved quickly after Saddam Hussein's fall to empower a fully sovereign Iraqi government.

But that is precisely the policy that was vociferously opposed by the State Department's Middle East experts in the months leading up to the war. As Chandrasekaran himself points out earlier in the book, the State Department had, before the invasion, favored an extended occupation, in which the United States would retain power for a long period while gradually organizing elections and facilitating an Iraqi constitutional convention. Indeed, the approach Chandrasekaran now claims to prefer has much more in common with the rapid political transition plan backed by the very Pentagon neoconservatives he disparages throughout his account.

The truth is that both approaches would have been problematic. So, too, was the compromise solution sought by Bremer. But in a country as complicated as Iraq, there were no simple answers at hand. It's unfortunate that instead of acknowledging the depths and ambiguities of the problem, Chandrasekaran chose to shoehorn carefully selected facts into a thesis that often seems all too pat.

The writer, who was based in Baghdad from April 2003 to June 2004, served as a senior adviser to the Coalition Provisional Authority.

Punctuated By Life And Death (WP)

By Richard Cohen

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

On the day that The Post carried a story about how President Bush had characterized the present difficult period in Iraq as "just a comma," Matt Mendelsohn called me. He is a photographer who took the pictures for a new book by his brother Daniel, "The Lost." It is an attempt to find out what happened to six members of the Mendelsohn family who perished in the Holocaust -- the family of great-uncle Shmiel Jager, "killed by the Nazis," of which almost nothing else was known. There: You went right by it. Shmiel lived between the commas.

In between those commas, of course, is the life of a man. He was scared and he was brave, he was proud and he was shamed, he headed a family and ran a business and then hid from the Nazis until he, along with four daughters and his wife, was betrayed and shot right on the spot. Don't think of the bullet as a period. It was, worse, a comma.

So Daniel Mendelsohn set out to expand the commas, to push them open and let in a life. From what the reviewers say, he succeeded brilliantly, so when someone says that 6 million Jews died in the Holocaust or if someone mentions Auschwitz, you can understand that it is not a number that died but a person who was murdered. I say that also about Rwanda in 1994, or what happened to the Armenians in Turkey in 1915, or what is happening in Darfur today.

Commas imprison us all. You see them in the headlines of obituaries: Joseph Smith, accountant, 81; Mildred Jones, housewife, 87; Frank Miller, longtime resident, dies. The brevity of it all, the compression of a life into a clause, is appalling, yet an unalterable fact. This is the way not just of newspapers but of history, too. You come across the mention of a war -- the Crimean, the Civil, the Vietnam, the Boer, the Algerian -- and then, like a cemetery dangling from two commas, comes a mention of the number of dead. They get the same prominence -- sometimes less -- as the amount of ordnance used or ships sunk or airplanes built.

Wars are fought with commas. They are essential. Here and there is a world leader who does not care about human life, but most do. The only way they can function is to plant commas around the misery they cause, to subordinate the loss of life to a supposedly greater cause. This is what Bush is doing. If he did not think he is on his way to something grand, that he is doing immense good, then he could not face what is between those two commas -- almost 3,000 American lives and immense suffering. He is not a man given to introspection. Still, he could not live without the succor of cliches: breaking eggs to make an omelet and all of that. In between his commas are all those broken eggs. As yet, there is no omelet.

Not too long ago, I embraced the commas myself. I favored this idiotic war because I thought that the deaths of some would improve -- even save -- the lives of many. I likened the about-to-die soldiers to firemen or cops, the people we summon to risk or lose their lives for the common good. I had the common good in mind when I supported the war, and I did not expect much space between the commas. Now, the space expands and expands, one comma marching away from the other. It seems we will need room for all of Iraq.

When he was alive, I didn't much care for Menachem Begin, the hard-line Israeli prime minister. But when he retired after the 1982 war in Lebanon and showed his grief, my view of him changed. He was despondent over all the lives wasted, and he went into seclusion. For Begin, somehow, the commas evaporated and the immensity of his mistake pitched him into a depression relieved only by death. Other world leaders, in similar circumstances, join consulting firms. The bigger their mistakes, it appears, the higher their fees.

Most of us yearn to escape our commas, to become something more than a profession (longtime lawyer) or resident (Washington native), to make our mark on the world. A president who has ineptly waged a foolish war instead seeks the solace of commas. It is not so much where he has deposited the wounded and dead but where he hopes he can hide from history. It can't be done, though: George W. Bush comma -- and then his failure in Iraq. The comma is his epitaph.

Bomb Kills Top Leaders Of Local Afghan District (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 9 — Five people, including three officials who were the entire leadership of a district in eastern Afghanistan, were killed Monday morning in a roadside bomb explosion on their way to investigate a school burning, police officials said.

The blast, from a remote-controlled mine, killed the district administrator, the police chief and the intelligence chief of the Khogyani district of Nangarhar Province, as well as a driver and a bodyguard, a police spokesman, Col. Ghafoor Khan, said by telephone. Four policemen riding in the back of the pickup were wounded in the explosion.

The men were traveling to Kharawan, a village in the district, to investigate the burning of its school the previous night, Colonel Khan said. Khogyani, a mountainous district bordering Pakistan, is an area of insurgent activity. American and Afghan police officers and border troops had surrounded the village and were searching for suspects, but detained no one, Colonel Khan said.

NATO and Afghan forces were engaged in heavy clashes in Uruzgan, a southern province where Dutch and Australian troops are deployed, and estimated they had killed 52 insurgents in a firefight that lasted several hours, according to a NATO news statement released in Kabul. The Afghan Defense Ministry said there were also clashes on Sunday in Helmand, a neighboring province.

NATO officials had just reported that insurgent attacks had dropped by half at the end of September, compared with the beginning of the month, after the Taliban suffered a heavy defeat in Kandahar Province, in the south. They predicted the insurgents would switch to lower-level, guerrilla-style tactics like suicide bombs and roadside explosions.

The British commander of NATO troops in Afghanistan, Lt. Gen. David Richards, urged the government and Western donors to step in quickly to benefit from the relative lull in combat and deliver rapid assistance to the people of the south, warning that if residents did not see any benefits in the next six months they would turn to support the Taliban.

General Richards, who took overall command of foreign troops in Afghanistan last week, left for Pakistan on Monday to meet military officials and President Pervez Musharraf. According to the British newspaper The Sunday Times, he planned to present Pakistan with evidence that the Taliban leadership was working out of Quetta, in Pakistan.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Dunn Calls Allegations In HP Scandal A 'myth' (USAT)

By Del Jones And Michelle Kessler, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Former chairman declares innocence on '60 Minutes'

Former Hewlett-Packard chairman Patricia Dunn, facing charges of approving the practice of using private investigators to obtain the phone records of HP's board of directors, went on 60 Minutes Sunday to say she was innocent.

"The idea that I supervised, orchestrated, approved all the ways in which this investigation occurred is just a complete myth," she said. "It's a falsehood. It's a damaging lie."

Dunn, 53, has late-stage ovarian cancer and less than a 70% chance of living five years. She said her lawyers approved the 60 Minutes interview, which was unusual coming within days of being charged with felonies by California Attorney General Bill Lockyer.

The charges, filed in state court, allege that investigators working for HP impersonated board members and reporters to obtain their phone records without their consent, a practice known as pretexting. Dunn was aware the records were obtained under false pretenses, the attorney general alleged.

Dunn became HP's chairman in 2005 at a time when members of the board were leaking confidential information to the press regarding mergers and other sensitive topics. Those leaks destroyed trust on the board, Dunn said.

She said she approved investigating the board to find the leak but that she relied on HP lawyers to ensure everything was done legally. Dunn is one of five charged. HP declined to comment on 60 Minutes.

When asked if using pretexting was not at least unethical, Dunn said that people who sit on boards give up a lot of privacy. "Your life is much more an open book," she said. Dunn said it was wrong for HP to get reporters' records but that she did not learn that had happened until last month.

On the same 60 Minutes program, former HP CEO Carly Fiorina said that she was "shocked" by the depth and range of tactics used in the scandal, and shocked to learn that she may have been a target.

She implied that her firing was an act of sexism. Asked if a man would have been fired in the same manner, Fiorina said: "Somehow, men understand other men's need for respect differently than they understand it for a woman. I'm disappointed to have to say that, but I think it's undeniably true."

Fiorina said there were no "normal business reasons" for her firing. "I can only conclude that it was personal in some way."

Dunn said her cancer has made her philosophical and that being charged with crimes is not the worst thing that can happen.

"The Golden Gate Bridge is always out there," she said with a laugh during the interview.

"I have a story to tell," she said. "I need people to understand what happened, and I'm glad to have the chance to do it."

Boardroom Duel Behind H-P Chairman's Fall, Clash With A Powerful Director (WSJ)

By George Anders And Alan Murray

DOJ_NMG_0076648

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

PALO ALTO, Calif. -- Within weeks after her unexpected ascension to the chairmanship of Hewlett-Packard Co. last year, Patricia Dunn found herself in open warfare with another director: wealthy venture capitalist Tom Perkins.

They argued over how the board should be run. He has called her a "stickler for process and procedure." She says he was a "controller." For new board members, he pushed for Silicon Valley entrepreneurs with ties to his venture firm. She rejected his suggestions in favor of big-company leaders from other industries.

They even bickered over Mr. Perkins's steamy novel, "Sex and the Single Zillionaire," which he wrote with the encouragement of his ex-wife Danielle Steel. The 74-year-old Mr. Perkins says he jokingly called for all H-P employees to buy the book. Ms. Dunn, 53, says she didn't hear anything playful in his tone and vetoed that plan. When Ms. Dunn told Mr. Perkins at a party that the book "isn't my thing," he angrily accused her of embarrassing him in public.

At heated moments, two witnesses say, Mr. Perkins would declare in front of board members: "We need a new chairman." Ms. Dunn says at other times he would poke her in the clavicle and say: "I made you chairman." Mr. Perkins's actions were, in the words of another director, former Medtronic Inc. executive Robert Ryan, "chairman abuse."

The clash between Ms. Dunn and Mr. Perkins lies at the root of the spying scandal at H-P, a saga that ended catastrophically for Ms. Dunn. Last week the California attorney general charged her on four felony counts of fraud and conspiracy, saying she led the H-P board into criminal violations of privacy when the company pried into personal phone records to investigate boardroom leaks.

TRACKING THE SCANDAL

A cache of internal H-P documents and emails shed light on the company's media-leak probe. In one email exchange1, former H-P ethics lawyer Kevin Hunsaker asks how detectives obtained personal phone records. WSJ's Alan Murray discusses7 the risks former H-P CEO Patricia Dunn may face by testifying before Congress.

Mr. Perkins set the charges in motion by storming off the board and alerting authorities to the phone snooping. He contacted the Securities and Exchange Commission and California's attorney general, pressing them to take action. But their fight was much broader than that, reflecting a fundamental conflict over how to run big companies in the post-Enron world.

Ms. Dunn brought a careful, rules-based approach to life. She rose from a modest childhood and endured a three-bus commute to attend the University of California, Berkeley, on a scholarship. She become head of Barclays Global Investors, where she succeeded in the orderly world of index funds, which control risk and take the guesswork out of investing.

When asked to be H-P's chairman, she brought a similar diligence to her new job. She studied a British book on governance, attended directors' workshops at Stanford University and hired consultants to update board handbooks. Her first thought, she says, was: "How do I avoid screwing up? Failure-avoidance has been a large motivator my whole life." For Ms. Dunn, plugging the leaks became a crucial test of her ability to oversee the board.

Mr. Perkins, by contrast, is a boisterous Silicon Valley legend, in love with fast cars, large sailboats and getting his own way. He worked for H-P in the 1950s and 1960s and helped the company start its computer business. In 1972, he co-founded Kleiner Perkins Caufield & Byers, a leading venture-capital firm that made billions for partners and investors by bankrolling start-ups such as Genentech Inc. and Netscape Inc.

Mr. Perkins returned to H-P in 2002 as an outside director, serving until March 2004 before stepping down at retirement age. He was brought back 11 months later at the urging of fellow director George "Jay" Keyworth, who said the company needed Mr. Perkins's expertise. "I have been chairman of a hell of a lot of boards," Mr. Perkins said in an interview late last year. "I have always been very, very active in the strategy and tactics of these companies." When the leak issue came to a head, Mr. Perkins tried to play down the matter and protect his friend, Mr. Keyworth, who was fingered as the leaker.

Center of the Probe

While it may take a court to assign legal culpability, internal H-P documents depict Ms. Dunn at the center of the leak probe at the computer and printer company. Imbued with zeal about directors' responsibilities, she focused on rooting out a boardroom traitor and failed to question or rein in investigators. They impersonated reporters and directors to pry personal records from phone companies. They used operatives to tail H-P directors and journalists. And they sprang a sting operation on an unsuspecting reporter in an effort to get her to reveal her source.

The charges are the culmination of a fierce boardroom battle that, in the end, Ms. Dunn lost. At the board's request, she quit as a director in late September. Ms. Dunn says she relied upon the advice of H-P lawyers and thought obtaining phone records was customary practice. She portrays herself as a victim and says she bears no responsibility for any misdeeds that were done.

"I think I've been at the nexus of a conflict between the old and new ways of governance," she said during a three-hour interview last week. "And I made a very rich and powerful enemy without meaning to. He was in a position to finance an extremely effective and elaborate campaign to get me off the board. It went beyond what he ever expected."

Mr. Perkins also saw their battle as a fight over how best to run the company. In a July 18 email to H-P CEO Mark Hurd, he worried that Ms. Dunn would " 'pack' the board with the kind of directors she so admires -- ciphers from high cap companies, with no fast-cycle technology background, and certainly no Valley entrepreneurial genes. I worry that you will wind up with a 'blue ribbon' board that will be of zero, or even negative, value to you when the going gets tough."

In an interview with Newsweek last month, Mr. Perkins said: "My No. 1 thing was to get Pattie out as chairman, and I got that. So I'm happy."

As she fights her legal war, Ms. Dunn has been waging an increasingly serious medical battle. After brushes with breast cancer and melanoma, she was diagnosed with Stage IV ovarian cancer in January 2004. Intense chemotherapy, which lasted through August 2005, appeared to have beaten back the disease. But in August, Ms. Dunn had surgery to remove cancer that had spread to her liver. On Friday, she began a new six-month round of chemotherapy.

"I hope I live long enough to see my reputation cleared," she says.

The story of Ms. Dunn's undoing comes from interviews with her, her associates, other H-P directors and 700 pages of H-P documents, which include emails, presentations, lawyers' reports and written testimony submitted to a congressional committee investigating the matter.

Ms. Dunn spent her childhood in Las Vegas, where her father was an entertainment director at a casino and her mother was a retired showgirl. She says her formative experiences came as a teenager after her father died and her mother moved the family to Terra Linda, Calif.

Cash was tight. She won a National Merit Scholarship in 1970 to go to the University of Oregon but had to drop out when her mother lost Social Security death benefits. For a year, Ms. Dunn worked days as an apartment rental agent and evenings cooking and housecleaning for a family in return for room and board. Her mother was homeless and slept in her car for a while.

In 1973, Ms. Dunn got enough scholarship and grant money to return to college at the University of California, Berkeley, as a journalism major. Immediately after graduating, she won a temporary secretarial job at Wells Fargo & Co., the big San Francisco bank.

She had no interest in finance. "I thought I would rather drink chloroform and die than work for a bank," she recalls. But it was the only job available and she grew to like it. She met a senior banker, Bill Jahnke, whom she later married. And she became fascinated with the way Wells Fargo used academic theories to whittle away the role of human judgment in investment decisions. The bank championed low-cost money management that matched indexes like the Standard & Poor's 500. "I found there were revolutionaries at the bank," she says.

Ms. Dunn eventually became CEO of the business, which went through a series of owners before being sold to the United Kingdom's Barclays Bank PLC, which renamed it Barclays Global Investors. BGI wasn't flashy, but its methodical, process-driven approach to investment proved ultra-reliable.

Former colleagues say Ms. Dunn was a superb listener who usually knew exactly what she wanted. "You underestimated her at your peril," recalls Jeffrey Skelton, a former investment specialist at the bank. "People who got booted out can attest to that."

In 1998, Ms. Dunn was invited onto the H-P board, which was looking for fresh faces. At that time it was dominated by people picked by the company's legendary founders, Dave Packard and Bill Hewlett. A year later, H-P recruited its first outsider as CEO, Carly Fiorina, a flashy telecommunications executive.

Betting Their Future

H-P and Ms. Fiorina bet their future on the hotly contested 2002 takeover of Compaq Computer Corp. During a shareholder suit over the deal, H-P considered using Ms. Dunn as a witness to affirm directors' confidence in the deal. The company instead opted to call another director, Phil Condit, then CEO of Boeing Co.

In her autobiography, which goes on sale today, Ms. Fiorina snipes at the low-key Ms. Dunn, writing that it was "frequently hard to discern" what point Ms. Dunn might be trying to make.

REBOOTED

Brief biography of Patricia Dunn: • March 27, 1953: Born in Burbank, Calif.

• 1975: Earns B.A. from UC Berkeley

• 1976: Joins Wells Fargo Investment Advisers; later rises to CEO

• 1998: Joins board of Hewlett-Packard

• 2004: Diagnosed with advanced ovarian cancer; has recurrence in 2006

• February 2005: Named nonexecutive chairman of H-P

• May: Initiates probe into board leaks

• January 2006: Initiates second probe

• Sept. 22: Resigns from H-P

• Oct. 4: Indicted, with four others, on four felony counts

"I never viewed myself as a leader on the board until late 2004," says Ms. Dunn. That's when some H-P directors started voicing dissatisfaction with their CEO. A rift developed between Ms. Fiorina's supporters and critics. As the board struggled to find agreement, Ms. Dunn helped negotiate a 500-word statement testifying to its concerns. "I was the scribe" who wrote down the emerging consensus, Ms. Dunn recalls.

On Jan. 10, 2005, Ms. Dunn and two other directors -- Mr. Keyworth and Richard Hackborn -- delivered the statement to Ms. Fiorina. The meeting surprised the embattled CEO who conceded little in talks over the next few days about her role, but seemed to recognize the need to be more open with her board. "We were getting somewhere with Carly," Ms. Dunn maintains. "She was taking on board what directors were saying."

Two weeks later, a detailed account of directors' qualms about Ms. Fiorina's leadership appeared in The Wall Street Journal. Ms. Fiorina was furious and started focusing on leaks instead of directors' concerns about her management. Her relations with the board disintegrated. At a Feb. 7 board meeting in Chicago, with Mr. Perkins among those pushing hard for change, Ms. Fiorina was voted out of office.

The leak "set the tone for distrust," Ms. Dunn recalls. "It threw a spanner into the whole process" of running the board.

At the same Chicago session, the board asked Ms. Dunn to become nonexecutive chairman. She says her elevation was due largely to the fact that "I was one of the few directors who was still talking to everyone." She saw herself as a peacemaker.

Ms. Dunn was in the midst of a 20-month chemotherapy regimen to battle ovarian cancer. Her face was bloated. Hair loss forced her to wear wigs. She adopted a macrobiotic diet and consulted a Chinese herbalist. Each day, she took more than a dozen nutritional supplements that she kept in a heart-shaped box.

Doctors told her she showed an astonishing ability to withstand nausea and other side effects. Tom Christopherson, a long-time BGI colleague, says he asked her about her medical stoicism and recalls being told: "I keep all of this in a corner. The quality of life I want has nothing to do with being a cancer patient."

As H-P chairman, Ms. Dunn helped lead a CEO search that recruited Mr. Hurd from NCR Corp. She paid house calls to other H-P directors, asking them how the H-P board could become more effective. What she heard disheartened her. Directors were wary of one another, Ms. Dunn recalls, because of the leaks and the Fiorina ouster, and pessimistic they could ever work well together. Seven of the nine directors with whom she talked said stopping the leaks should be a top priority, after finding a new CEO, she recalls.

Months before, Ms. Fiorina had tried unsuccessfully to find boardroom leakers. Ms. Dunn felt it was time to try afresh. It didn't matter whether indiscretions were big or small. They all were bad. As she testified to a House panel last month: "Even trivial information that finds its way from the boardroom to the press corrodes trust among directors."

Sympathetic directors urged Ms. Dunn onward. H-P board documents show that Mr. Ryan offered to hand over his phone records so she could see if he had called reporters. She demurred. Someone suggested that directors take lie-detector tests. Mr. Perkins declared: "I'll be the first in line." Ms. Dunn took that as a serious suggestion. Mr. Perkins through a spokesman says he was kidding. Such tests were never used.

To dig into boardroom conduct, Ms. Dunn turned to a former prosecutor, Ronald DeLia, whom H-P management recommended to her. He ran Security Outsourcing Solutions, a small firm in Needham, Mass. Ms. Dunn says she wondered if a bigger firm would be better, but opted to keep the job in-house.

Project Kona

Mr. DeLia, in a phone call, asked her to pick a code name for the project. Ms. Dunn was staying in Kona, Hawaii, at the time, where she has vacationed since her honeymoon. She decided to call the project "Kona" and said recently the word will never sound the same to her.

Mr. DeLia decided to get directors' phone records without their permission. This technique, called "pretexting," involves fooling phone companies into handing over call logs by impersonating a customer, which is illegal in California; it may be permissible in other jurisdictions.

Ms. Dunn said in her House testimony last month she didn't recall hearing the term pretexting during the 2005 probe. But according to meeting notes from H-P's then-general counsel, Ann Baskins, someone with the initials "PCD" asked direct questions about the matter. Ms. Dunn's full name is Patricia Cecile Dunn. A spokesman for Ms. Dunn declines to comment on Ms. Baskins's notes.

Later, low-level H-P managers squirmed about such deceit. "It's very unethical at the least and probably illegal," wrote Vincent Nye, an H-P security official, in a February 2006 email. His warnings seemed to fall on deaf ears, and there's no indication they ever reached Ms. Dunn. It's unclear how people reacted to pretexting in 2005.

By summer 2005, the Kona I team conceded failure; it hadn't pinpointed any board blabber. The leak issue receded in prominence until Jan. 23, 2006, when Dawn Kawamoto, a technology reporter for CNet.com, posted an online article headlined: "HP Outlines Long-Term Strategy."

It didn't matter that the actual contents were upbeat and bland, merely echoing what H-P had been telling Wall Street analysts for months. The story was cast as a summary of a closed-doors retreat for directors and top executives two weeks earlier -- and it was accurate.

"I thought: 'Here we go again,' " Ms. Dunn recalls. "You can't appreciate how raw the sensitivities were on the board. That a director would have disclosed this is staggering." Even H-P's CEO, Mr. Hurd, was outraged, Ms. Dunn later said, telling her that he couldn't run the company this way.

As the leak problems worsened, Ms. Dunn's relations with the powerful Mr. Perkins were also deteriorating. In the summer of 2005, she brought in consultants from Mercer Delta Inc. to suggest how H-P could tidy up its director guidelines. Mr. Perkins hated their meddling. As H-P General Counsel Ms. Baskins put it in a later interview with H-P's outside lawyers: "Perkins generally felt he could write a book on governance and didn't need any outside help."

Ms. Dunn chafed, too, when Mr. Perkins repeatedly brought up her $100,000 annual pay as chairman, insinuating -- to her ear, at least -- that she ought to be grateful to him. She wanted him to realize that while not a tycoon, she had a net worth that was in fine shape with or without the H-P stipend. At one point, she took Mr. Perkins aside for a five-minute chat about her financial position, hoping this would close what she called in a later interview "a respect gap."

Also on Ms. Dunn's gripe list was how Mr. Perkins, as a member of the board's powerful technology committee, was running high-level strategy discussions that belonged in front of all directors. "It was becoming a board within a board," she says.

She didn't have a seat on the committee and while she was free to attend some of its events, lacked a vote there. A spokesman for Mr. Perkins says: "I wouldn't even know how to comment on that. Let's just let it go."

Did Mr. Perkins want an aggressive leaks probe? In an August 2006 interview with H-P's outside lawyers, Wilson Sonsini Goodrich & Rosatti, Ms. Dunn said she felt "under tremendous pressure from Perkins to find the leaker." Ms. Dunn reiterated in her interview last week that she thought Mr. Perkins was "the most hawkish of the directors" in pressing for action. Mr. Perkins's spokesman disputes that, saying the venture capitalist regarded the CNet article as harmless.

In any case, investigators had a likely suspect: Mr. Keyworth. He had given interviews to Ms. Kawamoto before and some of the quotes from the story's single anonymous source matched his cadence. He'd also been suspected of leaking to the press a year earlier. Ms. Dunn engaged H-P's chief ethics officer, Kevin Hunsaker, who agreed to supervise what became known as Kona II.

Within two weeks, Messrs. Hunsaker and DeLia had a whirlwind of spying initiatives in place. They paid surveillance teams to sit outside Mr. Keyworth's home. They hired other snoops to follow an H-P publicist at a conference, logging what time he visited the dessert stand. And they commandeered phone records of about a dozen people.

As one episode got under way, even the originally squeamish Mr. Nye emailed colleagues in all capital letters: "STRAP ON YOUR HELMETS, FELLAS, WE'RE GOIN IN!!!" Another investigator in an email likened one of his ploys to "waiting for the Apollo 13 spacecraft to emerge from the dark side of the moon."

Ms. Dunn generally kept her emotions on tighter rein. In emails to the investigative team, she underscored the importance of keeping CEO Mr. Hurd in the loop. She wrote to Mr. Hunsaker on Feb. 3: "This effort is on the right track. I will count on you and the team." On Feb. 22, she wrote Mr. Hunsaker to tell him that an email sting involving Ms. Kawamoto, the CNet reporter, was "very clever."

During her testimony to the investigations subcommittee of the House Committee on Energy and Commerce, Ms. Dunn said she was sorry she used that phrase.

All told, H-P investigators spent more than $350,000 to establish that Mr. Keyworth and Ms. Kawamoto had spoken before her CNet story appeared. Nobody officially interviewed Mr. Keyworth until the entire draft report was complete. Instead, the company operated for about two months in a clandestine world that Rep. John Dingell later said "would make Richard Nixon blush."

On May 18, it was time to present the fruits of Kona II to the full H-P board. Mr. Ryan, head of the audit committee, revealed the results of the investigation to Mr. Keyworth that morning, and Mr. Keyworth confessed.

At the board meeting, Ms. Dunn informed fellow directors that a leaker had been found and Mr. Ryan filled in the details. Directors asked Mr. Keyworth to leave the room while directors deliberated his fate. Ultimately they decided to ask for his resignation.

Ms. Dunn, who thought this would smooth her rocky relations with Mr. Perkins, had a nasty surprise coming. Mr. Perkins said Mr. Keyworth's contributions to the board were so sizable that his longtime friend should be let off with a private apology and a promise not to hold unauthorized chats with reporters again. Ms. Dunn refused, she says. Mr. Perkins shouted at her and announced he was quitting the board.

Within weeks, Mr. Perkins was marshalling for a battle. He retained a high-powered lawyer, former White House attorney Viet Dinh. He asked the phone company to see if his records had been peeked into by "pretexters." When he discovered that they had, he brought the evidence to authorities in July, including California's attorney general.

Over the past three months, H-P has been coming to terms with the magnitude of the scandal. It began disclosing the leak investigation in early September. Two weeks later, it said Ms. Dunn would step down as chairman in January. As more details about the leak probe tumbled forth, H-P at the end of last month said Ms. Dunn would resign immediately.

From Ms. Dunn's testimony, emails and indirect comments, it's possible to piece together an explanation for how a well-regarded chairman could go so catastrophically off course. Adamant in her desire to "fix" the leak problem, she succumbed to tunnel vision.

She had begun to see stopping leaks as one of the most crucial tasks in her chairmanship. In doing so, she neglected issues such as prudence, fairness and the potential impact on H-P's reputation. Even the extent to which the company had analyzed the legal issues or just glossed over them wasn't considered.

In interviews and in congressional testimony, Ms. Dunn says that while sorry for the embarrassment to H-P, she doesn't accept responsibility for the scandal. She says it wasn't her job to supervise the tactics involved in the investigation, and that she was assured its methods were lawful. She hasn't been precise as to who gave her that advice.

"If I had a crystal ball," Ms. Dunn says, "I would have used an outside firm" to run the investigations. Large security firms might have been more attuned to the possible hazards. With H-P management urging her to use in-house resources, she says she deferred to others.

Recently, Ms. Dunn has been busy with other things, including chemotherapy appointments, being arraigned and spending time with her step-grandchildren. After felony charges were filed, she offered to resign from board seats with various organizations and most of them -- including BGI -- immediately accepted. She says she was delighted that Larkin House, a social service for runaway teens, asked her to stay.

At one point in the House hearings, Ms. Dunn came close to acknowledging how much had been lost. When Rep. Edward Markey, a Massachusetts Democrat, asked about her boardroom credentials, she replied: "I was considered a financial expert and, ironic though it may seem to you now, also an expert in corporate governance."

Fiorina Says Her Next Role May Involve Politics (WSJ)

By Alan Murray And George Anders

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

Carly Fiorina, former chief executive of Hewlett-Packard Co., says she might want her next job to involve politics or some other form of "public service."

In an interview yesterday, Ms. Fiorina said that it is also possible she will look for a chance to run another public company. But she opened the door further than she has in the past to the notion of renewing her career outside the corporate world. While speculation about her political ambitions has swirled since she took office at H-P in 1999, she has consistently brushed aside such talk.

Ms. Fiorina, 52 years old, is currently promoting her autobiography, "Tough Choices," which was released yesterday.

Ms. Fiorina also said that she had breakfast with her successor, current H-P CEO Mark Hurd, in April, and that he complained about some of his directors. "He said he was frustrated with this board," Ms. Fiorina said.

Ms. Fiorina blames what she calls a "dysfunctional board" for her firing as CEO in February of last year. In particular, she blames venture capitalist Tom Perkins and director George "Jay" Keyworth, a former science adviser to President Ronald Reagan, for pushing personal agendas on the board. "I think Jay clearly was a driving force, that Tom was his ally, and that Tom's entry in the board changed the dynamics," she said. "They were the most egregious in wanting to dominate the [board's] conversation with their pet projects."

Ms. Fiorina said Mr. Hurd's concerns about the board were similar to hers. An H-P spokesperson confirmed that the breakfast occurred, but said Mr. Hurd wouldn't comment on the discussion.

At the time of the breakfast, Mr. Hurd had received the results of a controversial investigation into boardroom leaks, completed in March, that identified Mr. Keyworth as a source for some of those leaks. Mr. Perkins subsequently contacted the California attorney general, who has brought charges against former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn and others for their roles in the leak investigation. Mr. Hurd was not charged.

Concern over boardroom leaks at H-P began while Ms. Fiorina was still CEO. She launched an investigation into one leak, but she says that investigation only involved having attorney Larry Sonsini interview each director, and didn't involve obtaining private phone records or any of the other controversial tactics used in the later probe.

Asked about the controversy over the leak investigation, Ms. Fiorina, who was dismissed in February 2005, said: "My reaction to the whole thing when it first came out was to be shocked and appalled. It makes me sad. It's a breakdown in character and ethics and judgment."

Fiorina Blames Divisive HP Board (USAT)

By Michelle Kessler

USA Today, October 10, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — Deep "dysfunctions" in Hewlett-Packard's board have troubled the computer maker for years — and contributed to its current snooping scandal, former CEO Carly Fiorina said Monday.

Fiorina, who ran HP from 1999 to 2005, says she struggled with a board that refused to confront issues directly, but was happy to scheme behind her back.

The board ultimately ousted Fiorina, a decision that she says was unexpected and never explained. She describes their conflicts in a her memoir, Tough Choices, in stores this week.

Now, that same board is in trouble because it hired detectives that used trickery to obtain the private phone records of journalists, board members and employees — probably including Fiorina. That may be against the law. California Attorney General Bill Lockyer is seeking indictments against former HP chairman Patricia Dunn and four others involved in the scandal.

Fiorina, who left the company in the scandal's early days, says she has few inside details. She's still trying to figure out how many of her own personal records were accessed. But overall, "It appears that personal agendas overcame people's good judgment," she says.

It's a problem that Fiorina says she knows well. In her book, she describes repeated battles with a board that she says was usually polite and accommodating in person — and secretly scheming behind the scenes.

"That isn't the way business should be done," she says.

Some board members were particularly troublesome:

•George "Jay" Keyworth, a former science adviser to President Reagan, repeatedly proposed impractical mergers, then got angry when Fiorina didn't embrace his ideas, she writes. He has since confessed to leaking information to the press and has resigned.

•Venture capitalist Tom Perkins "clearly became a disruptive force in the boardroom during my tenure, and he apparently remains a disruptive force," Fiorina says.

Perkins, a close friend of Keyworth, played a key role in Fiorina's ouster. He resigned from the board this year after clashing with Dunn. He later forced HP to publicly reveal its phone-record swipe.

•Dunn, who became chairman after Fiorina's ouster, remained mysterious about the reasons for her decision to seek a change in CEO. "I never participated in a conversation with the board about why or how they chose to fire me," Fiorina says.

•Walter Hewlett, the son of an HP co-founder, initially supported a proposed $25 billion acquisition of Compaq Computer. Once the deal was announced, he stunned Fiorina by saying he would oppose it. He refused to even meet with her, she writes.

Fiorina says the problem with confrontation wasn't limited to the boardroom. The company's vaunted corporate culture, known as the HP Way, "had gotten a bit corrupted," Fiorina said Monday. "People tended to favor politeness and avoiding confrontation (over) direct talk."

That made HP slow and staid, putting it at a disadvantage to competitors such as Dell and Sun Microsystems. Fiorina worked hard to change it, and says she had some success. But the culture persisted in the board, in part because it met infrequently, she says.

HP has had a remarkable turnaround in spite of this, Fiorina says. Her successor, Mark Hurd, has gotten most of the praise.

"This isn't me vs. Mark," Fiorina says. But, she says, "The Hewlett-Packard company was transformed on my watch. … I don't deserve all of the credit, but I do deserve some."

Fiorina says the timing of her book is coincidental. She wanted to write it now, because she has time before her next venture, she says. Fiorina says she wrote the book herself, without the help of a professional writer, in about four months.

She hopes that the memoir, which describes her rise from temporary typist to AT&T executive to HP CEO, helps people see her as a real person. Through her difficult times at HP, "I became a caricature — too tough, too flashy," she says.

Fiorina says she doesn't yet know what her next move is. Politics are one option, though she wouldn't comment on reports that HP outside counsel and Silicon Valley icon Larry Sonsini urged her to run for governor.

DOJ_NMG_0076655

Another is heading a new company. She says she stays in close touch with the tech industry and still lives in Silicon Valley. As CEO, "I made choices I'm proud of. I would make those choices again," she says.

"It was a great experience," she says. "I'm proud of what I and tens of thousands (of HP employees) accomplished. I take great pleasure in seeing Hewlett-Packard (succeed)."

Civil Lawsuits Bigger Woe In Options Scandal (CNNM-YBIZ)

By Shaheen Pasha, Cnnmoney.com Staff Writer

CNN Money, October 10, 2006

Forget the SEC and Department of Justice. For companies ensnared in the widening options-backdating scandal, mounting civil lawsuits may turn out to be the real headache, costing companies millions of dollars and countless hours to defend and settle.

At last count, about 120 companies either are under scrutiny by the government or have launched internal investigations into their options practices. At issue is whether companies adjusted dates on options grants to ensure great profits for executives. But to date, only Brocade Communications and Comverse Technologies have actually received criminal indictments against their top executives.

Legal experts say that the small number of indictments highlights the difficulties in proving that executives knowingly attempted to enrich themselves at the expense of the company and shareholders.

But that hasn't stopped a host of eager litigation attorneys from filing civil suits, and dealing with them won't be easy.

"It takes an incredible amount of time, money and human capital to defend those type of cases regardless of the outcome," said Michael Koenig, a white-collar-criminal defense attorney at law firm Dewey Ballantine.

And when it comes to a civil lawsuit, the burden of proof on a plaintiff attorney is far less than in criminal proceedings, making it easier for civil complaints to mushroom.

Class action lawsuits, which usually lead the pack when it comes to most civil litigation, have a five-year statute of limitations - and many of the companies involved in the options scandal are looking at practices stemming from the late 1990s or 2000.

As a result, the complaint of choice has become derivative suits, in which shareholders sue the directors and officers of the company.

In a class-action suit, money in a settlement goes to the shareholders. In a derivative suit, a settlement goes to the company - which ultimately should benefit shareholders, though only indirectly.

Currently, attorneys have filed over 80 derivative lawsuits related to options backdating, while there have been only about 20 class-action suits against companies that include United Health Group and Apple.

Lawrence Kolker, partner at Wolf Haldenstein, has filed more than 20 complaints - mostly derivative lawsuits - in recent months against the directors and officers of companies like Comverse, Cablevision and Xilinx.

According to the civil complaints, shareholders are suing the officers and directors of the companies, claiming financial damage from falling stock prices following the announcement that the corporations were under investigation.

"The companies involved and shareholders have already lost billions of dollars in value as well as suffered reputational damage from being involved in this basic corporate malfeasance," Kolker said. "We're seeking recovery for the companies against the officers and directors."

Kolker said that shareholders sought monetary damages, disgorgement of profits executives made from backdating options as well as reform of corporate practices to make sure there will be better oversight in the future.

Critics of the mounting civil lawsuits say the barrage of derivative claims are just a way for ingenious plaintiff lawyers to profit from the scandal. Attorneys that file the derivative lawsuits can count on a solid fee -- sometimes as much as 25 percent of the ultimate settlement.

"Some people would say that these are lawyer-driven lawsuits and the point of filing these is to create fees for the lawyers," said William Sullivan, chair of the national securities litigation and enforcement at law firm Paul Hastings.

DOJ_NMG_0076656

"It's a three-pronged attack against corporations with the SEC, DOJ and the derivative suits," said Paul Hodgson, senior research association at The Corporate Library, a government research firm. "We don't think we've gotten to the end of the number of companies that are going to be investigated and it's likely that there are going to be even more derivative lawsuits ahead."

With so many cases already under investigation, Hodges said the SEC is already overwhelmed and the burden may fall more on the Department of Justice to bring criminal indictments.

But Hodgson said government prosecutors need to find tangible documentary evidence to prove that options were backdated knowingly in order to prosecute a company. And that's no easy task.

Plaintiff attorneys, however, just have to prove that stockholders lost money because the officers and directors failed to perform their fiduciary duty - making it more likely that civil lawsuits will be more successful in obtaining damages from any perceived wrongdoing, legal experts said.

"The derivative lawsuits in the long run could become a bigger headache for companies," said Paul Hastings' Sullivan.

Buffett Orders Crackdown On Unethical Practices (FT)

By Richard Beales And Francesco Guerrera In New York

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

Warren Buffett has ordered top managers at his Berkshire Hathaway group to redouble efforts to crack down on unethical behaviour, warning that practices such as stock options backdating cannot be justified because "everybody else is doing it".

In a strongly-worded memo dated September 27 and sent to an elite group of Berkshire managers dubbed "The All-Stars", the veteran investor says "bad behaviour" among the insurance and energy conglomerate's 200,000-plus employees is "inevitable".

"But we can have a huge effect in minimising such activities by jumping on anything immediately when there is the slightest odour of impropriety… Berkshire's reputation is in your hands," the memo – obtained by the Financial Times – says.

The "Sage of Omaha" warns that poor corporate governance cannot be forgiven just because the practice is widespread. "The five most dangerous words in business may be 'everybody else is doing it'," wrote Mr Buffett, who has long been sceptical of stock options as a means of remunerating executives.

"A lot of banks and insurance companies have suffered earnings disasters after relying on that rationale. Even worse have been the consequences from using that phrase to justify the morality of proposed actions," the memo continues.

Some lawyers and corporate experts have called for leniency towards executives and directors in the more than 100 companies being probed in the ongoing options backdating scandal, arguing that the practice was widespread and not necessarily illegal.

But Mr Buffett's intervention, his first since the onset of the scandal, will bolster the case of regulators and corporate governance campaigners who say options backdating unfairly enriched executives at the expense of shareholders.

Mr Buffett's memo argues that many of the perpetrators of recent corporate scandals such as the "accounting gimmicks" seen in recent years acted because they felt others were doing it as well.

"It's a seductive argument. But it couldn't be more wrong. In fact, every time you hear the phrase 'Everybody else is doing it' it should raise a huge red flag."

Mr Buffett says Berkshire should "start with what is legal, but always go on to what we would feel comfortable about being printed on the front page of our local paper".

Buffett Says To Avoid Scandals, Managers Must Not Follow Herd (WSJ)

By Karen Richardson

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

Warren Buffett, known as the "Oracle of Omaha," has spoken on the recent scandals involving stock-options backdating and Hewlett-Packard Co.'s leak probe.

In a one-page memo dated Sept. 27, prompted by the recent scandals, Mr. Buffett exhorted the 45-plus top managers of his Berkshire Hathaway Inc. holding company -- whom he calls "The All-Stars" -- to resist temptation despite peer pressure or even industry practice. "The five most dangerous words in business may be 'Everybody else is doing it,'" wrote the 76-year-old chairman of Berkshire.

More than 100 companies have drawn scrutiny in federal probes of backdating -- that is, the practice of altering the date on which options were granted to executives and other employees to increase the potential value of the options. Backdating can run afoul of tax and securities laws.

Separately, former H-P Chairman Patricia Dunn was charged last week by the California attorney general in H-P's leak probe. She and several others are accused of committing criminal privacy violations by hiring investigators who impersonated others in a tactic called "pretexting" to access personal phone records. Ms. Dunn has said she will fight the charges.

With regard to backdating, Mr. Buffett wrote, "My guess is that a great many of the people involved would not have behaved in the manner they did except for the fact that they felt others were doing so as well." In his folksy style, he went on, "So, at Berkshire, let's start with what is legal, but always go on to what we would feel comfortable about being printed on the front page of our local paper, and never proceed forward simply on the basis of the fact that other people are doing it."

Mr. Buffett sends out such "reminders" to his managers about once every two years, according to Debbie Bosanek, Mr. Buffett's assistant. As Berkshire continues acquiring new companies with new managers, Mr. Buffett decides "it's time for an update" once in a while," she added. Mr. Buffett wasn't available to comment. Sometimes Mr. Buffett's reminders take the form of passages in his annual letters to shareholders. In recent years, he has opined on hot-button corporate-governance issues including options expensing, executive compensation and hedge-fund fees.

Berkshire isn't a stranger to scandal. Four former executives of Berkshire's General Re reinsurance unit were indicted this year for conspiracy to commit fraud, and two others have pleaded guilty, in relation to a controversial transaction in 2000 with American International Group Inc. that federal prosecutors allege was a sham deal. The four former General Re executives and one former AIG executive are scheduled to stand trial in March in Connecticut.

In his latest memo, Mr. Buffett makes clear he is concerned about any blight on Berkshire's reputation. Acknowledging that the chance of the company's 200,000 staff will always behave properly "is nil," he adds, "We can have a huge effect in minimizing such activities by jumping on anything immediately when there is the slightest odor of impropriety."

Businesses With A Higher Purpose? (USAT)

By Alan M. Webber

USA Today, October 10, 2006

It must be a coincidence, right?

Here's Andrew Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, being sentenced to six years in prison — and on the same day, he names 10 prestigious Wall Street firms as his “co-conspirators”, including Merrill Lynch, RBS and Barclays.

Here's former Hewlett-Packard board chairwoman Patricia Dunn testifying before a congressional committee probing the company's use of “pretexting” to investigate its own board. “I do not accept personal responsibility for what happened,” she says. And then Ann Baskins, HP's former general counsel and nine other witnesses all take the Fifth Amendment.

Here's former WorldCom CEO Bernie Ebbers reporting to jail for his role in an $11 billion accounting fraud. These and other headlines are part of perhaps the biggest perp walk in business history.

Oh, and here's one more item — an interesting recent study by Donald McCabe, professor of management and global business at Rutgers University: Among all graduate students, MBA candidates are the biggest cheaters. That's right, it must be a coincidence. So let's dig a little deeper.

According to survey data from 623 students at 32 graduate business schools in the USA and Canada, 56% admitted cheating. But, as McCabe notes, it's not cheating for cheating's sake: These students are doing it to win. Cheating can help them get great internships and high-paying jobs at big name companies. So maybe it isn't a coincidence. Even so, that doesn't answer the deeper question: What's wrong with the business world — and, in particular, what is wrong with business schools?

Part of the answer could lie in the history of business graduate schools. The MBA is a fairly recent invention, unlike the other “professions” with graduate degrees. The oldest graduate school for business in the USA is a little more than 100 years old; Europe's oldest is only a bit more than 40 years old. Compare that with law and medicine. Law schools date to the Roman Republic. And though lawyers might not have the best reputation, at least the American Bar Association has issued its Model Rules of Professional Conduct. Medicine goes back farther, even if you consider only Western medicine. Hippocrates of Cos, who lived in the age of Pericles, is widely considered "the father of Medicine." Science might have advanced, but Hippocrates lives on today in the Hippocratic Oath, which proscribes a moral basis for doctors (unlike the hypocritical oath that evidently offers business school students a free pass).

So perhaps part of the difference between these schools is what it means to be a profession. But there is also a wider gap that separates business from medicine and law. Business school professors and leaders have yet to answer a question of the first order: What's the point of the exercise?

In the case of medicine and law, there are higher purposes. Doctors work to heal the sick and provide comfort to their patients. Lawyers are charged with representing their clients and also with upholding the nation's laws. What about business men and women? What's their higher purpose?

The ads in The Economist offer a good idea of the missions that leading business schools assign themselves. The ad for the University of Chicago's Graduate School of Business says, "You'll experience the people and ideas responsible for revolutionizing the business world." How perfectly it complements Harvard Business School's mission: "We educate leaders who make a difference in the world." Jeffrey Skilling, an HBS graduate, was after all, a leader who made a "difference." As President Bush, another HBS alum, would say, "Mission accomplished."

At least these ads are consistent with what today's businessmen have taken as their key responsibility: Increasing a company's share price. Or, as Jack Welch so succinctly put it in the title of his recent book, Winning. But winning, as we've seen with CEOs and now with business school students, can become a rationale for cheating.

What if, instead of seeking to create shareholder value as their definition of success, business men and women sought to establish well-articulated social values — and then applied them to their own careers and organizations? What if, instead of writing books called "Winning," they called their books "Contributing"? And what if, instead of measuring success only by their ability to amass financial capital, they also sought to grow social capital?

Because the real problem with business today isn't the few scoundrels who bring disgrace to so many honest managers. The real problem is that it needs to serve a higher purpose than making a lot of money. The challenge today is to answer a fundamental question: Is capitalism going to be the salvation of the world? Or the cause of its demise?

This is hardly an academic question, what with issues of global warming, the growing gap between the haves and have-nots, and the seeds of war and terrorism sown by divergent economic systems. Business leaders need to espouse a bigger game than just winning that connects to a view of the world as an interconnected community, where the future of the wealthiest depends in equal measure on the future of the poorest.

MBA students need to think about this bigger game that asks fundamental questions about the purpose and sustainability of business. And it's a game that will eliminate most cheating — unless, to paraphrase Woody Allen, students who want to serve a higher purpose cheat by looking at the soul of the student next to them.

European Justice (WSJ)

By Hans-martin Tillack

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

For 18 years now I have worked as a journalist, and I still think I have a great job. Of course someone in my profession has to follow a number of rules. Most important of all: Stick with the facts.

Now I have learned that these rules might be less strict for some officials at the EU anti-fraud office, which most people in Brussels know by its French acronym, OLAF. The European Court of First Instance ruled Wednesday that OLAF should get away with presenting wrong and misleading facts about me in order to spark a police action against me and to get to my sources inside OLAF.

The ruling surprised me. In my job, I could not -- just for example -- write that the director of OLAF, Franz-Hermann Brüner, "might be beating his dog." I could not write such a story, even if I really disliked Mr. Brüner, because I don't have the slightest evidence to back it up. A colleague might tell me that he had heard rumors that Mr. Brüner was beating his dog. But that would not allow me to write the story, either. Even if I had a witness who claimed to have seen Mr. Brüner beating his dog, I would prefer to wait until I had a second witness. And before publishing anything, I would try to confront Mr. Brüner and ask him whether he has really beaten his dog.

In fact, I wrote quite a few other stories about Mr. Brüner while I was correspondent for the German magazine Stern in Brussels from 1999 to 2004. These were stories for which I had proof -- stories about him and about the then EU anti-fraud commissioner, Michaele Schreyer. I was the first journalist to reveal, basing my stories on internal EU documents, that there were serious problems with fraud and possible corruption in the EU Commission's statistical agency, Eurostat. I was also able to prove in several cases that Commissioner Schreyer and Mr. Brüner seemed not to treat internal EU fraud cases seriously. Mr. Brüner, for example, flatly refused to forward evidence about a possible case of fraud to the Belgian public prosecutor in October 2003. I wrote that Mr. Brüner might act like this because he did not want to anger mighty politicians and EU officials who had to decide on his future career at the helm of OLAF.

In all these cases I had evidence. And I duly confronted the persons concerned before publishing my stories. Never did Mr. Brüner claim that any facts I mentioned were wrong. Still, Mr. Brüner and Ms. Schreyer were pretty unhappy about my reporting. Then something happened. After I benefited from a major leak in March 2002, Mr. Brüner and the EU Commission put out a press release saying the leaked document -- which I undeniably had quoted first -- might have been obtained by "a journalist" who bribed an official to get hold of this document. An OLAF spokesman even told a newspaper that OLAF had "prima facie evidence that a payment might have been made."

Only two years later did I learn what kind of "prima facie evidence" the spokesman was referring to. He relied on statements by the then-spokesman of Ms. Schreyer, Joachim Gross. Mr. Gross told OLAF that a third person told him that I had paid an official in order to obtain internal EU documents. Mr. Gross later made several conflicting statements about who his initial source was; the definite identity of this person is still unknown. What he told OLAF comprised nothing more than simple "rumors," as an OLAF spokesman noted in an internal memo that was leaked to me in April 2002. In any case, this former Commission spokesman did not want to be quoted. He had explicitly asked OLAF not to mention his name to anyone. It was only revealed by a German newspaper in June 2004.

I did not bribe or pay anyone to get these documents. But I had good sources and continued to receive internal OLAF documents. So in early 2004 Mr. Brüner went back on the warpath. His investigators put their allegations against me -- yes, still only the rumors spread by Mr. Gross -- in a report and sent complaints to the public prosecutors in Brussels and in Hamburg, Germany, where Stern has its headquarters. Two OLAF officials even traveled to Hamburg to ask the local prosecutor to act -- and to do this as a matter of "urgency" as I was about to move to Washington, D.C.

In fact I was about to move to Hamburg, and Mr. Brüner knew this. He did not ask me for my response to Mr. Gross's allegations before he filed his complaints. Nevertheless, while the German authorities refused to conduct a raid on the Stern headquarters in Hamburg, the Belgian police took the OLAF allegations seriously and, without examining them further, raided my home and office in March 2004. To this day they hold nearly 1,000 pages of my documents. During this entire time they have not brought any charges against me or any other person in this case.

So my magazine and I went to court: against Belgium, against Mr. Gross and against the EU Commission, of which OLAF is a part. The Belgian courts said they did not need to check the evidence that was delivered by the EU anti-fraud office and dismissed our complaints. Mr. Gross said he was protected by the statute of immunity of an EU official, and the German court to which we brought him said it had no jurisdiction over him.

On Wednesday, the EU Court of First Instance ruled on our main case against the Commission. The only people responsible for my problems were the Belgians, the three judges in Luxembourg found. OLAF's actions had no "binding" legal effect on me, they argued. Why? Because the Belgian authorities were -- according to the judges -- "free to decide" what to do after OLAF had pressed them for urgent action. So the court refused even to consider whether OLAF had breached the law and its own procedural rules. The judges also declined to discuss our argument that journalistic sources in EU institutions would be in danger of drying out if OLAF could send police to a journalist's home and office with the snap of a finger.

The anti-fraud office was not even to blame for its press releases and claims of alleged "prima facie" evidence that I had corrupted EU officials, the court said. OLAF had "formulated" all this "in a hypothetical way" without indicating my name or the name of my magazine and -- according to the court -- it did so with the necessary "cautiousness of the words used." So in the eyes of the court it was no problem if OLAF spread unjustified rumors or even openly misleading information.

Anyone who believes what OLAF says, the court seemed to say, does so at his own peril. If I were the director of the EU anti-fraud office I would be ashamed of this judgment. Strangely, Mr. Brüner welcomed the ruling, saying it gave "important guidance for the future work of OLAF."

What if I had written -- based on rumors -- that "a leading official" of the EU anti-fraud office might have beaten his dog, and consequently some neighbors broke down the door to the garden of the only "leading OLAF official" who owned a dog, and abducted the animal? Would I, too, have been cleared by the courts by arguing that my articles had no "binding legal effect" on the official concerned, and that I had mentioned the allegations only in a "hypothetical way" with the necessary "cautiousness of the words used"?

Of course not. If I were to act like this as a journalist, making unfounded accusations, my editors would fire me. And they would be right to do so. But it is also true that journalists must have the freedom to publish their stories when they have evidence for wrongdoing. Some people in the EU institutions still seem to have difficulty understanding this.

Mr. Tillack is a reporter in the Berlin office of Stern magazine.

CRIMINAL LAW:

U.S. Hoping To Quell School Violence (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - Compelled to respond to a spike in school violence, the Bush administration is hoping that a high-profile summit will get the word out about safety.

President Bush called for Tuesday's conference after three shooting rampages in two weeks unnerved the nation. Communities in Colorado, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania are still grieving.

Bush is expected to offer sympathy at the event and to encourage people to ask questions at home about whether their schools are prepared for emergencies.

Four weeks before the midterm elections, the event allows Bush to return to the politically safe issue of education and child safety. But the federal role in making schools safer is limited because education remains mainly a local matter. The White House chose to host a national sharing of ideas, hoping to seize a moment when people are focused on preventing violence.

Two Cabinet members, Education Secretary Margaret Spellings and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, will lead panel discussions. First lady Laura Bush is also scheduled to speak.

No new policies are expected; strategies for keeping schools safe are widely known. But experts say schools often don't get serious about safety until shootings make headlines.

On Monday, a 13-year-old student in Joplin, Mo., carried an AK-47 into his middle school and fired a shot into a ceiling. He left the building and was apprehended by police.

Preventing violence, and coping with tragedy, are the topics of the panel discussions.

Among the speakers will be Craig Scott, who survived the massacre at Columbine High School in Colorado in 1999. Student gunmen killed his sister and 12 others.

Another panelist is Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener. He responded in Bailey, Colo., on Sept. 27, when a man held several girls hostage in a school before killing one and himself.

Other speakers include educators, school administrators and crime prevention experts.

About 300 people are expected at the National 4-H Conference Center in Chevy Chase, Md.

"Bringing people together to talk about what's working - that can't hurt," said William Lassiter, manager of the Center for the Prevention of School Violence in Raleigh, N.C.

DOJ_NMG_0076661

"I think schools have gotten back into a comfort zone again," Lassiter said. "I'm not saying we should put barbed wire up around schools or take other drastic measures. What we really need to look at is basic safety steps you would take at your own house."

Lassiter also questioned the Bush's administration attempt to cut $347 million in school-safety grants for states this year. Bush's budget says the program is ineffective.

The White House says that beyond those state grants, the government spends larger amounts on successful school safety programs through its education, justice and health agencies.

Meanwhile, there is no pattern to deadly shootings at schools.

In the 2005-06 school year, 15 people were killed in school-related shootings, said Kenneth Trump, a national school safety expert who tracks violence data. That number of school-shooting deaths has ranged from three to 24 in recent years, Trump's records show.

In the period from 1992 to 2002, 462 students and adults died at school by homicide or suicide, according to the latest government figures. Most of those killed were children.

In the last two weeks, a gunman killed himself and five girls at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania, and a 15-year-old Wisconsin student shot and killed his principal.

Colorado Residents To Play Role In National School Safety Summit (AP)

AP, October 10, 2006

DENVER - A number of Colorado residents are expected to join President Bush and Cabinet members to discuss school safety this week, a summit called in the wake of deadly attacks here and elsewhere around the nation.

Park County Sheriff Fred Wegener, who handled the response to the school shooting in Bailey, and Craig Scott, brother of Columbine victim Rachel Scott, will be among Tuesday's panelists. Other participants are expected to include Del Elliott, director of the Center for the Study and Prevention of Violence at the University of Colorado, and Lt. Gov. Jane Norton.

The conference is being hosted outside Washington by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings. Bush and his wife, Laura, are expected to attend part of it.

"Our goal is clear: Children and teachers should never fear for their safety when they enter a classroom," the president said in his weekly radio address on Saturday.

In the past two weeks, schools in three states have been hit by deadly attacks and others have faced threats.

A gunman killed himself and five girls at a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania. A 15-year-old Wisconsin student was arrested in the shooting death of his principal. And on Sept. 27, 53-year-old Duane Morrison took six girls hostage at Platte Canyon High School in Bailey, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

Schools in Colorado, Virginia, Nebraska, Nevada, Oklahoma, Oregon and Wisconsin have been closed or locked down in the past week because of threats of violence or guns on campus.

"Laura and I are praying for the victims and their families, and we extend our sympathies to them and to the communities that have been devastated by these attacks," the president said.

Michael Acree, deputy director of the Colorado Department of Public Safety, and Susan Payne, executive director of the Colorado student crime-stoppers program, also are expected to attend Tuesday's conference.

White House spokeswoman Dana Perino, a Colorado native, told reporters Friday that recent school violence "has broken America's collective heart."

"The president, in the wake of these events, asked Attorney General Gonzales and Secretary Spellings to bring together teachers and parents, administrators and law enforcement officials and other experts to discuss best practices and learn lessons about school safety," Perino said.

In 2002, the Secret Service and the Education Department studied school shootings and found clear patterns: School attacks are rarely done on impulse. They are planned, and other students often hear about them in advance.

Overall, schools remain safe places.

DOJ_NMG_0076662

Violent crime at school fell from 1992 to 2002, according to the most recent federal data. During that time, students were over 70 times more likely to be murdered away from school than at school.

School Security Plan Would Need Cash (QPL)

By Cory Hopkins, The Patriot Ledger

Quincy (MA) Patriot-Ledger, October 10, 2006

Local officials agree federal funds the key

If the federal government decides to create a security policy in response to the recent spate of school violence, South Shore officials say federal money must be included to help implement the program.

''They offer money for everything else - homeland security and defense and everything - but you can't keep our children safe?'' asked John Reilly, Hull selectmen chairman and school building committee member. ''I think that should be a priority along with everything else.''

President Bush will hold a conference on school safety tomorrow with federal education officials, parents, teachers and law enforcement officials in Chevy Chase, Md. The president has pledged to do whatever possible to keep schools safe.

Most South Shore schools at the very least require all visitors to present identification upon entry and to sign a visitors' log. Some schools have installed sophisticated, and expensive, video surveillance and electronic locking equipment as security measures.

Braintree School Superintendent Peter Kurzberg said school security is important, but it is also expensive and competes for resources with traditional educational programs. He would like to see security money from the federal government.

''I think schools are struggling with limited resources to provide sound educational programs,'' Kurzberg said. ''Additional resources for security measures would certainly be helpful.''

Kurzberg also noted that in addition to security measures like cameras and electronic locks, other nonphysical security precautions, such as state-mandated Criminal Offender Record Information (CORI) background checks for all employees and volunteers, also cost schools money.

Schools also need money to create effective partnerships with local police departments, said John Creed, vice chairman of the Silver Lake school committee.

''If you're talking about security at schools, I hope (President Bush) gives the funds so local school departments can work with police departments to form partnerships,'' Creed said, ''but it cannot be done without money, and that has to come from the federal government.''

Scituate school committee member Michael Hayes said the federal government needs to back up any minimum requirements with money to help schools meet those requirements if it is serious about tightening school security.

''It's the function of the federal government to decide what would be minimally acceptable (in terms of security),'' Hayes said. ''The federal government has told schools a lot of things they've had to do, but the bottom line is they have to supply the money.''

Tomorrow's meeting, hosted by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, comes after three separate school shootings in Pennsylvania, Colorado and Wisconsin occurred in less than a week.

The threat of school violence was also felt on the South Shore last week after a former student clad in army fatigues walked into several classrooms at South Elementary School in Holbrook before being asked to leave, and the freshman football team at Silver Lake Regional High School was threatened by a student's mother.

Creed said he hopes President Bush will take the threats seriously and come out of tomorrow's meeting with a plan to seriously fund school security.

''If he's talking security and he's talking money, then we're on the same page,'' he said. ''If not, he's wasting his time.''

On Summit Agenda: Making Schools Safer (USAT)

By Ledyard King, Gannett News Service

USA Today, October 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076663

Bush, Cabinet members to attend Tuesday

WASHINGTON — Tom Mauser doesn't recall much about the youth violence summit President Clinton held in May 1999, three weeks after his 15-year-old son, Daniel, was gunned down in the Columbine High School massacre in Littleton, Colo.

To him, the summit turned out to be heavy on talk, light on action. So the transportation planner from suburban Denver expects the same result from the school safety conference that President Bush is convening Tuesday.

The summit comes after a series of school shootings, the most recent of which fatally wounded five Amish girls in a Pennsylvania schoolhouse last week.

Directed jointly by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, the daylong event will include teachers, parents, school administrators, law enforcement officials and other experts to discuss ways of making schools safer. The president and first lady Laura Bush also will participate, according to White House spokeswoman Dana Perino.

The summit comes as national statistics show a steady decline in school crime, including murder, over the past decade. Safety consultant Ken Trump warns that schools often under-report incidents and that the recent shootings in rural Wisconsin, Colorado and Pennsylvania show no classroom is absolutely safe.

"If it can happen in a one-room Amish schoolhouse, it can happen anywhere," said Trump, who is president of National School Safety and Security Services, a consulting firm in Cleveland.

Trump advocates that schools at least conduct "tabletop exercises" where they map out with local law enforcement responses to a potential crisis.

Mauser champions stricter gun-control laws but says ultimately school security is more about attitude than regulation.

"A lot of the things that need to be done are not things that can be done in Washington," he said. "People have to be vigilant about the people who commit these acts. No law is going to do that for us."

In Maine, about 40% of the 177 school districts have yet to draft a crisis response plan as required by state law, state Education Commissioner Susan Gendron said. Maine is contacting those districts.

"Random acts of violence can happen everywhere, and it's important to have thought through a crisis," she said.

Most schools get less than $10,000 in federal security aid, according to the U.S. Department of Education. Federal funding to combat crime and drugs in schools has steadily fallen since Bush entered the White House.

But Bill Modzeleski, who runs the U.S. Department of Education's Office of Safe and Drug-Free Schools, says there's plenty schools can do right now: limit access; keep areas well lit; monitor visitors; and train teachers, parents and students to report suspicious activity. Perhaps most of all, they should intervene with children early before emotional issues explode into violence.

"I don't think a lack of money should be used as an excuse not to do anything," he said.

Missouri Teen Fires Assault Rifle In School (WP/AP)

By Marcus Kabel

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

JOPLIN, Mo., Oct. 9 -- A 13-year-old boy in a dark-green trench coat and mask carried an assault rifle into his school Monday, pointed it at students and fired a shot into a ceiling before the weapon jammed, authorities said. No one was hurt.

"Please don't make me do this," the boy said, according to school administrators, before police arrested him and thwarted what they called a "well-thought-out plan" to terrorize his school.

Police said a note in the student's backpack indicated he had planted an explosive device in the school, but no bombs were found.

Lt. Geoff Jones said the boy's motives were unclear. School officials said the student had no major disciplinary problems.

The seventh-grader, whose name was not released, pointed the rifle at two students inside Joplin Memorial Middle School but was confronted by an administrator who tried to talk him into putting it down, Jones said.

Instead, the boy fired a shot into the ceiling of an entryway, police said. He tried to continue firing but left the building when the rifle jammed, Jones said.

"We don't believe he was trying to fire at administrators or students," Officer Curt Farmer said.

DOJ_NMG_0076664

Officers arrested the teen behind a nearby building. Police described his weapon as a Mac-90, a replica of an AK-47 assault rifle.

Superintendent Jim Simpson said police told him the boy had a fascination with the Columbine High School shootings that left 15 people dead near Littleton, Colo., in 1999.

The student was wearing a trench coat -- like the student gunmen at Columbine -- and had a T-shirt over his head with eye holes cut out, Farmer said.

Farmer said the boy's backpack also held military manuals, instructions on assembling an improvised explosive device and detailed drawings of the school.

"This was quite well thought out," Farmer said. "He had been planning this for a long time."

Jones said the gun belonged to the boy's parents, who kept the weapon in a safe at home. Farmer said it is not uncommon for people in the area to own assault weapons.

Shot Fired In Mo. School; No Injuries, Explanations (USAT)

By Wendy Koch

USA Today, October 10, 2006

The 13-year-old boy had no previous run-ins with the law, police said. But 20 minutes before class Monday, he stood in the hall of Memorial Middle School in Joplin, Mo., wearing a green trench coat and a mask fashioned from a T-shirt, and aiming an assault rifle at the principal and other students, they said.

Assistant Superintendent Steve Doerr tried to calm the seventh-grader, who kept saying: "Get away. Don't make me do this," according to Joplin police Lt. Geoff Jones. The boy fired into the ceiling, hitting a pipe and causing a burst of water. No one was hurt.

The rifle jammed, and the boy fled the school. Principal Steve Gibreth followed and called police on his walkie-talkie. Within a block, Jones said, police found the boy, crouched with the gun and a duffel bag. Jones said the bag contained wire cutters, unidentified chemicals, a pellet gun, hand-drawn diagrams of the school and notes about bombs and napalm. The teen, whose name has not been released, was in police custody in a juvenile facility.

"We have no motive," Jones said.

Police searched the boy's home and bomb-sniffing dogs searched the school, which was evacuated, but they found nothing, Jones said.

When the shot was fired, he said, quite a few students were already at school, and others were arriving. Some told police the boy aimed the gun at them, but Jones said it is unclear whether any were targets.

The incident followed deadly shootings in schools in three other states since Sept. 27, including an attack in Pennsylvania on Oct. 2 that left five Amish girls dead.

President Bush convenes a conference on school safety today.

The shootings, as well as a spate of threats that have forced schools in at least eight states to lock down or evacuate in the past two weeks, have contributed to parental jitters over school safety.

In a USA TODAY/Gallup Poll conducted over the weekend, 35% of parents with school-age children said they fear for their kids' safety when they're at school. That percentage was the highest since March 11, 2001, when 45% of parents voiced such concern after a shooting at a suburban San Diego high school killed two students and injured 13 others.

Although one-third of parents said they're anxious, most said their children are not: 88% said their kids expressed no worry about safety at school.

The telephone poll of 1,007 adults nationwide, conducted Friday through Sunday, has a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points.

Monday's incident in Joplin, a city of 49,000 in southwestern Missouri, occurred only 10 miles from Riverton, Kan., where five students were arrested April 20 — the seventh anniversary of the Columbine High School massacre in Colorado — on suspicion of plotting an armed attack on their high school. Two of the teens pleaded guilty to a reduced charge of conspiracy to riot, and the other three have pleaded innocent.

Time To Talk Guns (WP)

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

A summit on school violence must look at the role of weapons.

THE SLAUGHTER of five girls in a Pennsylvania classroom, closely following school shootings in Colorado and Wisconsin, has prompted President Bush to call a national summit on school violence. It is right that the nation not just mourn the heartbreak of last week's shootings but that its leaders and other citizens talk about how to prevent such tragedies. How useful tomorrow's conversation will be, however, depends on the administration's willingness to have all voices heard. And that must include those calling for a more rational approach to gun control.

The day after a gunman carried out the deadly assault in an Amish school, Mr. Bush said that he had asked Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings to convene a meeting to determine how the federal government can help states and local governments improve school safety. There was an unfortunate sense of deja vu to the president's announcement: After the mass shootings at Columbine High School, President Bill Clinton held a summit on youth violence in 1999. Useful strategies resulted from the attention paid to Columbine. Schools that thought they had no need for safety and evacuation plans moved quickly to put some in place. Bullying, once viewed as a rite of childhood passage, was finally treated as a problem not to be tolerated. There was a new awareness that threats should be treated seriously.

But while the Clinton administration showed a willingness to discuss the role of guns in these incidents, the current administration and the Republican Congress have put in place policies that make it too easy for too many people to get guns. Worse, the wrong people are getting more dangerous guns.

We appreciate the president's resolve to gather experts, including those in law enforcement. Yet when it comes to gun legislation, the experts are ignored as the gun lobby scores victory after victory. Consider that President Bush signed a law that permits the destruction of gun check records within 24 hours (despite criticism from a Government Accountability Office report); let the federal assault weapons ban expire (despite evidence that it lowered the rate at which assault weapons were used in crime); is backing bills that prevent law enforcement from putting corrupt gun dealers out of business (over the objection of police groups); and restricted the ability of police to use crime gun trace data (again despite police objections).

It may be true that no law could have stopped the Pennsylvania school killer. Maybe, though, stricter laws would have given him pause. And, even if his victims could not have been saved, certainly some of the 10,100 people murdered with guns or some of the 477,040 people who were victims of gun violence last year would have been spared.

Editorial: Schools And Violence (STNIA)

Staten Island Advance (NY), October 9, 2006

During his Saturday address, President Bush lamented recent "shocking acts of violence" in schools and promised his administration will do what it can to keep centers of learning safe for students.

The immediate question that comes to mind is this: How does the president plan to accomplish that goal?

Perhaps tomorrow the nation's jittery parents will begin to learn the answer.

It has been a particularly brutal bloody heart-breaking two weeks that saw three schools in three states victimized by deadly gun attacks, the latest being a week ago today, when a gunman killed five girls and then himself in a one-room Amish schoolhouse in Pennsylvania. Charles Carl Roberts had five guns and 600 rounds of ammunition.

On Sept. 29, a 15-year-old Wisconsin student was arrested in the shooting death of his high school principal. Several days before that deadly incident, on Sept. 27 a man took six girls hostage in Colorado, sexually assaulting them before fatally shooting one girl and killing himself.

Schools in Virginia, Nebraska, Nevada, Oklahoma, Oregon and Wisconsin have been closed or locked down in the past week because of threats of violence or guns on campus.

Tomorrow, the White House is convening a conference on school safety; on hand at the event being held in the Washington suburb of Chevy Chase, Md., will be federal officials, school workers, parents, law enforcement officials and other experts.

DOJ_NMG_0076666

Hosted by U. S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Education Secretary Margaret Spellings, Mr. Bush and his wife, Laura, are expected to attend at least part of the meeting.

"Our goal is clear: Children and teachers should never fear for their safety when they enter a classroom," the president said on Saturday.

No one would disagree with that statement nor the goal, regardless of partisan politics. But again, how is the task of making the nation's schools safe going to be accomplished?

One can be sure that none of the participants will even suggest that a connection between lax gun laws and the spate of violence that has taken the lives of children and at least one school official in the last two weeks.

That's wrong. We feel that the issue should be No. 1 on the list of concerns. The truth is that Mr. Bush and the Republicans gained their majority in Congress thanks in large measure to the country's most powerful gun lobby: The National Rifle Association.

Last year, the group reported as much in one of its publications: "The success rate of congressional candidates endorsed by the NRA's Political Victory Fund was 95 percent. That tops an 85 percent rate in the 2000 elections and 89 percent rate in the mid-term 2002 races."

Many of those who, the writer went on to explain, "earned the wrath of the NRA and the firearms industry for supporting the poison-pill amendments that prevented passage of Senate Bill 1805 that would have provided immunity to firearms manufacturers from 'junk' lawsuits, lost their seats, resulting in the Republicans capturing 55 seats in the Senate to the Democrats' 44 with one seat remaining independent."

The trend of politically targeting those who support stricter gun laws or longer waiting periods for gun purchases, has grown to include our own mayor, Mike Bloomberg, who has over the last eight months or so earned the wrath of the NRA due to his anti-gun-trafficking campaign, and his successful effort to bring other mayors on board.

Several months ago, it was reported by the mayor's office and the state Education department that New York City schools had seen a 500-percent jump in reported incidents of violence between 2004 and 2005, but that the majority were found to be cases of harassment without a weapon, assaults and minor altercations.

The city's incidences of violence were well below the average. Figures for Staten Island were uniformly low, especially for serious crimes. None of the schools on the Island had more than 10 cases of weapon possession, though McKee High School led the list with eight. However, those statistics have been challenged by the United Federation of Teachers President Randi Wingarten as being "too low," and a matter of "under-reporting."

Regardless, any incident of violence involving a weapon in this borough's schools is one too many.

The proliferation and easy access to guns, especially those purchased in other cities and then transported for sale in others; a culture that glorifies violence through movies, music videos and other teen-targeted media, and poor or non-existent parenting are all part of the school violence syndrome. However, no conference on school violence can ignore the role played by guns. After all, none of the victims in the last two weeks were stabbed or clubbed over the head.

If the Bush administration really is serious about finding solutions, it would be disingenuous for the matter of guns not to top the agenda. Far too many politicians, especially those in Congress, have played lip service due to the vast amounts of campaign money they have received and continue to receive from the gun lobby. The same can be said for the White House.

Our children deserve better and parents and school officials should be demanding it.

Former Pages Surveyed In Foley Probe (AP-Y)

By Larry Margasak

AP-Yahoo, October 10, 2006

Lawmakers, following a request from the House ethics committee, are surveying aides and former House pages to find out if any of them had knowledge of ex-Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate conduct toward male pages.

Charlie Keller, spokesman for Rep. Ginny Brown-Waite, R-Fla., said she contacted two pages before receiving the committee request and asked if they were aware of inappropriate behavior from Foley, any other lawmaker or staff members. Both said they were not.

DOJ_NMG_0076667

Aides for other House members reported similar results Monday.

The ethics committee leaders, in a letter to all House members, asked them to contact current and former pages they sponsored to learn whether any of them had "inappropriate communications or interactions" with Foley or any other House member.

The ethics panel, formally known as the Committee on Standards and Official Conduct, also directed lawmakers to cast a wide net and ask aides what they might have heard about improper approaches by Foley or others to pages before revelations about his sexually explicit Internet messages surfaced last month. Foley resigned Sept. 29.

Meanwhile, the lawyer for Kirk Fordham, Foley's former chief of staff, said Monday his client could testify before the committee as early as this week. Fordham has said he informed House Speaker Dennis Hastert's staff in 2003 about Foley's inappropriate messages to pages.

Timothy Heaphy, Fordham's lawyer, said he contacted the ethics committee Friday and was told Fordham could appear this week to provide sworn testimony.

The ethics committee's four-person investigative subcommittee said it approved nearly four-dozen subpoenas for testimony and documents, although many witnesses are expected to testify voluntarily without the need for a subpoena.

J. Randolph Evans, Hastert's lawyer, said, "We are working to cooperate fully," but did not know when Hastert may appear.

Ethics Committee Starts Interviews In Foley Inquiry (WSJ)

By David Rogers

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Moving with unusual speed, the House Ethics Committee began interviews in its probe of the Mark Foley scandal, an investigation that will test both the Republican leadership and the panel itself.

The inquiry will involve questioning of top House Republicans, including Speaker Dennis Hastert, and senior aides with decades of experience on Capitol Hill and their own relations with party leaders as well as members of the ethics panel.

Among them, Ted Van Der Meid, an aide to Mr. Hastert and an important witness to the Foley matter, led the ethics panel staff in the 1990s. The 49-year-old attorney, who has declined to comment on the Foley matter, advised Mr. Hastert when the speaker replaced many Republican members of the committee at the beginning of this Congress.

Those changes set off a partisan uproar that paralyzed the committee because of Democrats' complaints that the changes were designed to protect then Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R., Texas). A new counsel, William O'Reilly, was announced late last year, and the arrival of California Rep. Howard Berman as the ranking Democrat changed the mood. In announcing the inquiry into the Foley matter last week, Mr. Berman joined with Chairman Doc Hastings (R., Wash.) in resisting calls for an outside counsel, and the situation gives the Democrat and Mr. O'Reilly extraordinary leverage in dealing with a tense situation for Republicans.

It has been 10 days since Mr. Foley, a six-term Republican congressman from Florida, resigned after the revelation of sexually explicit messages he sent to teenage former House pages. The scandal dominated television news shows yesterday even as Newsweek published a poll suggesting that more than half of Americans believe Mr. Hastert was aware of Mr. Foley's inappropriate messages and tried to cover up the matter.

The speaker has denied any coverup, while apologizing for the scandal on his watch. Republicans say they hope the ethics inquiry -- and a criminal probe by the Federal Bureau of Investigation -- will help them return the debate to "terror and taxes" in the weeks before elections.

In the ethics inquiry, four current and former House staff members may play large roles:

Kirk Fordham, a former chief of staff to Mr. Foley, has said he warned Mr. Hastert's office before leaving Mr. Foley's employ in late 2003. Mr. Fordham is uncertain about the precise timing of the warning, but recalls meeting with Mr. Hastert's chief of staff Scott Palmer in the Capitol and asking that he intervene with Mr. Foley to stop his overly friendly behavior to male pages and interns. Mr. Fordham also recalls that Mr. Palmer later advised him that he had spoken to Mr. Foley about the matter within days.

Scott Palmer, who came to Washington with Mr. Hastert in the late '80s, is one of the most powerful figures in the Capitol, not only because of his boss's position but because of their close relationship. For this reason, many say the 56-year-old aide would accept blame and resign if it would help the speaker. But instead Mr. Palmer is described by friends as distraught, unable to recall or find personal notes of any such meeting with Mr. Fordham. "What Kirk Fordham said, did not happen," Mr. Palmer said last week.

Jeff Trandahl, the House clerk until last fall, and someone with responsibility for the page program, also has declined to comment. But Mr. Fordham and others have said Mr. Trandahl, now in his early '40s, was aware that Mr. Foley at times was overly attentive to pages. Mr. Fordham said it was warnings from Mr. Trandahl that led him to go to Mr. Palmer. It isn't clear whether Mr. Trandahl took the same warnings to Mr. Van Der Meid, who oversaw administrative matters in the House for the speaker.

In 2005, a Louisiana couple complained about overly friendly email from Mr. Foley to their son, a former page. A Louisiana congressman forwarded the complaint to the Speaker's office and Mr. Trandahl went with Rep. John Shimkus (R., Ill.), the head of the House Page Board, to tell Mr. Foley to cease contact with the teenager.

That email was an important signal that Mr. Foley was using the Internet to contact former pages. However, Karen Haas, the new clerk, confirmed Mr. Trandahl left the House without telling her of the incident.

Mr. Van Der Meid came to the Capitol in the mid-'80s like Mr. Trandahl, and in the chain of command in the speaker's office, has the most direct oversight of the page program. While Mr. Fordham went to Mr. Palmer instead, it would have been logical for Mr. Palmer to tell Mr. Van Der Meid of any meeting he had about the pages.

Ex-Foley Aide To Testify At Ethics Panel (USAT)

By Jill Lawrence

USA Today, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — A former Capitol Hill aide who says he warned Republican leaders about Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate conduct with teenage pages at least three years ago is scheduled to give sworn testimony to the House ethics committee this week.

Kirk Fordham, a longtime Foley aide and more recently chief of staff to Rep. Thomas Reynolds, R-N.Y., offered the panel his help on Friday, said his attorney, Tim Heaphy. The attorney said Sunday he didn't know what day Fordham will testify or whether the session will be public.

The Sunday news shows were dominated by talk of Foley's actions and the way House Speaker Dennis Hastert and other GOP leaders handled signs of trouble over the past few years. Conservatives debated Hastert's fate and politicians argued about the scandal's impact on the Nov. 7 elections.

Foley, R-Fla., quit Congress on Sept. 29 after ABC and other news outlets revealed lewd e-mails and instant messages he had sent to pages and former pages. None of the messages have been independently authenticated by USA TODAY.

Foley's lawyer announced soon after that Foley is an alcoholic and had been molested by clergy as a child.

Tom Kean Jr., the GOP Senate candidate in New Jersey, called for Hastert to step down. Republicans said Sunday such talk was premature until the bipartisan ethics panel sorts out who knew what when and what was done.

“Anybody that hindered this in any kind of way, that tried to step in the way, of hiding this or covering it up, is going to have to step down, whoever that is,” Rep. Tom Davis, R-Va., said on CBS' Face The Nation.

Fordham has said that he notified Hastert's office in 2003 or earlier about Foley's behavior and that Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, met with Foley at the time. Palmer has said the meeting did not happen. Fordham “continues to stand by everything that he has said about this and will have more to say under oath,” Heaphy said.

President Bush is set to appear with Hastert on Thursday at a Chicago fundraiser for two suburban House candidates, and White House press secretary Tony Snow is speaking at a Hastert fundraiser Saturday in Illinois, Hastert spokesman Ron Bonjean said.

Democrats need 15 seats for a House majority. Rep. Adam Putnam, R-Fla., said the scandal is not affecting most races. But he acknowledged on ABC's This Week that many members are facing “uncomfortable questions about tawdry deeds by a former colleague.”

DOJ_NMG_0076669

The GOP leaders in most immediate danger appear to be Reynolds, who says he notified Hastert's office last spring of a troubling e-mail exchange involving Foley, and Rep. Deborah Pryce, R-Ohio, who called Foley one of her five best friends in Congress in Columbus Monthly.

A Buffalo News poll showed Reynolds, head of the National Republican Congressional Committee, trailing Democrat Jack Davis 48%-33%. NRCC spokesman Carl Forti said the results are "not even in the same ballpark" as GOP polling, but would not divulge those numbers.

Reynolds canceled an appearance Sunday on ABC because he was sick, said his spokesman, L.D. Platt. A day earlier, Reynolds apologized in a TV ad for failing to pursue the Foley matter.

In an Ohio race that polls show is close, Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy is stressing Pryce's ties to Foley and Hastert in a radio ad. It says Pryce, the No. 4 GOP leader, "is protecting Hastert even though he protected a sex predator." Pryce said Kilroy "stooped to a new low by suggesting that I knew or should have known" that Foley was "a child predator."

'05 Meeting Could Clarify G.O.P. Role In Foley Case (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 8 — For all the questions and curiosities, for all the contradictions and inconsistencies in the tale of Mark Foley, the investigation into how Republicans handled concerns about his conduct may hinge on what transpired on a fall afternoon last year, when a private meeting was hastily convened in his office.

Jeff Trandahl, the clerk of the House, and Representative John Shimkus, an Illinois Republican who leads the board overseeing the Congressional page program, had come from the House floor to confront Mr. Foley, a Republican congressman from Florida, about reports that he had been exchanging e-mail messages with a Louisiana teenager who had worked as a page on Capitol Hill.

When they arrived in Room 104 of the Cannon House Building that day, Mr. Foley was already in his office, where oil paintings of the Everglades, done by his mother, were hanging alongside memorabilia from more than a decade of life in Washington. Elizabeth Nicolson, a longtime aide who had recently been named chief of staff, joined Mr. Foley for a meeting that lasted no more than 30 minutes.

What took place at this meeting — only four people were present, none of them Democrats — holds the answers to at least some of the pertinent questions in the case of Mr. Foley, who resigned abruptly from Congress late last month after learning that a series of sexually explicit messages had landed in the hands of ABC News.

"It was a brief meeting," said a senior Republican Congressional aide who was familiar with the session and spoke on condition of anonymity because the matter was under investigation. "Looking back, it was probably far too brief of a meeting."

Mr. Shimkus, who did not inform other members of the page board about the meeting, would later say that he had ordered Mr. Foley to "cease all contact" with the teenager. The scope of his questioning, however, is unclear. Last week, Mr. Shimkus said he had not asked Mr. Foley whether he had communicated with other pages by e-mail, but Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois has said Mr. Shimkus did.

This week, when a bipartisan, four-member panel deepens its inquiry, the meeting in Mr. Foley's office will be one critical point of entry. But investigators also intend to piece together a far broader timeline of events in the fall of Mr. Foley's political career, an examination that will take them back years, to when whispers began circulating about the gregarious congressman's behavior.

One of their main tasks will be to sort out conflicting versions of events on a range of fronts, including whether Mr. Hastert's chief of staff, Scott Palmer, was alerted to Mr. Foley's conduct in 2003 or earlier. Mr. Palmer has denied such a warning.

And the investigation is not limited to Mr. Foley, according to a letter that is to be distributed on Tuesday to each member of the House of Representatives.

"We request that you contact current and former House pages sponsored by your office for the purpose of learning whether any of those individuals had any inappropriate communications or interactions with former Representative Foley or any other member of the House," said the letter, which was signed by the Republican and Democratic leaders of the investigation.

DOJ_NMG_0076670

The Congressional page scandal has overshadowed the final month of the midterm election campaign and threatened to upend Mr. Hastert's leadership. After spending last week trying to convince his own party that he had handled the situation appropriately, Mr. Hastert has yet to resolve questions about when he became aware of Mr. Foley's behavior.

Representative Thomas M. Davis III, Republican of Virginia, delivered an unusually critical assessment on Sunday of how Mr. Hastert had responded. The answers may not become clear, Mr. Davis said, until people are forced to testify under oath. In addition to the House inquiry, the Federal Bureau of Investigation is also examining Mr. Foley's conduct.

"They were slow out of the starting block, there's no question about it," Mr. Davis said on "Face the Nation" on CBS. He added, "It's taken a week of fumbling around to get to where we are."

Representative Ray LaHood, Republican of Illinois, once chief of staff to Robert H. Michel of Illinois, the former Republican leader, said he did not believe Mr. Hastert had been served well by members of his staff. Some members of the speaker's staff had been aware for at least a year — and others possibly longer — about Mr. Foley's attention toward the teenage pages.

"I'm sure he's very angry about the fact that they withheld this information," said Mr. LaHood, a close friend of Mr. Hastert's. "So I hope he's talked to his staff. He deserves better than that."

Indeed, employees in the speaker's office are emerging as leading characters in answering a question born a generation ago in the Watergate scandal: Who knew what, and when did they know it?

There are inconsistencies in the accounts of top Republicans in the House, particularly regarding whether members of the leadership team told Mr. Hastert about reports of Mr. Foley's conduct. Representative Thomas M. Reynolds, a New York Republican who leads the National Republican Congressional Committee, has said he informed the speaker in the spring. Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, the majority leader, has said he also told Mr. Hastert.

"If Reynolds told me, it was in a line of things when we were in the middle of another crisis this spring," said Mr. Hastert, who spent much of the year dealing with the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal. "So I just don't recall or remember that."

Differences have also emerged in describing Mr. Foley's departure. Republican Party talking points now suggest that Republican leaders took forceful steps to secure a quick resignation. Yet early on, Mr. Hastert said, "I think Foley resigned almost immediately upon the outbreak of this information, so we really didn't have a chance to ask him to resign."

But accounts of senior aides in the House, who have not spoken publicly, could help investigators determine whether there was a Republican cover-up, as some Democrats have asserted.

It is Mr. Palmer, the speaker's longtime chief of staff and closest adviser, and Mike Stokke, the deputy chief of staff, whose stories are of particular interest to investigators. A former aide to Mr. Foley, Kirk Fordham, said he was prepared to testify that he told Mr. Palmer of complaints about Mr. Foley's conduct in 2003 or earlier. Mr. Palmer rebuts the claim.

This week, Mr. Fordham is expected to appear before the House ethics panel, his lawyer said, where he intends to testify that he asked Mr. Palmer to deliver a stern caution to Mr. Foley, who reportedly refused to keep his distance from pages, despite frequent warnings. This time, people familiar with the situation said, word had started to spread that Mr. Foley had tried to enter the page dormitory after curfew.

Mr. Stokke, who oversees the political operation for Mr. Hastert, said he became aware that Mr. Foley had been "overfriendly" with pages a year ago. Even though Mr. Hastert and his two employees share a townhouse on Capitol Hill and fly back to Illinois most every weekend, the two aides said they did not tell each other or Mr. Hastert about Mr. Foley's troubles.

Finally, Ted Van Der Meid, the counsel to the speaker, also learned about a year ago that Mr. Foley had been exchanging e-mail messages with a former page from Louisiana. Mr. Van Der Meid and Mr. Stokke gave the information to the House clerk, Mr. Trandahl, who convened the meeting last fall in Mr. Foley's office that is now the focus of so much attention.

To investigators, Mr. Trandahl's story could be the most important piece in determining when Republican leaders learned of Mr. Foley's conduct.

As clerk, Mr. Trandahl was elected by the members of the House to oversee its operations, a powerful position that he attained after nearly two decades on the Hill. He also supervised the page program, handling issues as disparate as roommate disputes among the high school students and complaints about Mr. Foley's behavior.

DOJ_NMG_0076671

Mr. Trandahl, who has declined to comment, had been telling friends for months that he intended to leave the House last summer for a position in the private sector. In late September, he accepted an offer to become executive director of the National Fish and Wildlife Foundation.

On one of his final days in the House, in the first week of November, just hours before Democrats and Republicans had a farewell party for him, Mr. Trandahl made his way toward Room 104 in the Cannon Building to confront Mr. Foley.

Now, Mr. Trandahl is expected to return to the Hill in the coming days or weeks, to tell his story to the House ethics committee.

Inquiry May Test House's Legal Shields (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, October 9, 2006

WASHINGTON — Five months ago, the FBI touched off a legal and political firestorm when it raided the office of Rep. William J. Jefferson after wads of marked $100 bills were found in the Louisiana Democrat's freezer.

Now, with major questions about that search still unsettled, the right of investigators to gain access to lawmakers' documents and computers is shaping up as a key battleground in the sex scandal probe surrounding former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

State and federal investigators are trying to determine whether Foley's Internet exchanges with former House pages constituted a crime. Since opening a preliminary investigation a week ago, they have started interviewing former pages and congressional aides.

Authorities are now deciding whether to subpoena records from the office and home computers that Foley used, according to people who are familiar with the case and who requested anonymity because of the ongoing inquiry. Such evidence would be central in building a case against the former lawmaker.

Depending on what authorities find, they also may be interested in obtaining records from House leaders and their staffs to determine what they knew about Foley and his interaction with pages. Those requests could test a pledge by House leaders, including Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), to cooperate fully in the probe.

Lawyers for the House have taken an aggressive position in defending the right of members to limit investigators' access to official information in past cases. They have argued in the Jefferson case that even the contents of members' personal electronic devices deserve such protection.

House lawyers have already told prosecutors that they would want any requests for information to be channeled through their office. Officials did not return calls seeking comment.

"There is a potential tension between the ex-congressman's counsel who will want to restrict the ability of the FBI to look at his records, and the FBI's unwillingness to do a visibly inadequate job," said Charles Tiefer, a University of Baltimore law professor and a former deputy general counsel of the House.

Lawyers for Foley will try to keep the FBI's examination of e-mail to a minimum, Tiefer said. "But that is hardly the way to find out the full story."

Foley said through a lawyer in Florida last week that he had received no request for computers or e-mail files from investigators, but pledged to preserve the information.

The sensational two-day raid on Jefferson's office in May made headlines because it was the first time that the FBI had ever conducted a search of the office of a member of Congress. Jefferson is the target of a federal bribery probe.

The search triggered a constitutional brawl over the extent to which members of Congress must cooperate with criminal investigators. President Bush ordered the Justice Department and the House to work out rules over how to handle future requests from investigators. But no agreement was reached. The matter has been left to the courts, where it is pending.

The debate concerns the interpretation of a provision of the Constitution known as the "speech or debate" clause that gives members immunity for their legislative activities.

House lawyers contended in the Jefferson case that the law requires investigators to give members of Congress the opportunity to review their files to delete protected material before turning them over.

DOJ_NMG_0076672

Prosecutors have said that would give members a right not afforded ordinary citizens, and that giving lawmakers a chance to review files could lead to them being cleansed.

The case has not been decided, although in July, a federal appeals court ruled that Jefferson had a right, at least temporarily, to review the material sought by investigators, including paper documents and computer files.

Hundreds of pages that had been seized by investigators have been identified for review by Jefferson. But the process of turning over the computer files has proved highly cumbersome.

Though the FBI had seized the computers, an earlier court had barred agents from mining them for relevant evidence. Now, an independent, court-appointed computer forensics company has been assigned the task of trolling through the hard drives, using key words and other instructions from the FBI. The process could take months.

No one has argued yet that sexually tinged e-mail exchanges that Foley had with pages should be protected under the Constitution. Though he has resigned from Congress, Foley still has the right to determine which of his files will be turned over. "The privilege belongs to the former member. That is the historical understanding," Tiefer said.

But the lack of clear ground rules on how investigators obtain access to the material has left other aspects of the Foley case in uncharted territory.

Besides hunting for e-mail on Foley's computers, investigators may also want to plumb the backup computer servers that are operated by the House. Whether Foley has the right to limit access to those materials — or whether the right to do that belongs to the House as a whole — is unclear.

Experts in computer forensic analysis said the e-mails should be readily available on Foley's computers or through his Internet service provider, or, in the case of official e-mail, through the House e-mail system.

"E-mail is fairly easy, forensically, to look at," said Beryl Howell, a partner with Stroz Friedberg, a forensic computer analysis firm in Washington.

But retrieving instant messages can be tricky. Many online messaging services — such as AOL Instant Messenger, which Foley used — have features that allow users to disable their messages from being automatically saved on their computers. There are techniques for still obtaining the information, but that can pose problems for investigators. Instant messages "are more fleeting," Howell said.

In any event, Howell said that investigators probably would be able to retrieve the AOL "buddy list" of people with whom Foley exchanged messages. That could prove a crucial source of leads for investigators, she said.

Lawmaker Saw Foley Messages In 2000 (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

A Republican congressman knew of disgraced former representative Mark Foley's inappropriate Internet exchanges as far back as 2000 and personally confronted Foley about his communications.

A spokeswoman for Rep. Jim Kolbe (R-Ariz.) confirmed yesterday that a former page showed the congressman Internet messages that had made the youth feel uncomfortable with the direction Foley (R-Fla.) was taking their e-mail relationship. Last week, when the Foley matter erupted, a Kolbe staff member suggested to the former page that he take the matter to the clerk of the House, Karen Haas, said Kolbe's press secretary, Korenna Cline.

The revelation pushes back by at least five years the date when a member of Congress has acknowledged learning of Foley's behavior with former pages. A timeline issued by House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) suggested that the first lawmakers to know, Rep. John M. Shimkus (R-Ill.), the chairman of the House Page Board, and Rep. Rodney Alexander (R-La.), became aware of "over-friendly" e-mails only last fall. It also expands the universe of players in the drama beyond members, either in leadership or on the page board.

A source with direct knowledge of Kolbe's involvement said the messages shared with Kolbe were sexually explicit, and he read the contents to The Washington Post under the condition that they not be reprinted. But Cline denied the source's characterization, saying only that the messages had made the former page feel uncomfortable. Nevertheless, she said,

"corrective action" was taken. Cline said she has not yet determined whether that action went beyond Kolbe's confrontation with Foley.

In interviews with The Post last week, multiple pages identified Kolbe as a close friend and personal confidante who was one of the only members of Congress to take any interest in them. A former page himself, Kolbe offered to mentor pages and kept in touch with some of them after they left the program, according to the interviews.

Kolbe once invited four former pages to make use of his Washington home while he was out of town, according to an instant message between Foley and another former page, Jordan Edmund, in January 2002. The pages planned to attend a first-year reunion of their page class. But because of a snowstorm, they did not take Kolbe up on his offer, according to one of the four pages.

Cline said one of the youths invited was a former page of Kolbe's. Because the congressman frequently travels on weekends, either to his Arizona ranch or abroad, the house is often available to friends, constituents, staffers and former staff members, such as a former page, she said.

Kolbe, the only openly gay Republican in Congress, is retiring at the end of the year.

The latest revelation in the growing House page scandal comes just a month before crucial midterm elections. Foley resigned Sept. 29 after ABC News confronted him with the sexually explicit messages that he exchanged with a former page, triggering investigations by the Justice Department, the House ethics committee and Florida authorities.

Hastert and his top aides have been sharply criticized by Democrats and some conservative Republicans for failing to act promptly after receiving warnings that Foley had been sexually predatory in dealing with pages and former pages. Ron Bonjean, the speaker's spokesman, said yesterday: "Allegations of inappropriate conduct by members of Congress towards pages need to be fully reviewed by the ethics committee and law enforcement."

In addressing the revelation about Kolbe, Bonjean said, "This allegation reiterates why the speaker has also called for a full review of the House page program to ensure that it is as safe and secure as possible."

A new poll by Newsweek indicates the Foley scandal is doing significant damage to the Republicans' political fortunes and could sink their chances of holding onto control of Congress on Election Day, Nov. 7. The poll found that 52 percent of Americans, including 29 percent of Republicans, believe Hastert was aware of Foley's Internet communications with underage pages and tried to cover up Foley's actions. More of those polled, 42 percent, now say they trust Democrats to do a better job handling moral values than Republicans; 36 percent favored Republicans on the values question.

In a sharp exchange on "Fox News Sunday," Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), the vice chairman of the House Republican Conference, insinuated that Democrats were behind the revelations of Foley's actions and the release of electronic messages showing Foley having sexually graphic or highly suggestive conversations with former pages.

"What I don't understand is where have these e-mails been for three years? Are we saying that a 15-year-old child would have sat on e-mails that were triple-X-rated for three years and suddenly spring them out right on the eve of an election? That's just a little bit too suspicious, even for Washington, D.C.," Kingston said.

Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.) shot back, "If there's any evidence that you need that the values in Washington have turned upside down, you could just hear what Jack had to say. Only in Washington, D.C., can you take a group of people in charge of the House and basically have evidence that they've been looking the other way while a predator has been . . . going after 15- and 16-year-old pages, [and] they somehow . . . have the audacity to turn that into a political attack against Democrats."

So far, only ABC News and The Washington Post are known to have obtained the sexually explicit instant messages between two former pages and Foley. The Post obtained its copies from a former page who served on Capitol Hill with the other two pages.

Evangelicals Blame Foley, Not Republican Party (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076674

VIRGINIA BEACH, Oct. 7 — As word of Representative Mark Foley's sexually explicit e-mail messages to former pages spread last week, Republican strategists worried — and Democrats hoped — that the sordid nature of the scandal would discourage conservative Christians from going to the polls.

But in dozens of interviews here in southeastern Virginia, a conservative Christian stronghold that is a battleground in races for the House and Senate, many said the episode only reinforced their reasons to vote for their two Republican incumbents in neck-and-neck re-election fights, Representative Thelma Drake and Senator George Allen.

"This is Foley's lifestyle," said Ron Gwaltney, a home builder, as he waited with his family outside a Christian rock concert last Thursday in Norfolk. "He tried to keep it quiet from his family and his voters. He is responsible for what he did. He is paying a price for what he did. I am not sure how much farther it needs to go."

The Democratic Party is "the party that is tolerant of, maybe more so than Republicans, that lifestyle," Mr. Gwaltney said, referring to homosexuality.

Most of the evangelical Christians interviewed said that so far they saw Mr. Foley's behavior as a matter of personal morality, not institutional dysfunction.

All said the question of broader responsibility had quickly devolved into a storm of partisan charges and countercharges. And all insisted the episode would have little impact on their intentions to vote.

It is too soon to tell if the scandal will affect the turnout of evangelical Christians, who make up about a quarter of the electorate and more than a third of Republican voters. Some of President Bush's political advisers have said that pre-election reports in 2000 that Mr. Bush was once arrested for drunken driving depressed turnout among conservative Christians, nearly costing him the White House.

Pollsters and conservative leaders have said for months that grass-roots evangelicals were demoralized by what they felt was the Republicans' failure to live up to their talk about social issues — to say nothing of the economy, the Iraq war and other issues that weigh more broadly across the electorate. A recent poll by the Pew Research Center showed a steep drop in conservative Christian support for Republicans, albeit without a corresponding gain for the Democrats.

Some in the crowd waiting outside the concert, by the evangelical group MercyMe, said the revelations about Mr. Foley, Republican of Florida, had redoubled their previous concerns about the Republican Party.

"The Republicans need to tighten up their ship," said Wade Crane, a sign maker from Virginia Beach who said he usually voted Republican but had soured on the party in the last several months. "They need to stop covering themselves, using their power to protect themselves."

Charles W. Dunn, dean of the school of government at Regent University, founded here by the religious broadcaster Pat Robertson, said that so many conservative Christians were already in a funk about the party that "the Foley issue just opens up the potential floodgate for losses." The tawdry accusations, Mr. Dunn said, "give life" to the charges of Republican corruption that had been merely "latent" in the minds of many voters.

But as far as culpability in the Foley case, Mr. Dunn said, House Republicans may benefit from the evangelical conception of sin. Where liberals tend to think of collective responsibility, conservative Christians focus on personal morality. "The conservative Christian audience or base has this acute moral lens through which they look at this, and it is very personal," Mr. Dunn said. "This is Foley's personal sin."

To a person, those interviewed said that Speaker J. Dennis Hastert of Illinois should resign if he knew of the most serious claims against Mr. Foley and failed to stop him. They said the degree of Mr. Hastert's responsibility remained to be seen. Many said the issue had not changed their view of Congress because, in their opinion, it could not sink any lower.

But all also noted that the swift Democratic efforts to broaden the scandal to Mr. Hastert and other Republicans had added more than a whiff of partisanship to the stink of the scandal.

As the details were emerging last Tuesday, for example, Phil Kellam, the Democrat challenging Ms. Drake, called on her to demand Mr. Hastert's immediate resignation. In a statement, Mr. Kellam said the House Republican leaders' "lack of attention" was "perhaps more shocking" than what Mr. Foley had done.

DOJ_NMG_0076675

Drew Lankford, a spokesman for Mr. Kellam, said the attacks on Ms. Drake had "painted her into a corner" because she was unwilling to denounce Mr. Hastert. Ms. Drake has said she will wait for a thorough investigation into what Mr. Hastert knew. (The matter has come up less in the Senate race between Mr. Allen and Jim Webb, the Democrat.)

Brian Courtney, a Republican-leaning sales manager attending the concert, said the Foley affair had led to "the kind of mudslinging one would expect to see at an election time like this." He added that he was paying closer attention to the "values and character" of the candidates, and that he would probably vote Republican again.

Republicans have put up a vigorous defense, mainly through conservative allies and on talk radio. An e-mail message to talk-radio hosts from the Republican Party last week asked, "How would Democrats react if one of their own had a sexual relationship with an intern, was found out, then lied to a grand jury in an attempt to cover it up?"

Rush Limbaugh devoted much of his airtime to the Democrats' defense of President Bill Clinton in the Monica Lewinsky scandal. Sean Hannity focused on former Representative Gerry Studds, a Massachusetts Democrat who in 1983 admitted having sex with a teenage male page, won re-election and served several more terms with the support of his colleagues.

Still, many conservative churchgoers said that what stood out for them was not the politics but the individual sin. "It is not going to affect my vote because I don't live in Florida," said Scott O'Connell, a mechanical engineer who described himself as a fundamentalist. "But there is a bigger moral issue which I would say is the prism I view this through: I do not believe in homosexuality."

David Thomas, a father taking his family to the concert, said that he, too, was leaning toward voting Republican and that the scandal only reinforced his conservative Christian convictions. "That is the problem we have in society," Mr. Thomas said. "Nobody polices anybody. Everybody has a 'right' to do whatever."

In an interview on Friday, Pastor Anne Gimenez of the 15,000-member Rock Church here said the scandal "doesn't change the issues we are voting on," like abortion, public expression of religion and same-sex marriage.

The church has been actively registering parishioners and reminding them to vote. "Every Sunday already," Ms. Gimenez said.

Fugitive Doctor Charged In Wife's Cyanide Death Arrested Overseas (AP)

By Joe Milicia, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 10, 2006

CLEVELAND — A fugitive doctor charged in the cyanide poisoning death of his wife has been arrested in Cyprus and will be sent back to the United States to face trial, the FBI said Monday.

Yazeed Essa, 38, of Gates Mills, east of Cleveland, was arrested Saturday as he attempted to clear customs in Cyprus after arriving on a flight from Beirut, Lebanon, the FBI said in a news release.

Essa was arrested on a charge of unlawful flight to avoid prosecution stemming from a charge of aggravated murder filed against him in February. He will be held in Cyprus until U.S. authorities extradite him to Cleveland.

She was driving to see a movie when she lost control of her sport utility vehicle and was involved in a minor crash about five miles from the couple's home in suburban Gates Mills.

Before she died, she used her cell phone to call a friend, and gasping for air, said that her husband made her take calcium pills and she didn't feel well. Prosecutors say it's their key piece of evidence in the case.

Prosecutors say Essa, known as "Yaz," was a philanderer. They characterized the murder as "divorce substitute," saying he was having an affair with a nurse and wanted to be free of his 38-year-old wife.

His lawyer, Larry Zukerman, said he could not comment yet because he did not have all the facts about Essa's confinement.

Scott Wilson, an FBI agent in Cleveland, said Cyprus authorities questioned Essa because they suspected his travel documents were fraudulent. Cyprus officials checked with the international police agency Interpol to make an identification, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0076676

Rosie Essa's family issued a statement that said, "We are hopeful that this development will lead to the answers that we have been seeking since Rosie's death and will mark the beginning of the end of this heartbreaking ordeal for our family."

The family said that largely out of concern for the Essa children they will have no further comment while they await the outcome of the legal process.

Rosie Essa's brother and sister-in-law took custody of the Essas' two children, who were 4 and 2 when their father disappeared in March 2005.

If convicted of aggravated murder, Essa could be sentenced to 20 years to life in prison.

Essa called his wife's brothers the day of her accident and they recalled he sounded genuinely worried and upset.

When they arrived at the hospital, Essa told them with a cold, clinical finality that she was dead, his wife's relatives said. He appeared to grieve and allowed her family to make all the funeral arrangements.

Authorities believe Essa traveled to Syria, Greece and Lebanon and possibly visited Florida. His family owns property in the Palestinian territories.

Wilson said he did not know details about Essa's extradition. U.S. Department of Justice spokesman Bryan Sierra said he could not provide details about Essa's return to the states because Monday was a federal holiday and the department was closed.

FBI Looks At More Than Veco (ADN)

By Lisa Demer, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage (AK) Daily News, October 10, 2006

INQUIRY: Officials show interest in a developer and the Department of Corrections.

When FBI agents searched the Wasilla office of Rep. Vic Kohring on Aug. 31, they weren't just looking for documents related to Veco Corp., its executives and ties to lawmakers. They also wanted information about developer Marc Marlow as well as the state Department of Corrections.

That element of the ongoing FBI investigation emerged last week when Kohring's attorney, Wayne Anthony Ross, provided a copy of the search warrant to the Daily News, along with the list of items taken. Those documents, though lacking detail or context, suggest that the probe is wide-ranging and not focused on any one company, issue or individual.

No one has been charged in the investigation, and federal authorities have declined to discuss it except to say that it continues. The lead prosecutors are from the Department of Justice's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., which often handles government corruption cases.

In all, offices of six lawmakers have been searched, along with Veco offices and additional undisclosed locations. Other lawmakers whose offices weren't searched have said they were interviewed by the FBI.

Kohring, a Republican, is not the only Alaska lawmaker who hired an attorney within days of the search.

Wolfe, who declined to comment last week, has been named as one of Seattle's top criminal defense lawyers by Seattle Magazine. He's represented the famous and the infamous, from Seattle Seahawks players and judges to strip club owners and a pawnshop associate. He has worked in Alaska, representing a former Doyon Drilling Inc. worker who pleaded guilty in 1998 to concealing the dumping of hazardous materials on the North Slope.

"I think it's probably fair to assume that everybody's lawyered up," said Kevin Fitzgerald, an Anchorage defense attorney representing another of the legislators, though he wouldn't say which one.

Fitzgerald was part of the team that earlier this year won not-guilty verdicts in the federal rocket launcher case in Anchorage involving Security Aviation. The other lead defense lawyers in that case -- Paul Stockler and former U.S. Attorney Bob Bundy -- also are representing separate parties in the new FBI investigation, though they wouldn't say whom, either.

Hiring an attorney is a common practice in criminal investigations even for people who don't believe they are targets. For instance, individuals may want a lawyer to talk to prosecutors about the status of an investigation, to recover evidence taken in searches or to advise them on whether to talk and what to say.

Efforts to reach Kohring on Friday were unsuccessful, but in the past he has said he's cooperating in the investigation, is not a target and has been careful to follow all ethics rules.

Ross said he doesn't see that Kohring has done anything wrong.

"He asked me to advise him what the procedures mean and just make sure he doesn't step on his nose. He was told that he's not a suspect and of course I told him that, to be real honest with you, you can't always believe what you are told," Ross said, adding that he didn't expect any criminal charges against Kohring.

According to an FBI receipt for the property, agents took a folder with information on Marlow, phone message books, a Gateway computer from Kohring's office, fundraising notes -- which Ross said were essentially required campaign reports to the state -- a box of canceled checks, a thank-you note from Veco, bank statements, bills and an unexplained "business application and dividend papers."

"It doesn't look like anything there, any smoking guns or anything," Ross said.

Kohring and Marlow have known each other for years. Marlow hired him in 2004, according to disclosure statements that Kohring was required to file as a legislator. He reported income of $5,400 from Marlow that year and $38,100 in 2005. Kohring continues to provide "business services" for Marlow, arranging and conducting meetings, performing research and developing plans and strategies, Kohring said in an e-mail to the Daily News last month. Marlow has said that Kohring was helping him with plans to build a power plant in the Mat-Su, and Kohring has said he worked on a total of about six projects.

Reached on the telephone Friday, Marlow said he had no idea why the FBI would be interested in his relationship with Kohring. The FBI hasn't interviewed him or searched his offices, he said.

Kohring agreed to the search of his office, but the agents came prepared with a warrant that sought, among other things, any documents concerning relationships, correspondence, giving or receiving "things of value of any nature," or acts or failures to act that involved Veco executives Bill Allen, Richard Smith, Peter Leathard, Roger Chan, Veco itself, The Petroleum Club, pollster David Dittman, pollster Marc Hellenthal and Marlow.

"Cool. I made the list," Marlow joked. "What a crowd to be associated with."

The warrant also sought all correspondence between Kohring and the Alaska Department of Corrections. Ross said Kohring was questioned by the FBI about efforts to build a private prison in Whittier.

"He indicated it was a facility that Cornell was hoping to build in the past and that's apparently all they asked about that," Ross said. Cornell Cos. had teamed with Veco in the private prison endeavor, which ultimately died last year after the city of Whittier dropped its support.

Along with those of Kohring and Stevens, FBI agents searched offices of Sen. John Cowdery, R-Anchorage; Sen. Donny Olson, D-Nome; Rep. Pete Kott, R-Eagle River; and Rep. Bruce Weyhrauch, R- Juneau. Messages left for them were not returned. Kohring is the only one of the six still facing an election battle in November. Kott lost in the primary, Stevens and Weyhrauch aren't running again and the others aren't up this year.

Much of the wording on the Kohring search warrant is identical to the language on one provided by Olson's office the day after the search. Both are five pages long. In the warrants, agents sought documents concerning "anything of value" provided by Allen, the Veco chief executive officer; Smith, a Veco vice president; or Veco itself to any public official. Agents were also looking for documents concerning the creation of a natural gas pipeline or the new petroleum production tax. They wanted financial documents related to the legislator, including bank records, wire transfers and credit card statements. They wanted to search computers, too. But where agents sought information on Marlow and the Department of Corrections from Kohring, they wanted documents on Olson Air Service including any payments or storage fees related to aircraft from Olson, a doctor who owns a flying service.

None of the other legislators provided warrants in response to requests from the Daily News.

Stevens' legislative office is the only one searched twice, according to the FBI. In a letter to the Daily News last month, the Anchorage Republican said he agreed to both searches but had been advised not to answer questions. He didn't provide the warrant, but his letter listed what was taken by the FBI.

Many of the items hauled away were seemingly innocuous public records such as presentations on the new petroleum profits tax and a copy of the state legislative handbook. But the materials also included letters from Stevens regarding the Alaska

Fisheries Marketing Board, which he had headed since its creation by his father, U. S. Sen. Ted Stevens, until he resigned earlier this year. The board provided federal grants totaling between $5 million to $10 million a year to companies to promote Alaska seafood. At least three of the grant beneficiaries paid consulting fees to Ben Stevens.

The FBI also took "unknown documents" of Ted Stevens with a June 5 cover page and a Jan. 23 faxed letter to "T. Stevens."

Ted Stevens has repeatedly declined to comment and last month explained why in an e-mail sent through his spokesman.

"I understand the public's interest in the investigation. It has always been my practice to not comment on such matters to avoid even the appearance that I might influence the investigation. That is especially important in this case where records have been obtained from a number of legislators, including my son Ben. Therefore, I am withholding comment about this matter and will not discuss it," Stevens said in the Sept. 27 e-mail.

The FBI investigation at a glance

What's known:

• Dozens of FBI agents executed about two dozen search warrants Aug. 31 and Sept. 1, though in some cases individuals agreed to the search.

• Six legislative offices were searched, and so was Veco Corp. Searches were conducted in Anchorage, Juneau, Eagle River, Wasilla, Willow and Girdwood. The office of Senate President Ben Stevens was then searched a second time, on Sept. 18.

• One search warrant, provided by Sen. Donny Olson, said the FBI was looking for "any and all documents" related to Veco, four of its executives and two political pollsters, as well as information on Olson Air Service, among other matters. When agents searched Stevens' office, they seized materials related to controversial fisheries organizations. In the search of Rep. Vic Kohring's office, agents also sought information on developer Marc Marlow and on the state Department of Corrections.

• The lead prosecutors on the case are from the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section in Washington, D.C., which handles public corruption cases.

• No one has been charged.

What's not known:

• Perhaps the biggest of the many unanswered questions is this: Who or what is being targeted?

• Authorities also won't say how many FBI agents or prosecutors are working on the investigation, when it began, when it might end or how they are proceeding.

Schools Chief Tried To Get Work For His Pal (FREEP)

By Chastity Pratt And Jennifer Dixon, Free Press Staff Writers

Detroit Free Press, October 10, 2006

Friend focus of FBI probe

Detroit Public Schools Superintendent William F. Coleman III urged a firm vying for district contracts to seek consulting help last fall from a friend who is under investigation for allegedly accepting illegal favors as a top school official in Dallas.

Coleman acknowledged to the Free Press that he knew the FBI was investigating his friend, Ruben Bohuchot, at the time Coleman suggested Bohuchot to the Detroit company. “This was a way to help an old friend, who's unemployed, to make a few dollars,” Coleman said of connecting Bohuchot with Detroit-based Information Solutions Group Services.

“In hindsight, I guess that was a stupid decision.”

Late Monday afternoon, as the Free Press was to publish a story about Coleman's actions, he issued a statement recommending the district cancel and rebid the contract linked to Information Solutions.

Making reference to Bohochot without naming him, Coleman's statement defended both his friend and the contract award. But, Coleman wrote, “unjustified clouds of suspicion” now hang over the contract, causing “a needless distraction.”

It remains unclear to what extent, if any, Bohuchot helped Information Solutions or any other vendor win work with the district. But Coleman's decision to recommend a friend under criminal investigation had the superintendent questioning his own judgment, and school board members Monday joining in.

“Oh, my gosh,” said board vice president Joyce Hayes-Giles when told of Coleman's actions.

“There are a number of issues we have under review and that was just one of them,” she said. “We may have to rebid the whole thing.”

Board president Jimmy Womack said he didn't believe Bohuchot's friendship with Coleman affected who received work. But, he added:

“We certainly have to take into consideration any influence those relationships may have had on the recommendation that came from the superintendent to the board,” Womack said.

The district's actions Monday were but the latest controversy surrounding the recent award of $58 million in technology contracts. The district announced in July it was replacing Detroit-based Compuware, which had performed district technology work since 2001, with four smaller vendors. Compuware appealed and questioned the bidding process.

Compuware spokesman Doug Kuiper said the company “looks forward to a fair and open rebidding process.”

Ruben Bohuchot has been under investigation by the FBI since the summer of 2005, when the Dallas Morning News reported that Bohuchot, then technology chief for Dallas schools, routinely accepted the free use of a luxury sports-fishing yacht owned by Micro System Enterprises, a major computer vendor to the Dallas district. That probe has since been joined by the Federal Communications Commission.

Long-time friends

Coleman said Saturday that he has been friends with Bohuchot for a decade. They first met in San Francisco, where Coleman was that district's finance chief and Bohuchot the technology chief. They then landed in Dallas, where they held the same roles. The pair even traveled to Alaska together in 2001 to go fishing.

After the newspaper report last year, Bohuchot was placed on paid suspension by Dallas and eventually left the district.

Bohuchot's troubles were well publicized last fall when Coleman said he ran into Julius Bender, owner of Information Solutions Group.

Coleman said he casually asked Bender if he planned to bid on soon-to-expire technology contracts. Bender said he didn't know where to start with writing a proposal, and asked Coleman if he knew anyone who could help him, Coleman said.

Coleman recommended Bohuchot.

“I didn't know that it went any further than that,” Coleman said. He added: “I just don't believe there is a relationship” between Bohuchot and Bender. “But if I've been misled by Ruben before, perhaps I've been misled again.”

Bohuchot, who is still listed as living in Dallas, could not be reached for comment.

Bender confirmed Coleman's account of their meeting. But he said that while he may have spoken with Bohuchot by phone, he never hired him. “We didn't pursue a relationship,” Bender said. “He's not in this deal with us. I swear.”

While Bender's company never bid directly on technology contracts, it partnered in the winning bid of another company, GVC Networks LLC, for the district's telecommunications and information technology services. It's that bid, which was to pay $726,000 annually, that Coleman sought to cancel Monday.

Stephanie Grimes, a spokeswoman for GVC, said GVC was supposed to sign the contract Tuesday.

“We believe we provided a solid proposal.” she said.

Grimes confirmed that Bender's company was supposed to work with GVC when GVC bid on the technology work. But she said when GVC only secured the telecommunications portion of the contract, it no longer needed Bender's company “in no way, shape or form.”

Detroit school records show Bohuchot attended a pre-bid meeting in Detroit in January for companies interested in the technologies contracts.

He signed in using the address and phone number for Bender's company - though Bohuchot incorrectly listed the company as “Integrated” Solutions.

Bender said last week he has no idea why Bohuchot used his company's address to sign in.

Coleman said he did not know Bohuchot had traveled to Detroit until a board member inquired about Bohuchot at the July meeting when the contracts were approved. Coleman acknowledged that he did not tell the board about his ties to Bohuchot at the time.

DOJ_NMG_0076680

Coleman sat on a committee that recommended the four vendors, though the board made the final choice. Since the awards, Coleman had defended the bidding process and said the new vendors will save the district millions.

Two days after the four vendors were approved, Bohuchot set up a consulting company in Dallas, Portico Consulting LLC, records show. He lists himself as a manager. The following day, DPS issued a press release naming the companies that won the contracts.

Coleman also said he was recently interviewed by the FBI about his relationship with Bohuchot, but he said the questions related to his friend's activities in Dallas, not Detroit.

"The thing that's very, very troubling to me is that there's going to be some assumption that I'm corrupt," Coleman said. "I am not corrupt, there's no aura of corruption about Bill Coleman."

DPS Will Rebid Part Of IT Contract (DEN)

Detroit News, October 10, 2006

Superintendent said to be linked to businessman who is affiliated with firm that won part of bid.

Detroit Public Schools Superintendent William F. Coleman III said Monday he will ask the school board to rescind and rebid a portion of the district's information technology contract after allegations of unfairness and "influence peddling" surfaced in the bidding process.

Compuware Corp. and Strategic Staffing Solutions asked the board last month to reconsider the companies selected in July to update and provide telecommunications services, alleging that DPS used flawed methods. Allegations have also been made that link Coleman to a Dallas acquaintance Ruben Bohuchot, who is said to be affiliated with Detroit-based Information Solutions Group, which partnered with GVC Networks LLC to win a bid from the district.

In a statement issued by Coleman last month, Coleman defended the contract approval process, saying the new contract will save DPS "millions of dollars."

"It is unfortunate that some feel that they are entitled to the IT contract even though their proposals would have cost the district as much as $30 million more," he said.

Coleman said that at a school board meeting last month, "months after the contracts were awarded," he learned about Buhuchot's attendance at a bidders' conference for the IT proposal review.

"His involvement has led to allegations and concerns of undue influence," Coleman said, adding that the claims are "completely and unequivocally false."

"My staff and I believed when we recommended that GVC/Information Solutions Group be awarded the contract that we were acting in the best interests of the district and the taxpayers of the city of Detroit. I still believe that," Coleman said in a statement issued Monday. "But it is clear that the GVC/Information Solutions Group contract is becoming a major distraction that has the potential to hamper our mission as an education institution."

GVC Networks LLC, one of four companies awarded a portion of the $58 million, five-year contract, ranked lowest in the evaluation process of 17 bidders.

Criteria included staffing plans, cost, past performance expertise and employment of minorities and women.

Representatives from GVC Networks could not be reached for comment. Julius Bender Jr., president of Information Solutions Group Inc., had no comment.

"Ever since the contracts were awarded to these companies, we've been under considerable attack," said district spokesman Lekan Oguntoyinbo.

"If there's a cloud of suspicion in anyone's mind, we need to go after that."

School Board President Jimmy Womack said the board is studying the evaluation process used to select the companies. He did not expect the board to make a decision at Thursday's school board meeting.

"Primarily, our concern is to understand more clearly the process in general and how it was applied to the IT contract," he said.

Vision IT, Management Systems Consultants, GVC Networks LLC/Information Solutions Group and Universal Sales share the technology contract.

Health Care Executive Faces New Indictment (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

The chief executive of a District-based mental health organization has been indicted on money-laundering charges months after federal prosecutors said he bilked the city's Medicaid program.

The new charges add to the legal problems faced by Ricardo F. Henry, founder of Insight Therapeutic Services Inc. He pleaded not guilty to health care fraud charges after his indictment in March.

Federal authorities said a government auditor has estimated that up to 80 percent of the Medicaid claims submitted by Mr. Henry from 1999 to 2002 were false. In addition, they said, Mr. Henry lied about having a doctorate degree.

Mr. Henry received about $500,000 from the city's Medicaid program in 2001 and 2002, prosecutors said. In the charges filed Friday, authorities said Mr. Henry committed bankruptcy fraud and money laundering.

The new charges stem in part from more than $100,000 spent by Mr. Henry for a 2001 Porsche 911 Carrera. The money, prosecutors said, was obtained through health care fraud. Authorities also say he registered the car in another person's name in New York to hide the purchase from creditors.

Mr. Henry filed for bankruptcy last year, but the case was reopened earlier this year after federal authorities raided his D.C. apartment and seized the car and other assets.

Among the other assets Mr. Henry tried to conceal from creditors were $120,000 from the sale of a home in Silver Spring and at least six firearms, including a Winchester rifle set, according to the indictment.

A status report in the criminal case issued last week states that Mr. Henry faces two trials, one for bankruptcy fraud and another for health care fraud. Mr. Henry's attorney likely will seek separate trials, while prosecutors are expected to oppose the move.

Mr. Henry's attorneys have disputed the charges, according to the status report.

"It is the defense's position that rather than cleanly charging provable offenses, the government has thrown everything but the kitchen sink into the 62-count original indictment hoping something will stick with the jury under the 'where there's smoke there's fire' theory," the report states.

But prosecutors counter in the seven-page report that they have "carefully selected the indicted counts from literally thousands of possible charges."

Predators Build Trust With Children Online (WT)

By Cheryl Wetzstein, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

Young children and teens can become sexually victimized -- especially via the Internet -- when they don't realize they are being "groomed" by canny adults, say experts on child exploitation.

To parents, "our basic message is get that [personal computer] out of the bedroom and put it in a public place and set some limits and know what your kids are doing," said Ernie Allen, president of the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

The Internet plays a huge role in child exploitation, and adults who work with youths should do so only in ways that are above reproach, Mr. Allen said.

This means "don't use instant messaging in the middle of the night," he added.

The use of e-mails and instant messages as exploitation tools has been garnering attention since recent news reports of former Rep. Mark Foley's sexually explicit electronic messages with former congressional pages, who were teenagers at the time.

The Florida Republican resigned his office, has entered an alcoholism rehabilitation program and is being investigated by law-enforcement agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0076682

"Any suggestion that Mark Foley is a pedophile is false, categorically false," Mr. Foley's attorney, David Roth, told a televised press conference in Florida last week . "Mark Foley denies ever, ever having any sexual contact with a minor."

However, Mr. Foley's online conversations with several male pages, which focused on the teens' physical activities and genitals, sound like grooming practices employed by sexual predators, sex-abuse experts said.

Typically, a relationship starts out "in a very innocent way," with the predator acting like a friend to the victim, said Lynn Parrish, spokeswoman for the Rape, Abuse and Incest National Network (RAINN).

The predator develops the friendship by giving the young person gifts, empathizing with his or her problems and building a relationship of trust, she said. But at some point, the relationship takes a sexual turn, "and because it happens gradually over time ... young people miss these cues."

"Teens don't recognize the grooming when they see it; the kid is totally oblivious to it until it's too late," said Patrick Trueman, the former head of the Justice Department's unit on child exploitation and obscenity.

Once sexual contact is made, the predator will "hold it over you," he said. He can pressure the child for more sexual contact, saying, "'Oh, if you don't do this again, I've got these pictures of you now. Your friends are going to know all about this. We're just alike. You're just like me.'"

Children and teens will feel shame and confusion and refuse to talk about what happened, even though they should, Mr. Trueman said. This, in turn, can lead to "a cycle of abuse," in which the youths become promiscuous or turn to substance abuse.

"The effects can last a lifetime unless you get help," said Ms. Parrish, who urged victims of sexual abuse to call RAINN's hot line, 800/656-HOPE.

More Calls For Death Penalty In Child Rapes (LAT)

By Lianne Hart

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

HOUSTON — With the election just a month away, politicians examining ways to stop violent sexual offenders from striking again are increasingly calling for laws that would allow states to execute repeat child molesters.

Texas Lt. Gov. David Dewhurst is the latest to join the effort, proposing a plan Oct. 3 that would require a minimum mandatory prison sentence of 25 years for first-time offenders and the possibility of death for a second conviction.

If enacted, the measure "will protect the children of Texas, and let people know to get out of our state if this is your sickness," Dewhurst campaign spokesman Enrique Marquez said. "If that's something you want to do, not in our state you won't."

In recent months, similar ideas have been pushed by lawmakers in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and even Minnesota, which doesn't have the death penalty. Most are modeled after Florida's Jessica's Law, a child-protection measure named for 9-year-old Jessica Lunsford, who was raped and killed by a registered sex offender in 2005.

This year, Oklahoma and South Carolina passed laws allowing the death penalty for the rape of a child. Execution is also an option for offenders who commit certain sex crimes against children in Montana and Louisiana.

Critics say that if child sex crimes are a capital offense, victims might be reluctant to report abuse because the offenders often are family members. "If you've got a father or brother or uncle molesting a young person, a lot of people aren't going to turn them in if it means they'll be sent to jail or put to death," said Michael Mears, director of the Georgia Public Defender Standards Council.

Another concern is that the measures might give assailants an incentive to kill the victim. "If the penalty for murder and molestation is the same, why not go ahead and kill the only witness to the event?" Mears said.

David Bruck, a law professor who directs the Virginia Capital Case Clearinghouse at Washington and Lee University in Lexington, Va., has the same concern. "To the extent that this is meant to be a way of protecting children, it may well have the opposite effect," he said.

But legislators such as Jay Paul Gumm — the state senator who sponsored Oklahoma's child sex crime bill — said that a person who would rape a child has no regard for life under any circumstance. "Anybody who would prey on the innocence of a child and destroy a soul is more than deserving of the death penalty in my way of thinking," Gumm said. "These are crimes that have lifelong effects on the victims. Some never have a normal life. It destroys life as surely as a gun to the head."

Louisiana houses the only death row inmate convicted of a child rape that did not result in murder. Patrick Kennedy, convicted in 2003 of raping an 8-year-old girl, was sentenced under a 1995 law that allows the death penalty for the rape of a child younger than 12. His case is on appeal.

In 1996, the Louisiana Supreme Court upheld the state's death penalty law for child rapists. But the Kennedy case could end in a showdown if it reaches the U.S. Supreme Court: In 1977, the high court held that a person convicted of the rape of a woman could not be sentenced to death because the punishment would be out of proportion with the crime.

"It's cruel and unusual punishment," Bruck said. "[Child rape] is a terrible crime, but it ain't murder."

Bruck said an attention-grabbing proposal to kill child sex offenders is like "political crack cocaine. It attracts publicity and people's attention at a very visceral level" but in the end, he said, does little good.

But Gumm, the Oklahoma legislator, denied that such legislation was an election-year gimmick. "Public opinion in my district and this state is extraordinarily positive toward this law," he said.

"People have grown sick and tired of instances where child molesters have gotten out of prison only to molest again," Gumm said. "This sends a message that this behavior will not be tolerated, and we are going to find you, prosecute you and exact the most severe punishment possible."

Star Witness's Cheating Ways Heating Up Trial (WP)

By Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Jaws dropped and even the judge cringed when the former D.C. government official told a jury about the brazen ways he fabricated invoices and inflated bills to steal city money for himself and his friends.

Michael Lorusso once got his bosses to hand over to him $1 million, and he used it to lease space that wasn't even usable. Besides giving contractors inflated profits, Lorusso said he gave them gifts at taxpayer expense -- including antique barbershop chairs from a city warehouse and laptop computers purchased with a city credit card.

He is the prosecution's star witness in the federal court trial of developer Douglas Jemal. Prosecutors are trying to show that Jemal bribed Lorusso in return for favorable deals. Whether Lorusso is helping to build a case against Jemal is up to the jury to decide; the defense is challenging his credibility. But Lorusso's testimony has been as much an indictment of the D.C. government and the Williams administration, which was forced to make changes amid pressure from outraged members of the D.C. Council.

In an administration that prided itself on running a clean, reform-minded government, the swaggering Lorusso, the deputy director of property management, said he approved hundreds of thousands of dollars in contractor payments for work that was never done.

Lorusso worked for the city from November 2000 to January 2003, when he was fired after the council raised questions about his deals. He later pleaded guilty to bribery conspiracy and is hoping for a reduced sentence in return for his cooperation against Jemal and two other executives from Douglas Development Corp.: Jemal's son, Norman, and Blake Esherick. He is scheduled to resume testifying today in the courtroom of Judge Ricardo M. Urbina.

Lorusso, 40, admitted arranging leases that paid Jemal yearly rent so exorbitant it equaled the developer's purchase price. Lorusso ran his own furniture and investment businesses from his District offices and computer and took hundreds of thousands of dollars in city property, including the chairs, the laptops and other items. But no one flagged it.

"On my signature, I could take anything I wanted in the District," Lorusso testified.

Until Lorusso pleaded guilty in 2004, Mayor Anthony A. Williams (D) was reluctant to admit that the city was cheated -- despite several independent audits the previous year which determined that millions were spent for construction work, authorized by Lorusso, that had never been done. In an interview with NewsChannel 8 in summer 2003, Williams questioned what proof anyone had of outright theft but acknowledged that the city needed stricter controls on contracts.

Administration officials say several loopholes Lorusso exploited have been tightened.

Then-newly arrived Herbert R. Tillery, deputy mayor for operations, was tapped in 2003 to protect the city from another Lorusso. In an interview last week, Tillery said that the city largely had safeguards and good rules in place when Lorusso was working but that they needed to be diligently enforced. He said the city now has officials within each agency review all leases, contracts and routine price increases in contracts -- instead of continuing the unusual arrangement in which Lorusso single-handedly authorized such deals.

Each agency's contracting officer is now trained to spot fraud and given stern warnings about the responsibility to protect city money. Although the city had regulations allowing it to penalize such officers for losses and improper cost overruns, Tillery said, now it follows through. Similarly, the city had a computer system for tracking contracts before Lorusso, Tillery said, but now it has improved it and required that agencies monitor such contracts monthly.

"Now there are several extra eyes on the contracting process," Tillery said. "It takes longer . . . but when we take shortcuts on contracts, that's when we get into trouble."

Lorusso was fired after the council began challenging leases for office space with Jemal's company as well as a plan to buy an impoundment lot from Jemal in Prince George's County. Council members also looked into steep payments Lorusso arranged to a contractor at One Judiciary Square, a municipal building.

The first indications of trouble surfaced in fall 2002, when the council balked at the impound lease proposal. More was revealed in the summer of 2003, when Jim Graham (D-Ward 1) completed an extraordinary council investigation into Lorusso's dealmaking, revealing, among other things, that Lorusso had "cooked" an appraisal to suggest that the city should pay $12.5 million for the impound lot. It had cost Jemal just $1.5 million four years earlier. After a council outcry, the city did not buy the lot.

Lorusso is the only D.C. government employee charged in the case. But based on his testimony, D.C. officials have more digging to do. He asserted in court that other city workers helped him break the law. Lorusso told the jury, for example, that he invited two staff members to join in a plan designed to help him get rid of a burdensome car payment. Together, they fabricated a $25,000 bill to the city for moving services from a company that employed one of the staffer's relatives, Lorusso said. The moving company then cashed a city check for the staffers, Lorusso said. The staffers gave him most of the $25,000 in return for his Audi convertible, he said.

As of Friday, the staff member were still on the Office of Property Management payroll, although one is on leave. They did not return calls.

Carol Mitten, the new director of the office, said she was surprised by what surfaced in court. "The first I heard about this dummy invoice is from the trial," she said.

Lorusso's testimony raises questions about whether more protections are needed, according to council member Adrian M. Fenty (D-Ward 4), who likely will succeed Williams as mayor next year.

"This type of waste, fraud and abuse is inexcusable, and those responsible must be held accountable," Fenty said.

Council member Carol Schwartz (R-At Large), who was the first to balk at the impound lot proposal in September 2002, said she remains mystified at how top city leaders couldn't have known some of what Lorusso was doing.

Graham said the testimony vindicates his investigation but won't satisfy the larger question taxpayers should be asking the city: "Just how did he get away with all this?"

'Liberty Dollars' Can Buy Users A Prison Term, U.S. Mint Warns (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Once upon a time, a "monetary architect" named Bernard von NotHaus decided to make his own money.

He put a beautiful Lady Liberty and a majestic flaming torch on the silver and gold coins, and he named them "Liberty Dollars." On his Web site, http://www.libertydollar.org , he said: "It is fun to use REAL money. Liberty Dollars are a proven and profitable currency that protects and grows the purchasing power of your money!"

True story, phony money. So says the U.S. Mint, which would like to remind Liberty Dollar users that since the United States already has its own currency, the only thing Liberty Dollars buy in these parts is a jail term.

DOJ_NMG_0076685

Liberty Dollars were coined by von NotHaus and an Evansville, Ind.-based group called Norfed, which stands for (sort of) the National Organization for the Repeal of the Federal Reserve Act and the Internal Revenue Code. In the late 1990s, the group began hawking its money as a hedge against inflation, and as a way to compete with the Fed. Von NotHaus makes the pitch online, using a raft of statistics and graphs that he says show the greenback is well nigh worthless.

Norfed Executive Director Michael Johnson says the group isn't aiming to overthrow the American monetary system. "We're not locking horns with the Fed. I mean, that's crazy," he said. Norfed simply wants "to offer a solution to the Federal Reserve Note," a.k.a. U.S. dollars.

Norfed struck the first gold- and silver-backed coins -- which, to avoid charges of making its own money it calls "rounds" -- in 1998 at its private mint in Idaho. Today the group claims to have more than $20 million in Liberty coins and notes in circulation, and about 2,500 merchants who accept Liberty Dollars for goods and services from doughnuts to tattoos.

But there's a potentially more sinister side to all this. A 1999 report by the Southern Poverty Law Center calls Norfed a far-right anti-government group that has "long claimed that American dollars are . . . part of a vast conspiracy by international bankers to defraud the rest of the world." The center links some Norfed devotees to far-right hate groups.

"That definitely is not the philosophy of the organization," Johnson said. "I've been a Republican for most of my life. . . . We are focused on the mainstream. . . . I guess we are libertarian. But definitely not anti-government."

The U.S. Mint acted after federal prosecutors around the country began forwarding inquiries about the coins. "We don't take these consumer alerts lightly," said spokeswoman Becky Bailey. "Merchants and banks are confronted by confused customers demanding they accept Liberty Dollars. These are not legal coin."

Norfed responded to the Mint on its Web site. "Here it is in plain sight . . . the Liberty Dollar is not a coin, not legal tender, and backed with inflation proof gold and silver!"

"Goliath just introduced David to millions of Americans as a nationally recognized underdog," the site continues. "Just as Pepsi went up against Coke with their 'take the Pepsi Challenge' campaign, the Liberty Dollar will take it to the people to decide which currency they should use."

Norfed encouraged people to keep doing "the drop," referring to its advice to drop the coin into merchants' hands so they can feel its weight.

That could land the dropper in prison, Bailey warns, for up to five years.

L.A. Police Say Killing Of 3-Year-Old In Gang Attack Was Intentional (LAT)

By Richard Winton And Erika Hayasaki, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

Kaitlyn Avila, 3, was shot at point-blank range after her father was wounded in the gang-related attack in Baldwin Village, police say.

A 3-year-old girl, fatally shot as her family arrived home after a Sunday afternoon trip to McDonalds, was intentionally targeted by a teenage gang member who fired at point-blank range, police said Monday.

The announcement, which came as detectives sought the public's help in finding the killer, prompted new anxiety in the Southwest Los Angeles neighborhood of Baldwin Village, which has struggled with gang violence for decades.

Though police said they don't know the motive for the girl's slaying, some parents expressed fear that the Oct. 1 shooting was a twisted gang initiation gone tragically wrong.

A joint task force of the Los Angeles Police Department and FBI, which has been investigating Kaitlyn Avila's death, arrested one suspect. But Jonathan Banks, the 17-year-old suspected of pulling the trigger, is still being sought.

LAPD Deputy Chief Charles Beck said the killer approached Kaitlyn, her father and her 6-year-old sister as they were getting out of the car outside their apartment building.

He shot and wounded Cesar Avila, a glass worker, erroneously believing that he was a member of a rival gang. He then aimed his gun at Kaitlyn and shot her once in the chest, police said.

"This wasn't an accident or case of her getting caught in the fire," Beck said. "He intended to kill her. This was callous killing. It is beyond even what gangsters consider usual."

DOJ_NMG_0076686

Authorities said they pieced together the chain of events after interviewing people who witnessed the shooting, as well as Cesar Avila and Kaitlyn's sister Kassey, who was unhurt in the attack.

The shooting occurred at 2:45 p.m. on a block of densely packed apartment buildings. Several people were outside and saw the attack, detectives said.

Beck said Kaitlyn's death underscored the continuing gang problems in Baldwin Village, a neighborhood of less than a square mile between La Brea Avenue and Crenshaw Boulevard off Coliseum Street.

The revelations stunned residents there.

One mother, who asked that her name not be used, suggested that the shooter was trying to "earn his stripes" and gain respect from gang members.

"I don't even feel safe walking down the street," said a 20-year-old woman who was holding her 5-year-old son's hand.

Another mother, Joy Daniels, 17, carried her 1-year-old daughter home from day care, across the street from a memorial for Kaitlyn that was overflowing with teddy bears, flowers and candles.

She said she was scared to drop her daughter off every morning, fearing that bullets from outside the school might somehow find her daughter.

The thought of the killer deliberately targeting a child gave her chills. Daniels said she wanted to knock some sense into the shooter.

She wished she could ask him: "How do you feel? Do you have remorse? You just took her little life, and on top of that it was intentional?"

The killer may have earned the respect of gang members, Daniels said, but the community was disgusted with him.

"I just pray and ask God to watch over all these little kids," she said.

The LAPD's Beck and Kaitlyn's father, Cesar Avila, appealed Monday for the public's help in finding Banks, who is believed to be in the Los Angeles area.

"We're heartbroken, we're very heartbroken for the death of my daughter," Avila said.

"We ask the suspect to turn himself in," he said, his voice breaking.

"Even though it won't bring my daughter back, at least we know more innocent people won't get hurt," he said. "I don't care so much for what he did to me, but for what he did to my daughter."

Avila and his daughters were getting out of their car outside their Pinafore Street home when the killer jumped out of a gray Chrysler Pacifica and began firing a 9-millimeter handgun. Both the shooter and the driver, identified as Laron Lee Larrimore, allegedly shouted gang slogans.

Avila spent nine days in the hospital, some of them in critical condition.

"Something made me come back," he said. "The whole time I was thinking about my [other] daughter. I still had something."

Avila said it was hard for him to return to his home, where his daughter's bedroom overlooks the crime scene.

The LAPD has focused considerable resources recently on cracking down on gang violence in Baldwin Village, with help from the U.S. Justice Department, police officials said. Though crime in Baldwin Village is down, officials said, the influence of gangs remains strong.

"The monster of gangsterism in South Los Angeles is the cause of this shooting," Beck said.

Two warring gangs occupy the area: the Black P-Stones, a mostly black gang, and 18th Street, a mostly Latino gang.

Though the victims were Latino and the suspects African American, police officials said they believe the shooting was gang-related, not racial.

Police released a photo of Banks and described him as African American, 6 feet 4 and about 200 pounds. They said he should be considered armed and dangerous.

A $50,000 reward is being offered for information leading to arrests and convictions in the case.

Detectives can be reached at (213) 485-2417 or (877) 529-3855, a 24-hour toll-free number.

As police hunted for Banks, some Baldwin Village residents said they had had enough.

DOJ_NMG_0076687

Gabriela Vasquez, 21, walked her two nephews home from school Monday afternoon, past the spot where police found Kaitlyn's body.

"It's not hard to believe," Vasquez said. "They thought the little girl saw them. She's little, but if she [saw] them again she could point them out."

Vasquez said she planned to leave Baldwin Village this year because of the gang violence.

"These people out here, they just don't care," Vasquez said. "They kill little kids and even the elderly."

Pirating Songs Of Praise (LAT)

By Geoff Boucher, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 9, 2006

Some Christian music fans believe digital downloading is a way to spread the Word. Other voices tell them: Thou shalt not steal.

Regina Kennedy prides herself on being a good Christian, so when the pastor at her Pentecostal church in Delaware called it a sin to download gospel songs without paying for them, her heart began to race.

The out-of-work driver went home and stared at her download collection, which included artists such as Yolanda Adams, Kirk Franklin and others. "The songs are so beautiful, and I couldn't afford to buy them all," the 43-year-old said. "I just didn't know what to do."

In the end, she deleted every song. She's still not sure, though, that she was really stealing. "I don't know what to think, really."

Kennedy is hardly alone among conflicted fans of Christian music, but her decision to erase her library does set her apart from most of them, especially younger ones. Surveys show that born-again Christian teens are just as active in stealing and swapping music as their secular peers who pinch the latest Eminem rap hit or Kelly Clarkson power ballad.

Take Matthew, a 13-year-old who attends Hewes Middle School in North Tustin and attends youth programs at nearby Red Hill Lutheran Church. Asked if it's wrong to take songs for free, he answered: "No, because the artists are making billions of dollars anyways." Another kid at Red Hill, 16-year-old Mike, a student at Beckman High, said that music is beyond commerce or at least beyond the cash register: "They should give it away 'cause it's art anyways."

Those attitudes, along with the arrival of an edgy and restless new generation of artists and lean times in the music industry, have created a clash between familiar imperatives: Spread the Word and Thou shalt not steal.

"We are all conflicted, it's true," said John Styll, president of the Gospel Music Trade Assn. "This is not a business first, but it still must be a business at some point to keep going."

Styll's association was behind a campaign called "Millions of Wrongs Don't Make a Right," which used well-known Christian artists as spokespeople against piracy, but Styll said the perception lingers that all music stars are fabulously wealthy, and he wonders how effective they are as voices in the debate anyway.

His association is preparing to go to youth events and organizations in coming months with presentations that frame the question of digital downloading as a purely ethical issue. That's a far different tack than the mainstream music industry, led by the Recording Industry Assn. of America, which has used legal action and language to spook young pirates.

"The RIAA feels it can't address it as a moral issue, but we certainly can, and our audience should be more receptive to that," said Styll, who seemed plainly exasperated with the notion of young churchgoers taking music illicitly. "It's like stealing. You wouldn't walk into a Christian bookstore and steal a Bible off the shelf.... some fans say, 'This music is made to spread the Word, and I'm just helping.' Well, this is also about people's livelihoods."

"Christian music" is an unwieldy and misleading name for a music market that is big enough to cover recent releases from artists as disparate as Ohio pop-punk band Relient K, smooth L.A. gospel singers Mary Mary, country singer Alan Jackson and P.O.D., a hip-hop and reggae tinged band from San Diego.

It's hard to imagine fans with music tastes eclectic enough to embrace all the artists on that list. But as a collective, the sector just got some great news. Christian music sales, both on CD and via paid download, over the first six months of 2006 were 11% higher than during the same period in 2005. That double-digit surge stands in stark contrast to the rest of the music industry, which experienced a 4% decline during the same time period. And no other genre has a 2006 sales jump anywhere near the level of the Christian sector.

When the six-month numbers were released, industry leaders said the figures showed that efforts such as the "Millions of Wrongs" campaign were making in-roads. But that view may be a leap of faith, says Joe Fleischer, chief of marketing for Big Champagne, a top barometer of online media activity.

Fleischer said the uptick in Christian music sales was more than matched by a jump in Christian music that was traded on peer-to-peer networks, e-mailed as file attachments and (the new popular mode of youth distribution) via digital files tucked into instant messages.

While much new revenue came in, more was missed, Fleischer said, adding that the same zealous fans that are taking their music for free are also minting new stars for a genre that is amid a major crossover into mainstream rock.

"That increase in sales is driven by what's going on with these newer acts, and all of that is happening on the Internet," Fleischer said. "Bands like Underoath."

Underoath is a Florida hard-core band whose spiritual message is delivered with a sonic style not intended for the faint of heart. The messages too are far from the psalms or greeting-card sentiments that the term "Christian music" conjures up. Take its wrenching song on abortion, "Burden in Your Hands":

So they take your life before your first breath / When will it stop, the killings continue / Babies die every day because of a pro choice made / Helpless and innocent they are put to death.

The six-member band shocked the music industry in June when its most recent album debuted at No. 2 on the nation's pop charts despite zero airplay on mainstream commercial radio and no presence on MTV.

It wasn't a surprise to fans who visited the band's page on MySpace.com, the Internet portal that has become a pop culture echo chamber. On the Underoath page, the digital player shows their songs have been listened to close to 17 million times.

The upheaval in Christian music circles isn't limited to rock and edgy youngsters.

The traditional Nashville scene, with its country-tinged sound and its Heartland appeal with artists such as Amy Grant and Steven Curtis Chapman, has lost jobs, Styll said, especially because the revenues for artists are limited by lower royalty payments from church and religious outlet performances. That has made the trade association especially stern, but it's set the stage for maverick attitudes as well.

Take singer-songwriter Derek Webb, an up-and-coming Christian recording artist who has not only received good reviews for his tour but also a flurry of coverage in industry outlets such as Billboard magazine. The reason? He's opted to give away a full download of his new album for three months on the Internet. He had sold 17,000 copies (both as CDs and downloads) since its December release and has given away 50,000 more since the download offer began in September. In exchange for the free music, he asks only that fans give him the names of five more people to e-mail about his music.

The idea came to him after he sold enough copies to break even financially on the project. The free-music period will pay off in the long run, he says, by building his career and also spreading the spiritual message of his music. His concerts have, in recent weeks, jumped from audiences of about 100 to crowds of 500 and more, he said.

"I can't think that's a coincidence and all of this, it's a huge part of my future," he said. Webb categorizes his music as songs of protest in an industry more comfortable with shiny happy platitudes.

"I don't think most Christian music is very good — I don't like it and I don't listen to it," the 32-year-old Nashville singer said. He pointed to the growth of rock and metal acts with Christian messages that use the Internet to bond with young fans and sidestep the traditional industry mechanisms. "Forgive me for saying it this way, but that looks a lot more like Jesus to me than packaging some album and telling people what to do with their art. "

In a Times entertainment poll this summer, teens were asked about downloading songs from an unauthorized file-sharing network. Among those who identified themselves as religious (of any faith), 63% said they would never do it. Among teens who did not describe themselves as religious, it was a similar proportion at 61%.

Those numbers didn't surprise Styll because he had seen even more distressing stats when his trade association commissioned a study in 2004 by the Barna Group, a Ventura research and strategy company that focuses on young Christian consumers.

That survey found that about 1 in 10 born-again Christian teens believe it is morally wrong to take and share songs. The ones who do have second thoughts often said that they felt the religious connection the music provided them made it all less objectionable.

"What we're seeing is young people and youth pastors are bringing this moral perspective that, well, it's not exactly right to download the music, but from their point of view they're doing it for greater good, and in their minds that offsets it to some degree," said David Kinnaman, vice president of Barna Group.

Top executives in the Christian music industry have lobbied on Capitol Hill for protections for music and other copyrighted material. But the tougher rooms to win over are at church halls such as the one at Red Hill Lutheran Church.

At any given time there about 120 kids in the programs, from fourth-graders through college-age young adults. Isaiah Coughran, co-leader of the church's youth ministry, noted that the congregation is relatively affluent, so the youngsters who take music for free have other options.

"The kids here are split on it. We get both ends, for sure — the kid that has 7,000 songs and the kid that won't do it because it's stealing," Coughran said. "We want them to make their own decision, but at least be aware of the issues and talk about them."

Some of the kids chew on the debate for a minute but then swallow it with a shrug: "They're teenagers and they say, 'It's what I want to do,' and that sort of flattens the argument for them, just like with anything."

Coughran himself was in a Christian punk-pop band called Value Pac that got as far as a record contract on an indie label. That's when Coughran noticed that their music was available on Napster and pinging through the Internet for free.

"For me, I was actually thrilled, because part of what I wanted to do was share the message of the music," he said. "And one big way to spread the Word — any word — was Napster, right? I wasn't doing it so much for the money, so the message was more important to me. It's different if you need to do it for a living, though, isn't it? That changes everything."

Threats Of Violence As Homes For Sex Offenders Cluster In Suffolk (NYT)

By Corey Kilgannon

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

MASTIC, N.Y. — Not long after four men moved into the small ranch-style home at 115 Eleanor Avenue this summer, one man is said to have readied a special greeting.

Donald Keegan, a fellow resident of this working-class Suffolk County town, prepared a concoction of paint thinner and road flares to burn the place and, the police said, kill the occupants, who had all recently served prison time for crimes including rape and sodomy.

The four housemates, ranging in age from 36 to 74, were all registered as Level 3 sex offenders, the highest rating, saved for those the state deems “most likely to re-offend.” One had attacked a man in a wheelchair; the others’ victims were girls ages 8, 9 and 11.

Mr. Keegan was arrested before the plot could be carried out, but his case has exposed a raw and widespread fear over spreading clusters of sex offenders in Suffolk County’s lower-income neighborhoods, like Mastic — where opponents say 76 offenders live within a five-mile radius — and nearby Coram and Gordon Heights, where 39 offenders, most having assaulted children, live within a square half-mile, many grouped in the same houses. This is the highest concentration of Level 2 and 3 offenders on Long Island.

As laws across the country have radically restricted where sex offenders can live once released from prison, a growing number of landlords here and elsewhere are marketing their properties to the ex-convicts, who often receive government rent subsidies. While some landlords see a business opportunity or even a moral calling in opening their doors to such a vilified population, many residents say the clusters threaten the safety of their children.

Mr. Keegan, 36, is in the Suffolk County Jail in Riverhead, with bail set at $1 million, and is facing a sentence of up to 25 years on charges of attempted murder and attempted arson. A county maintenance worker, he lives with his wife and their 2-year-old daughter on Patchogue Avenue, whose residents include two convicted child rapists, state records show.

In a jailhouse interview, Mr. Keegan insisted on his innocence but said, "I would do anything to protect my daughter."

The situation at 115 Eleanor developed even as the authorities moved to evict the four men, having decided that after-school programs at the community center on the Poospatuck Indian Reservation — a block from the house — should have disqualified the site for sex offenders. A new county law took effect in June barring registered offenders from living within a quarter-mile of a school, playground or licensed day care center.

Though two of the four offenders have already moved out of the house, state and local politicians are now scrambling to reduce these clusters; one Suffolk County lawmaker has introduced legislation that would bar the Department of Social Services from putting more than one offender in a single house.

Charles Manolakos, who owns 115 Eleanor Avenue, defended his tenants as "citizens who have paid their debt and have a right to live there." But Joyce Pulliam, who lives across the street, complained that the authorities "protect the sex offenders more than us."

"They're letting four and five offenders gather in a single house to create little sex offender clubs to prey on our children," said Ms. Pulliam, who has worked strenuously to rally neighbors against the newcomers to her block. "The police have the manpower to arrest Keegan, but they don't have the manpower to protect us from sex offenders."

Situated between the high-priced Hamptons and the densely populated, upper-middle-class precincts of Nassau County, this area over the past decade has become a magnet for sex offenders upon their release from prison.

Of some 24,000 registered sex offenders in the state, 825 live in Suffolk County, nearly twice the 452 in neighboring Nassau, whose population is only slightly smaller. Some blame the county's Department of Social Services for referring offenders to landlords who have bought inexpensive houses in neighborhoods with little political clout.

"D.S.S. has seen this building for a long time in these neighborhoods, and they've never done anything to stop it," said Laura Ahearn, executive director of Parents for Megan's Law, a national group based on Long Island that works to prevent sexual abuse of children.

But given the number of sex offenders in Suffolk, "There is no way they could all be placed in neighborhoods without kids," said Dennis Nowak, a Social Services spokesman.

Required by state law to help find and finance housing for sex offenders released from prison, the department refers offenders to nonprofit agencies, which connect them with landlords who will accept them — and the $309 monthly rent stipend allocated by the county — in homes that meet state and local regulations.

"This is an issue that communities across the country are facing, and there's no easy solution," Mr. Nowak said. "We've become a lightning rod for the issue, but it's much bigger than us."

The lightning struck in Mastic this summer, when the four men moved into the Eleanor Avenue house, paying $550 each per month. It is next door to a family with seven young children, and across the avenue from a residence for 12 women recovering from drug and alcohol abuse.

"With all these kids on this block and 12 vulnerable women in a house, this is where they allow a house full of sex offenders?" said one of the women, Denise Mello, 32, a recovering heroin addict.

Soon, parents on the block began keeping their children indoors. Neighbors picketed in front of the house, and members of the Mastic Park Civic Association went door to door distributing fliers with the offenders' names, police photos and criminal records.

At one homeowners' meeting at the local library, a resident, not Mr. Keegan, stood up and said, "I'll burn the house down," recalled the civic association president, John Sicignano. In response, he said, "Fifty people stood up and started clapping."

"He definitely expressed it the wrong way, but who knows, if something threatened my kid, maybe I'd react the same way," Mr. Sicignano, 49, who runs an aircraft engineering firm, said of Mr. Keegan.

Mr. Manolakos commented ironically: "This guy was doing what the whole neighborhood wanted to do. He's a local hero."

DOJ_NMG_0076691

Mr. Keegan said that his lawyer had warned him not to talk about the case, and that he was a law-abiding man with no time for mischief.

"I have three jobs," said Mr. Keegan, who does private landscaping after his maintenance work with the county. "I come home exhausted every night and turn on the Discovery Channel."

Mr. Keegan denied plotting to burn down the house Sept. 9, when he was arrested with road flares on the front seat of his Ford Mustang. The police, acting on a tip, had sent a detective to befriend Mr. Keegan and caught his threats on tape.

Fred Hollman, 36, who served time for first-degree rape of an 11-year-old girl, moved into 115 Eleanor Avenue in June after living briefly in western Suffolk County, but said in an interview in September that he was looking for a new home because of the furor.

"The last place I was staying, in Brentwood, all the neighbors knew about my status and were friends with me," he said. "We all hung out together." But, Mr. Hollman added, he has four children and "wouldn't want them living around sex offenders either." Mr. Hollman said he saw Mr. Keegan "in and out of the neighbors' houses a bunch of times" before his arrest.

Mr. Manolakos, who co-owns a number of homes on Long Island and rents rooms mostly to mentally disabled tenants, says he plans to fight the mid-September order to remove the sex offenders within 45 days. He argued that that the Indian reservation, a 250-resident maze of scruffy suburban streets lined with smoke shops and trailer homes, has no legal bearing on the block, since it operates as its own sovereign territory, outside of many state laws and regulations.

"They just want to live their lives," said Bernadette Parks, whose mother, Mary Dodson, rents to 27 offenders in 11 houses in a small area in Coram and Gordon Heights nicknamed Dodsonville.

On a single block of Homestead Avenue, Mrs. Dodson owns homes filled with 15 offenders, said Mrs. Parks, who manages the properties. The extended Dodson family, with many young children, lives in the surrounding neighborhood.

"They're being closely watched, and they're more scared than the other folks here," said Mrs. Parks, a devout Christian who sees the family's thriving rental operation as a kind of religious mission, and invites the sex offenders to join her grandchildren in tending rabbits, for therapy.

"My grandchildren all play on this block," Mrs. Parks said, cradling a bowl of newborn bunnies in her living room. "That's how much I trust these people. They've been deemed to enter back into society and they'll have to suffer the rest of their lives with being labeled."

Don't tell that to Chief Harry Wallace, who runs the Poospatuck Indian Reservation. A Dartmouth-educated lawyer with a ponytail, he keeps two sets of business cards on his desk, one for his law practice, the other for his Poospatuck Smoke Shop and Trading Post.

"What these landlords are doing by renting out to sex offenders," Chief Wallace said, "are undermining communities trying to better themselves."

California Prosecutor's Novel Gets Her Bumped From A Case (NYT)

By Adam Liptak

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

A California prosecutor's fictional alter ego has gotten her kicked off a real-life case.

In January, Joyce Dudley, a deputy district attorney in Santa Barbara, published a crime novel called "Intoxicating Agent." Its heroine, Jordon Danner, has the same initials and the same job as Ms. Dudley, and the novel concerns a rape case with echoes of a real one. In both, the victim said she had been sexually assaulted after being given an intoxicating drug.

Acting on a motion from the real defendant in a real rape-by-intoxication case, an appeals court in Ventura, Calif., ruled on Thursday that Ms. Dudley's novel had crossed an ethical line.

"She has a disabling conflict of interest," Justice Kenneth R. Yegan of the California Court of Appeal wrote of Ms. Dudley for a unanimous three-judge panel.

Ms. Dudley must be disqualified, Justice Yegan continued, because the defendant, Massey Haraguchi, "is being prosecuted for raping an intoxicated person while the prosecutor is promoting her novel involving the identical charge."

DOJ_NMG_0076692

Justice Yegan wrote that Ms. Dudley's desire for money and fame might tempt her to throw the book at the defendant, as it were.

"Dudley will garner no laurels, and the case will not generate favorable media publicity for her book," Justice Yegan wrote, "if she enters into a negotiated settlement."

The question of whether a lawyer's freelance fiction can require disqualification was both novel and important, Justice Yegan wrote. He said he hoped "that this case of first impression will make a lasting impression."

Ms. Dudley declined to comment. "The litigation is still pending," she said, "and it would be unethical for me to respond in any way."

In a sworn statement filed in opposition to the disqualification motion, Ms. Dudley said her book was not based on a real case.

"The fact that I have written and published this fictional book," she added, "has not affected or impacted any of my decisions in this case."

Robert M. Sanger, a lawyer for Mr. Haraguchi, declined to comment. In his own sworn statement, Mr. Sanger said that aspects of Ms. Dudley's book were based on a separate rape-by-intoxication case that twice ended in hung juries and was eventually dismissed.

Mr. Sanger was Ms. Dudley's adversary in the other case, too. In the Haraguchi case, Mr. Sanger wrote, Ms. Dudley refused to discuss a settlement though she conceded that no other prosecutor in her office was willing to pursue the case.

"Intoxicating Agent," which Ms. Dudley paid to have printed, is made notable by Ms. Dudley's acknowledgment to a local newspaper that her fictional heroine was "a pumped-up version" of herself.

Ms. Danner, Ms. Dudley writes, has "the poise and sexiness of a dancer, the brains of a scholar and the protective passion of a mother."

"She had always been attractive," Ms. Dudley continues, "but now, having reached middle age, experience, confidence and poise further enhanced her beauty."

Prosecutors in "Intoxicating Agent" are fearless champions of the truth; defense lawyers, unethical and manipulative; and defendants, despicable and unattractive. One is called "felony ugly."

Deborah L. Rhode, an authority on legal ethics at Stanford, said the appeals court's ruling was correct but too broad.

"There's a lot not to like in the way that this deputy district attorney traded on her office to promote her book," Professor Rhode said. "And the court could justifiably be concerned that her desire for publicity could affect her decision whether to try the case or accept a plea."

But the decision went on to seemingly ban all sorts of extracurricular writing.

"No current public employee," Justice Yegan wrote, "should be permitted to exploit his or her official position as a lever to earn extra income."

That prohibition may run afoul of the Constitution, Professor Rhode said. "Dudley has obvious First Amendment interests in being able to present her characters in whatever stereotypical form she chooses," she said.

Linda Fairstein, a former prosecutor in New York who has written nine successful crime novels, called that aspect of the decision overreaching and absurd.

But she expressed little sympathy for Ms. Dudley.

"It's not really a good judgment call to closely mirror the facts of a case while it's still pending," Ms. Fairstein said.

A New Glimpse Into Night Of D.C. Slaying (WP)

By Paul Schwartzman

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

On the night of Aug. 2, Robert Wone called his wife, Kathy, at their home in Virginia, checking in as he walked to his downtown Washington office.

DOJ_NMG_0076693

The Wones had rarely spent a night apart since 2002, when Robert surprised Kathy with rose petals leading to a silver fortune cookie and the message, "Will You Marry Me?" But Wone, a lawyer, planned to work late that night, his wife said. Days before, he had arranged to stay with friends at a townhouse near Dupont Circle.

"I love you," Robert told his wife as they hung up about 9:30 p.m.

Just after midnight, the phone awoke Kathy Wone. It was Joe Price, the co-owner of the townhouse. Robert has been stabbed, he said. Get to the hospital -- immediately. Less than 30 minutes later, a doctor pronounced her 32-year-old husband dead.

The killer, Wone would learn, plunged a kitchen knife into her husband's chest, piercing his heart. The knife came from the townhouse in the 1500 block of Swann Street NW -- the home of Price, his domestic partner, Victor Zaborsky, and Dylan Ward, all of whom were in the building at the time.

More than two months after Wone's death, investigators have seized personal computers, examined phone records, consulted the FBI and convened a grand jury. For more than three weeks, they kept control of the three-story, $1.2 million house where Wone died, removing flooring, pieces of walls, a chunk of staircase, the washing machine, even sink traps. They used chemicals to search for traces of DNA and other evidence, staining walls, floors and bathrooms.

Yet no arrest has been made and no suspect or motive identified, causing Kathy Wone, 35, to worry that the crime might never be solved. "I feel like I've been holding my breath, waiting for a break in the investigation, hoping that this doesn't become a cold case," she wrote in an e-mail, her first public comments about the slaying.

Authorities have offered only the broadest outline of what transpired, saying that a resident told them an intruder came through the back door and killed Wone -- a theory that detectives have publicly questioned. Yet as police await the results of evidence testing, new details have emerged about Wone's final hours and what Price, Zaborsky and Ward have said occurred after their friend arrived.

In a city of more than 100 homicides this year, Wone's death captured public attention because he was a rising star in Washington's legal world, active in the Asian American community. He died in a neighborhood where homicides are rare, at the home of friends who are affluent, well-established professionals; one is prominent in the gay community.

The case took on greater notoriety when investigators asserted that the crime scene was cleaned before police arrived. And they expressed doubt that an intruder killed Wone, saying they found no sign of forced entry or anything taken.

Police Chief Charles H. Ramsey said detectives are waiting for the FBI to complete tests on blood and other items from the crime scene. Police want the FBI to treat the case with urgency, Ramsey said, and hope to get the results in a matter of weeks or months.

Police and prosecutors have sought to reconstruct what happened inside the house before and after the killing. According to sources with direct knowledge of the investigation, Price, Zaborsky and Ward have described a routine evening that began with a dinner at home before Wone arrived about 10:30 p.m. to sleep over.

The sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because the case is under investigation, said the men have given this account:

Wone first sat in the kitchen, chatting with Price, 35, a lawyer at a prominent law firm with whom he attended the College of William & Mary, and Ward, 36, who works for a software company. Zaborsky, 40, a marketing manager at the International Dairy Foods Association, was in the third-floor bedroom he shared with Price. A female tenant who lived in the basement was not home.

Price has said that he went upstairs to the third floor to sleep about 11 p.m. Ward retired to his bedroom, near the top of the stairs on the second floor, overlooking the back yard. He later told police that he took a sleeping pill that night, as he often did. Wone showered and went to a second-floor guest room facing Swann Street.

According to the sources, Price recalled falling asleep and then being awakened by a chime that the alarm system sets off when the front or back doors open. Price did not go downstairs because he assumed that his tenant was returning; she did not return home that night.

Price has said that minutes later, perhaps as many as 10, he heard the sound of deep, guttural moaning. He ran downstairs with Zaborsky and found the door to the guest room ajar and Wone on the sofa bed, bleeding. Price moved the knife from Wone -- police later found it on a side table -- and tried to stanch the bleeding, the sources said. Zaborsky stood in the hallway, his screams waking Ward.

At 11:49 p.m., Zaborsky called 911. Paramedics arrived at 11:54, followed by police, who found Wone, wearing bed clothes, unconscious and showing no signs of life. He had been stabbed twice in the chest and once in the abdomen.

After Price phoned Kathy Wone, she picked up her husband's parents, who had recently moved nearby from Brooklyn to be closer to them, and his brother, Andrew, 27, who had flown in to visit. A doctor pronounced Robert Wone dead at 12:24 a.m., before his family reached George Washington University Hospital.

The next day, friends and family sat vigil with Kathy Wone, a crowd that included Price, Zaborsky and Ward. The men attended the funeral; Price was a pallbearer.

By then, investigators had taken over the Swann Street townhouse, obtaining search warrants to seize computers and phones there and from Price's law office. In an affidavit used to get one of the warrants, Detective William Xanten cast doubt on the idea that an intruder killed Wone, writing: "There was nothing that appeared out of place, nothing disturbed, nothing ransacked and nothing was taken." Police technicians, using chemicals and artificial light, had determined that the crime scene was "tampered" with, the detective wrote.

Price hired a criminal defense lawyer, Kathleen Voelker, and Ward retained David Schertler, a former federal prosecutor. Zaborsky hired Thomas G. Connolly. Before they had hired lawyers, the three men submitted to hours of police questioning immediately after Wone died. Days later, they submitted their fingerprints and DNA samples.

In a statement issued Friday, the attorneys said the three men "continue to mourn the death of their dear friend" and remain hopeful that "the authorities will identify and apprehend the intruder who is responsible for the senseless murder."

Through their attorneys, the men declined to comment for this article. With their home in disarray, they are now living in Virginia. Their friends and associates are reluctant to speak about them publicly, seeking to protect their privacy.

Price, a lawyer at Arent Fox, also serves on the board of Equality Virginia, a gay rights group, where Ward formerly was development director.

In her e-mailed responses to questions, Kathy Wone cited the investigation in declining to share her view of the men, with whom she was friendly through her husband. She is being advised by Eric H. Holder Jr., a former U.S. deputy attorney general, and Benjamin J. Razi, who work at Covington & Burling, her husband's former firm.

Describing her emotional state in her e-mail, she said: "It hurts me a great deal to think that whoever took Robert's life is probably going on with life as usual while I'm struggling to close an enormous, gaping wound and move on; I can't help but shake my head at that picture of incredible unfairness."

The Wones met in January 2002 at a conference in Philadelphia, where they struck up a conversation that continued as they took a late-night stroll and ended up at a Cosi cafe eating s'mores. "It was cold that night," recalled Kathy Wone, a public-interest manager for the American Health Lawyers Association. "But we didn't feel it."

Until then, Robert Wone had concentrated on his career, pro bono work and keeping up with a wide network of friends, including Price. Small-framed and boyishly handsome, he often seemed more mature than his years, urging friends to buy life insurance and arrange their wills.

In interviews, friends described him as energetic and earnest, with a touch of street savvy born of growing up in New York. Jason Torchinsky, who had shared an Arlington apartment with Wone, said his friend had kept a baseball bat under his bed for self-defense and carried two wallets -- one of them an empty decoy in case he was mugged.

The son of a retired bank executive and teacher, Wone had always been serious. As a youngster growing up in Brooklyn, some classmates at his all-boys Catholic high school predicted that he would be the first Asian American president.

At William & Mary in the mid-1990s, he majored in public policy and immersed himself in student government, through which he became friendly with Price. At exam time, Wone liked to sneak around the library, handing out candy to unsuspecting students. "He was about random acts of kindness," said classmate Tara Ragone. "It was like a Disney movie."

Although he seemed a natural politician, remembering names and keeping in touch, Wone shunned the spotlight. "He often said he'd love to be chief of staff," classmate Michelle Kang said. "He wanted to be the person in the background who made it all happen."

DOJ_NMG_0076695

After graduating from the University of Pennsylvania law school, Wone clerked for a federal judge before landing a job at Covington & Burling. His work was his focus until he met Kathy. Within months, he was talking about marriage. "I was stunned," Torchinsky said. "I had never seen him so interested in anybody. It was like this instant thing."

They were married in 2003. Robert turned 30 the next year, an event marked by a party at the home of Price, Zaborsky and Ward, who were then living on Capitol Hill. The Wones bought a townhouse in Oakton and began talking about adopting a baby girl from China.

Then, in the first week of July, Wone started a new job as general counsel at Radio Free Asia, which broadcasts news in Asian countries that do not get free media. It was a dream position, allowing him to be the legal version of a jack-of-all trades.

More than a week before he died, Wone told his wife that he planned to work late Aug. 2, attending a seminar and then making a stop at Radio Free Asia to meet the night staff. He said he might stay over in the city and visit an old friend -- either Price or another William & Mary alum. "Robert was trying to kill three birds with one stone," Kathy Wone wrote. "Attend a class, get to know more of the Radio Free Asia staff and spend time with a friend."

"I thought it was a great idea," she recalled. "Our marriage was such that I completely trusted and supported pretty much anything he wanted to pursue."

A few days later, she said, her husband told her that he'd stay at Price's house. On the morning of Aug. 2, the couple worked out at their gym and then took Metro into the District. As usual, he walked her to her office, where they kissed goodbye.

At 6 p.m., he arrived at the seminar, after which he called his wife to say good night. At close to 10, he arrived at his office. He stayed for 15 minutes, introducing himself to the staff, before heading off to see his friends on Swann Street.

Activists Take To Prince George's Pulpits To Break A Pattern Of Domestic Violence (WP)

By Avis Thomas-Lester And Rosalind S. Helderman, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

Yvette Cade stepped up to the microphone and the church went silent.

"I am a victim of domestic violence. I was set on fire by my estranged husband," she said, head held high, looking out over the 350 or so people gathered inside the main sanctuary at Fort Foote Baptist Church in Fort Washington. "Take a look at my scars. I was burned at 1,500 degrees. . . . One year later, I am here as a witness, a survivor and a soldier on the battlefield for Christ. Stop the domestic violence. Please."

The church erupted in a thunderous ovation. It was more than two hours into the 11 a.m. church service, and Cade, along with other Prince George's County "soldiers" in the war against domestic violence, had come to the church as part of Project Safe Sunday, a program started four years ago to bring the clergy into the effort to fight the problem. Prince George's has more domestic violence than any other jurisdiction in Maryland.

According to statistics from the Maryland Network Against Domestic Violence, 5,085 cases of domestic violence were filed in Prince George's District Court last year, accounting for more than 21 percent of the cases filed statewide. The county has had the highest number of cases filed for more than five years, statistics show.

The other jurisdictions with the most reported domestic violence cases last year were Baltimore City with 4,152, Baltimore County with 3,780; Anne Arundel County with 1,998; and Montgomery County with 1,712. A total of 23,627 cases were filed statewide.

Joining Cade yesterday were Prince George's State's Attorney Glenn F. Ivey (D), who has actively promoted the program, and Debra Williams, who conceived of the program in 2003 after the domestic violence slaying of her sister, Ernestine Bunn-Dyson. Dozens of churches participated in the program.

Through the program, which spread to Baltimore and Northern Virginia this year, victims of domestic violence are encouraged to report their abuse and leave violent homes, and abusers are urged to seek help to stop attacking their victims. A third goal, organizers said, is to work with ministers and other church administrators to change the sometimes antiquated thinking that leads some to believe the Bible justifies a husband's right to abuse his wife.

"Silence has been one of the biggest contributions to the problem," Ivey said in an interview. "The faith community is the place where ministers talk about the private and intimate issues. A lot of women say they turn to the church, but to be candid, some ministers take the view that some degree of [abuse] is permissible. . . . We also wanted to have a dialogue with the ministerial community to address that mentality."

Domestic violence cases filed last year include the September attack on Cade, who was set on fire after a judge dismissed a protective order against her estranged husband, Roger B. Hargrave. Three weeks later, Hargrave went to the store in Clinton where Cade worked, doused her with gasoline and set her on fire. Cade, 33, suffered horrific burns to her face, head and torso. Her estranged husband was sentenced to life in prison for attempted murder.

The issue of domestic violence in Prince George's has been under the microscope in recent days, after the publication of an article in Essence magazine highlighting stories of women in the county who were abused for years and kept quiet.

Headlined "The Secret Shame of Prince George's County," the story was denounced by members of County Executive Jack B. Johnson's administration, who accused the magazine of unfairly painting the county as unresponsive to the issue. Aides to Johnson (D) have marshaled statistics showing that county spending on domestic violence issues has risen from $1.7 million to more than $3 million in the past three years.

"How is it possible that you would paint us as a county that doesn't talk about it when we're doing things every day?" said Jacqueline F. Brown, the county's chief administrative officer and top aide to Johnson. Brown, a former family therapist, said she has counseled abuse victims.

Brown cited county support for the Safe Sunday program as a sign that officials have been addressing domestic abuse, in addition to training for 911 operators and a computer system that alerts law enforcement when those accused of domestic violence are charged with unrelated offenses.

It is not the first time county officials have issued a prompt response when the county's reputation has come into question. Last year, Johnson held a news conference to denounce an episode of the ABC television show "Commander in Chief" that featured a fictional president sending U.S. marshals to Prince George's to quell crime.

Ivey, who was interviewed for the Essence story, said county leaders should use the story to raise awareness. He said the high incidence of protective orders and cases filed indicate that the county's pro-active approach has led to an increase in reporting, in victims seeking protective orders and a subsequent increase in the number of cases that go to court for prosecution.

In a case from last week, Jackie M. Lewis, 57, was shot to death in her Fort Washington home by a former boyfriend, Arthur Comer, law enforcement officials said. Comer, also 57, called 911, told a police dispatcher that he had shot Lewis and then killed himself, police said. The judge in the case had dismissed a temporary protective order against Lewis after she told the judge that Comer had not hurt her, according to a recording of the hearing.

The murder-suicide occurred almost a year after the attack on Cade.

Fort Foote Baptist's pastor, Joseph Lyles, said his church began participating in Project Safe Sunday four years ago because he has four sisters "who have each, in some way, experienced domestic violence."

As a minister, Lyles said one of his missions is to change the minds of other clergy, who sometimes play down the seriousness of the domestic violence problem and believe that the Bible justifies a man's right to "discipline" his wife if she disobeys or disrespects him.

"The Bible verse that people often misinterpret to mean that a man has a right to beat his wife is Ephesians 5:22-23, which says a wife should be submissive to her husband, and a man has authority over his wife just as He has authority over the church," Lyles said. "But if you look at Verse 25, it says that a man should love his wife as Christ loved the church. Love has no place in a relationship where someone is using violence to achieve dominance. Being submissive does not mean being abused."

Short Odds For Ignorance (NYT)

By Robert Hahn And Paul Tetlock

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

LATE last month, as Congress rushed to adjourn, lawmakers passed legislation that would make it a crime for credit card companies and banks to send payments to Internet gambling sites.

DOJ_NMG_0076697

The measure was attached to an unrelated bill on port security at the 11th hour. If the president signs the legislation, as expected, it will have major implications for the millions of Americans who gamble online. It will also likely lead to a temporary halt in domestic online betting, which will result in billion-dollar losses for Internet gambling sites.

While these would be significant outcomes, they are probably not that important for the overall economy. Consumers will find other ways to spend their money, either in casinos or elsewhere.

The bigger economic story is how this act, by effectively prohibiting Internet betting, could unintentionally slow the emergence of new tools that have the potential to improve the productivity of the private sector and the government. Sadly, this is an aspect of the measure that both its supporters and its opponents seem to have overlooked.

Representative Jim Leach, an Iowa Republican who was a co-sponsor of the bill, suggests that it will help reduce gambling addiction and money laundering. Not surprisingly, executives at online gambling companies argue that the bill unduly restricts consumer freedom.

What neither side has mentioned, however, is how the prohibition on Internet gambling could wind up putting the kibosh on several forms of Internet wagering that provide useful information.

For instance, we now have markets for predicting political and economic events, where you can wager on the monthly unemployment rate or the outcome of the presidential race. (If you visit TradeSports.com, you can bet on Hillary Clinton's chances of becoming the next president: a contract purchased for $1.91 would yield $10 if she wins — implying that the senator has about a 1 in 5 chance of winning.)

Why should we care? Because information markets, which essentially reflect the collective wisdom of savvy bettors, can help us make more accurate forecasts. Information markets have outperformed experts in a number of areas, whether it's predicting point spreads in football games or elections or printer sales. There are more than 20 Web sites that offer information-market securities, including those run by Goldman Sachs and the University of Iowa.

These markets work for several reasons: first, almost anyone can participate; second, people think hard when they have to back up their predictions with money — buy the right presidential contract and you win, buy the wrong one and you lose; third, the profit motive encourages people to look for better information.

Many academics across the political spectrum believe that information markets could be critical in improving decision making by governments, nonprofit organizations and the private sector. Yet, because of current regulatory restrictions, the Iowa market is the only place in the United States dedicated to improving our understanding of these markets. Also, those information markets whose purpose is to make money have generally based themselves offshore, partly in reaction to existing state and federal restrictions on Internet gambling.

So what can be done? Congress needs to draw a distinction between run-of-the-mill Internet gambling and information markets that can serve a broader economic purpose. To this end, it should empower the Commodities Futures Trading Commission to regulate information markets. The commission is already charged with regulating futures contracts, and information-market contracts can be thought of as futures contracts because they represent bets on what will happen down the road.

Congress should also impose a requirement that information-market contracts pass an economic purpose test. The futures commission should permit information market contracts that are likely to provide significant financial hedging opportunities or valuable information for improving economic decisions. Internet poker games and lotteries would not pass the test; contracts involving Gross Domestic Product, housing starts or expected annual rainfall would. So, too would predictions on who will be president: that would affect the economy.

For such regulation to work, it needs to be light-handed. To maximize innovation, Congress should allow for federal pre-emption of state and other federal regulatory authorities for information-market contracts that pass an economic purpose test. Such pre-emption would reduce uncertainty for innovators concerned about violating state gambling laws.

The regulation should also allow for broad exemptions where sensible. One could, for example, introduce exemptions for research where the size of individual investments does not exceed $1,000 per participant. The futures commission already has the power to encourage such research, but thus far it has only given its blessing to the Iowa markets.

We think that Congress has correctly pinpointed Internet gambling as an area deserving of further study, and possibly legislation. But a blanket prohibition on such gambling is premature, and likely to be counterproductive. If this prohibition becomes law, Congress should make sure that productive information markets are allowed to flourish.

The White House And Mr. Abramoff (NYT)

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

The sordid Mark Foley controversy has diverted public attention from another major Washington ethics scandal — the influence peddling involving the disgraced former superlobbyist Jack Abramoff. That's good news for the Bush administration, given freshly heightened suspicion that its dealings with Mr. Abramoff and his sleazy K Street operation were far cozier than it is willing to admit.

The White House has consistently played down the ties key officials like Karl Rove had with Mr. Abramoff, who pleaded guilty last January to conspiring to bribe public officials. But the administration has declined to publicly provide detailed answers or grant full access to relevant documents needed to establish the truth.

A newly released report, prepared with unusual bipartisan backing by the House Government Reform Committee, paints a different reality. It reveals that between January 2001 and March 2004, Mr. Abramoff and members of his staff had some 485 contacts with key White House officials, including at least 10 direct contacts between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Rove. Billing records and e-mail messages unearthed by the committee indicate that Mr. Abramoff and his colleagues spent nearly $25,000 on meals and tickets for White House officials.

The report belies Mr. Rove's description of Mr. Abramoff as merely a "casual acquaintance." An assistant to Mr. Rove, Susan Ralston, who resigned on Friday, had formerly worked for Mr. Abramoff. The report suggests that she sought Mr. Abramoff's help to obtain seats for Mr. Rove and his aides at popular sporting events, and often acted as a conduit, passing messages between the lobbyist and top White House officials, including Mr. Rove and Ken Mehlman, the current chairman of the Republican National Committee who was then a senior White House political strategist.

Indeed, it appears that Mr. Rove sat with Mr. Abramoff in the lobbyist's box seats for an N.C.A.A. basketball playoff game in 2002, an occasion Mr. Abramoff memorialized in an e-mail message to a colleague. "Told me anytime we need something just let him know through Susan."

It is plain that Mr. Abramoff had unusual access. As for his effectiveness, Mr. Abramoff rated the results as "mixed." But he scored some important victories. In 2002, for example, the administration made the unusual decision to release $16.3 million to a Mississippi tribe Mr. Abramoff represented, notwithstanding the Justice Department's opposition to the project. The role campaign gifts and contacts between Mr. Abramoff and Mr. Mehlman may have played in this action is a matter warranting close scrutiny by prosecutors, and further digging by the committee.

As Tom Davis of Virginia, the Republican chairman of the committee, and Henry Waxman of California, the ranking Democrat, take pains to note, their report is based on documents that were provided under subpoena by Mr. Abramoff's firm and, for the most part, tell just one side of the story. The White House spin is that Mr. Abramoff had a well-known affinity for exaggerating the impact of his lobbying efforts. If so, full disclosure of relevant records by the White House could help support that claim. Meanwhile, the idea that Mr. Abramoff exerted no influence with the administration seems about as believable as Mark Foley's early claim that his only interest in 16-year-old pages was "mentoring."

CIVIL LAW:

Judge Names Tower Records Liquidator (WSJ)

By A Wall Street Journal Staff Reporter

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

A bankruptcy judge named a liquidation venture led by Great American Group the winning bidder for Tower Records, sealing the fate of the once-iconic record-retailing operation.

DOJ_NMG_0076699

U.S. Bankruptcy Judge Brendan Shannon in Wilmington, Del., chose the liquidation offer over one from Trans World Entertainment Corp., an Albany, N.Y., operator of retail chains that was expected to keep at least some of the West Sacramento, Calif., company's stores open and operating under the Tower Records name. Trans World came in $500,000 below the roughly $134 million bid from liquidators at the conclusion of a 30-hour auction that began Thursday.

On Friday, Trans World urged that its offer be given a second look, and said the court should take into consideration the jobs that would be saved if Tower Records wasn't handed over to the liquidators. Judge Shannon refused, however, and said he would approve the offer from Great American.

Big Tobacco Spending Big Money To Fight State Bans, Taxes (WSJ)

By Christopher Cooper

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

American tobacco giants, facing state ballot measures that would sharply increase excise taxes or expand smoking bans, are fighting back. They are spending tens of millions of dollars and, in some cases, pushing rival propositions that sound like tough restrictions but would actually ease antismoking laws already on the books.

The campaign drawing most of Big Tobacco's attention is in California, where Reynolds American Inc. and Philip Morris USA, along with parent Altria Group Inc., have already sunk a combined $55 million into a drive to oppose increasing taxes on a pack of smokes by $2.60. The measure, on the November ballot, would generate an estimated $2.1 billion in annual revenue for the state and make California's tobacco excise tax, currently at 87 cents a pack, the highest in the nation. Proceeds from the tax would be used to finance health programs, primarily for children.

The companies are spending so heavily there because the stakes are so high. Philip Morris, the industry's largest cigarette maker, says that California is its single-largest domestic market. Reynolds, the nation's No. 2 tobacco company, says the state accounts for about 6% of its cigarette sales. "Clearly, the impact of California would put pressure on earnings," said Dianne Neal, Reynolds's chief financial officer, during an analyst conference in late July. During the same conference, Ms. Neal said that, altogether, the company planned to spend $40 million to defeat tax increases and smoking bans on state ballots around the country this November.

A leader in citizen-driven proposition balloting, California has often seen pricey campaigns by big businesses seeking to defeat hostile ballot initiatives, and this year is no exception. Another measure, to raise taxes on oil, has sparked an expensive campaign by oil companies. In 2005, a group of pharmaceutical companies spent $73 million to defeat a proposed prescription-drug discount plan. And in 1998, insurance companies spent $66 million to defeat an auto-insurance measure. "Initiative campaigns are not cheap -- this is not an inexpensive venture," said Reynolds spokesman David Howard.

So far, the coalition of cigarette companies and snuff and cigar manufacturers has outspent proponents of this year's cigarette-tax proposal -- mostly a collection of California hospitals -- by a 3-to-1 margin. State records show that, a month before the election, Philip Morris had put $30.7 million into the campaign and Reynolds had donated nearly $24 million. As of the end of September, the antitax campaign had already spent more than $48 million.

The result has been a tidal wave of television advertising attacking the tax increase and its main backer, a California hospital association, whose members stand to benefit most from the new tax. "I was in California two days last week, and that's all I saw on TV," said Kristina Wilfore, executive director of the left-leaning Ballot Initiative Strategy Center. "They were even airing it on the Cartoon Network at midnight."

Beyond California, the companies are fighting similar tax measures in Missouri, Arizona, South Dakota and Ohio. In Missouri, the state's Supreme Court is considering whether to allow an 80-cent-a-pack tax increase to appear on the November ballot, over a legal challenge. If the measure survives, Mr. Howard said, "it's safe to say" the company will wage a multimillion-dollar campaign to defeat it.

Philip Morris spokeswoman Peggy Roberts said the company has begun consumer and vendor campaigns to defeat a proposed $1-a-pack tax increase in South Dakota and an 80-cent-a-pack increase in Arizona. She said the company was mounting a similar effort in Cuyahoga County, Ohio, where voters will be asked to approve a 30-cent-a-pack tax on cigarettes to finance a local arts program.

Ms. Roberts declined to say how much the company was spending on the campaigns.

The ferocity that Big Tobacco has shown this year in opposing the cigarette taxes contrasts with the industry's relative inactivity on the issue in recent years. The two cigarette companies offered only token resistance to a 2002 proposal in Missouri to raise cigarette taxes 55 cents. They spent a combined $77,000 defeating the proposal, state records show, even as a group of health charities and others spent more than $5 million pushing the effort. That same year, a 60-cent tax increase proposed in Arizona passed with no money being spent by opponents, according to state records. In Florida in 2002, Philip Morris abruptly ended a drive to counter a smoking ban with a softer measure after spending $360,000 on a petition drive.

Political observers say they haven't seen tobacco interests spend so much money on a statewide proposition since 1994, when a cigarette-tax increase went down in defeat in Colorado after an $8 million campaign against it -- a sum that remains a record in that state.

Company spokesmen declined to discuss their reasons for increasing their political activities this year beyond saying that business considerations govern their decisions to enter the political fray.

Dan Smith, a University of Florida political-science professor who studies ballot issues, said the sheer number of proposals may have convinced the companies they need to counter the mushrooming antismoking activism that has taken over statehouses in recent years. Some 41 states have passed cigarette-tax increases in the past five years. A host of others have banned smoking in many public places.

"In the last political round, the tobacco giants basically conceded the issue," Mr. Smith said. "I think they've decided to make a last stand. These proposals are going to keep coming if they're not knocked down."

While Philip Morris has focused its efforts on taxes, Reynolds has mounted a sturdy resistance to proposed smoking limits in Ohio and Arizona this year. Both states are entertaining proposals to virtually eliminate smoking in public buildings.

Reynolds is bankrolling proposals in both states that critics say are designed to confuse voters. In Ohio, voters will be asked to consider two smoking-related measures. One, called SmokeFreeOhio, would change state statutes to ban smoking in most buildings other than private homes and a certain percentage of hotel rooms. It is supported by health charities such as the American Cancer Society.

A rival proposal on the ballot, backed by a group called Smoke Less Ohio, also purports to restrict smoking, through a constitutional amendment. But this proposal would exempt restaurants, bars, bowling alleys and similar establishments. If passed, it would actually unwind more restrictive existing municipal bans. It is being supported by a coalition of bars and restaurants, local retail outlets, Loews Corp.'s Lorillard Tobacco Co. and Reynolds.

Mr. Howard, the Reynolds spokesman, said his company supports the constitutional measure and is prepared to bankroll a multimillion-dollar campaign to see it passed. "We believe this is a way you can still provide a smoker-friendly environment for people who choose to smoke," he said.

Jacob Evans, a spokesman for Smoke Less Ohio, declined to say how much money Reynolds was providing for the campaign but acknowledged that the company was "our main supporter." State campaign-finance documents show Smoke Less Ohio spent $1.5 million through Aug. 9 gathering signatures to place it on the ballot.

Recent polling shows about 45% of the state's voters support the Reynolds-backed measure. Polling shows 58% support for the ban endorsed by the health groups. Both measures require simple-majority support to succeed. But if both pass, the Reynolds-sponsored measure would prevail.

Tracy Sabetta, of SmokeFreeOhio, admitted her group may have been politically outmaneuvered when it decided to pursue its measure as a statutory change in state law rather than a constitutional amendment. "We could get 90% of the vote and theirs could still trump ours," she said.

In Arizona, Reynolds has adopted a similar strategy of backing a rival to the proposed smoking ban. There, state records show, Reynolds had by mid-August funneled nearly $3 million to a local group called the Non-Smoker Protection Committee, which is backing Proposition 206. Though ostensibly a smoking ban, it would actually unwind existing prohibitions in Tempe and other cities by exempting bars and restaurants statewide. A rival proposal, Proposition 201, which is supported by several health charities, provides no such exceptions.

In Arizona, the smoking measure with the most votes will become law. Recent polling showed the Reynolds-backed proposal had slightly more support than the one backed by the health charities.

Dueling smoking bans will also appear on the ballot in Nevada this year, but campaign-finance records suggest that tobacco companies have left that battle to convenience stores and liquor and gambling interests.

Mr. Smith, the political-science professor, said Reynolds's tactics in Ohio and Arizona are similar to those used by insurance companies to defeat the 1998 California auto-insurance measure. They clotted the ballot with five competing ballot questions on the subject. "Counterproposals confuse voters, and when voters are confused, they vote 'No,' " Mr. Smith said. "That's just the default position."

Retired Operative Says Agency Unfairly Edited His Book

When Gary Berntsen sat down for dinner last year with the CIA's executive director, Kyle "Dusty" Foggo, the agency's No. 3 tried to talk him out of resigning from the National Clandestine Service. Foggo even offered him a university position as a placeholder until the CIA's new director, Porter J. Goss, could fix the broken personnel system and other issues that frustrated him, according to Berntsen.

But the Capital Grille meal quickly degenerated when Berntsen told Foggo that not only was he planning to resign but he intended to write a book about his experiences.

Foggo, according to Berntsen, stated flatly that Goss wanted no more books published by current or former CIA officials. Actually, according to a statement Berntsen filed last week in his ongoing lawsuit against the agency, Foggo's language was a little more colorful: "Mr. Foggo stated 'we will have no more books. I will redact the [expletive] out of your book so no one will want to read it.' "

Berntsen, who worked in the agency's operations and paramilitary branches for 23 years and led a CIA team in Afghanistan, responded that such a move would be illegal. Hundreds of former officers had written books, including some directors. One recent retiree, Gary Schroen, had even written several chapters about Berntsen, referring to him as "Gary 2."

"I just told him I'm preceding. I wasn't going to back down," Berntsen said in an interview last week. "It was very awkward."

Berntsen resigned, wrote his book and, as required, submitted "Jawbreaker: The Attack on Bin Laden and Al Qaeda: A Personnel Account by the CIA's Key Field Commander" to the CIA's Publications Review Board, which redacted about five pages of the 400-plus-page manuscript. "They were very efficient and thoughtful," he said last week.

Then the board sent it to the Directorate of Operations, where Berntsen had worked, as is the practice. There, Berntsen contends, "Mr. Foggo made good on his word" and 70 pages were blacked out.

Berntsen's lawsuit, filed earlier this year in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, asserts that the CIA violated his First Amendment rights in redacting as much as it did.

His case rests, in part, on assertions that the information is virtually the same as information the PRB cleared for publication in a prior book by Schroen, or released upon the orders of then-director George J. Tenet to Washington Post reporters Steve Coll and Bob Woodward, whose separate books included sections on the CIA's work in Afghanistan.

Berntsen thinks the CIA's aim was to make his book "unreadable, so few would purchase it."

Foggo declined comment through his attorney.

CIA spokesman Mark Mansfield said he could not comment on Berntsen's specific allegations. But in an e-mail response to questions, he said that "for former employees, the sole yardstick for pre-publication review has been -- and remains -- the simple requirement that their writings contain no classified information."

In papers filed in the court case, the CIA said Berntsen's unredacted draft "reveals intelligence sources, methods and activities, foreign government information, and information impacting U.S. foreign relations." The information "reasonably could be expected to cause serious damage to national security" and none of the information in question "has been officially disclosed," which would give it a level of credibility beyond that written in nonfiction books by journalists.

The agency says the information is more detailed and covers a different period of time than information the agency released for Schroen's book.

Berntsen published his book, with the redactions, in late December 2005. The paperback editions are due out soon. If he wins back some of the redacted material, he plans to publish an updated edition. "I'm not walking away," he said. "You can't have your First Amendment rights stamped on."

Berntsen's complaints about the agency's publication review decisions are shared by a half-dozen former CIA employees who, in the past two years, have sued or publicly criticized the agency for withholding information they believed would not damage national security but would, perhaps, embarrass the CIA or the White House.

Some administration officials and others in the national security world think Tenet allowed former employees to publish deeply critical books -- such as Michael Scheuer's "Imperial Hubris: Why the West Is Losing the War on Terror" -- in retaliation for the White House allowing the agency to take so much heat for the failed prewar judgments on Iraq and other missteps.

Asked for new CIA Director Gen. Michael V. Hayden's policy on book publishing, Mansfield wrote: "Director Hayden has emphasized the importance of responding in a timely way to employees who write books. And while he is committed to protecting intelligence sources, methods, and other classified information, the director also believes in a reasonable, common-sense approach to pre-publication review."

Berntsen said his legal appeal is being hampered because the CIA, with the court's approval, has refused to allow his lawyer, Mark Zaid, who is cleared to read some classified information, to see the unredacted text to prepare his case. Instead, Berntsen has had to prepare his own appeal, a 70-page rebuttal that documents, line by line, the previous publication of the information the CIA wants to deny him.

While he waits for his case to be adjudicated, Berntsen has written a second book, this one a policy book on "counterterrorism and human intelligence operations." The PRB redacted "only 1 to 2 percent" of the text, he said.

The tables will soon turn on Tenet, who is writing his own book. He has asked for and received access to agency records, including classified documents, "to refresh his memory about events that occurred during his tenure," Mansfield said. He said Tenet's book will be subject to CIA review and that appropriate sections will also be given to the offices where the information originated.

With Health Care Fraud Rampant, States Are Urged to Pass Their Own False Claims Acts, But Foes Warn of Windfalls for Plaintiffs Lawyers

As if the Civil War hadn't started off badly enough for the Union on the battlefield, Abraham Lincoln soon found himself fighting a second enemy at home: war profiteers out to make a buck by cheating the government in just about every way imaginable.

Some would sell the same broken-down horses several times over to different cavalry units. Others would peddle gunpowder mixed with sawdust. Still others would slap a fresh coat of paint on some leaky old tub, then offer the vessel to the Navy as seaworthy. Traffic also was brisk in rotten rations and dead mules.

So at Lincoln's urging, Congress in 1863 passed the False Claims Act to give both the government and private citizens vast new powers to take unscrupulous contractors to court.

Also known as the Lincoln Law, the act today receives widespread recognition as the most effective federal legal weapon against fraud in government programs. Most of the credit goes to a key provision that allows private litigants to sue in the government's name and share in any recovery. Called qui tam, the feature also allows whistle-blowers—relators in the act's lingo—to file claims secretly while Justice Department prosecutors decide whether to intervene and take over the civil litigation.

The False Claims Act may have yet to realize its ultimate reach, however, as Congress attempts to expand the statute's already wide scope to the states beginning in January to get a handle on health care fraud—the most popular way to steal from taxpayers.

DOJ_NMG_0076703

As part of the 2005 Deficit Reduction Act, lawmakers decided in February to prod states into passing their own false claims acts with incentives to increase their share of recoveries in Medicaid fraud cases. The inducements would allow states to up their takes by 10 percentage points, provided their false claims acts follow the federal model. By involving more states and more lawyers, supporters hope to increase recovery amounts across the board.

Though any state can share in Medicaid recoveries regardless of whether it has a false claims act, the federal law that Congress wants the states to mimic dangles the extra enticement of triple damages.

WORLDS REMOVED

In Lincoln's day, qui tam was neither unusual nor controversial. The first Congress enacted citizen suit provisions to supplement scant federal law enforcement in a number of broad fields, such as bank regulation and copyright infringement. Fast-forward to today's tort reform-drenched political climate, however, and qui tam takes on an almost sinister tone.

The vital citizen suit provision that Congress insists on as part of any state false claims act unnerves more than a few legislators and lobbyists for health care providers. Opponents argue that added state qui tam procedures would do little more than create undeserved windfalls for whistle-blowers and their lawyers. Moreover, some state false claims acts on the books and the few new ones debated so far may fall short of the federal requirements.

With health care fraud as the No. 1 drain on federal and state treasuries, supporters can't see how any state can reject an offer that's as good as the one Congress made in the Deficit Reduction Act. Supporters say the federal False Claims Act's success virtually ensures similar accomplishments at the state level.

"Given that the Department of Justice is so strapped for resources, the state agencies and attorneys general offices pose a formidable force in qui tam enforcement," says Janet L. Goldstein, a plaintiffs lawyer from Washington, D.C. "I think you'll see a real shift in focus toward state cases. We've got state attorneys general who are very excited about these cases."

Health care fraud is far and away the leading target of qui tam actions at the federal level. Health care scams accounted for 46 percent of 2,490 qui tam cases filed and $5 billion in recoveries from 1987 to 2005, according to the Government Accountability Office. Procurement fraud, exemplified by the proverbial $500 toilet seat, placed a distant second, accounting for 33 percent of cases and $1.4 billion in recoveries. Likewise, health care whistle-blowers were rewarded the most handsomely, taking home $842 million, nearly triple the $291 million won by their counterparts in procurement cases.

Health care fraud can be as simple as billing for services not performed or as elaborate as the 2005 admission by Swiss pharmaceutical company Serono SA that it tried to boost sales of a nearly worthless AIDS drug, partly by taking 10 physicians on an all-expenses-paid trip to a medical conference in Cannes, France. In exchange, each doctor was to write 30 new prescriptions for the drug Serostim. The medication costs $21,000 for each three-month course of treatment, totaling $630,000 in new prescriptions per doctor.

In the end, Serono wound up repaying $567 million in bogus claims covered by Medicaid and federal health plans for veterans and government workers as part of a $704 million civil and criminal settlement. The investigation also produced five criminal indictments against individuals.

Prosecutors say the fraud may well have gone undetected had an employee at a company laboratory in Rockland, Mass., been unable to file a secret qui tam complaint. Four other employees filed similar lawsuits in Maryland and Connecticut. The five whistle-blowers will share $51.8 million from the recovery.

But detractors can't resist pulling out familiar arguments that the incentives will do nothing more than line plaintiffs lawyers' pockets or serve as launch pads for politically ambitious state attorneys general who may be more interested in television exposure than building solid cases.

"The idea of being able to get in front of a camera and tell people how much money you are recovering and how tough you are on defrauders of the state is very appealing," says Washington, D.C., defense lawyer John T. Boese, author of one of the leading texts on the federal act and co-chair of this past June's ABA national institute on qui tam enforcement. "The idea of waiting four years for a case to develop is not so appealing."

Despite the tort reform arguments from some quarters, qui tam cases stand apart because they boil down to government actions to recover stolen tax money. While other plaintiffs lawyers can pick and choose their cases, a qui tam complaint obligates the government at least to investigate the matter.

And unlike personal injury plaintiffs with nothing to lose and everything to gain, qui tam whistle-blowers risk their jobs and careers. Supporters say that highly detailed pleading requirements for fraud complaints and a battery of government lawyers to vet cases add further assurance against abuse.

"This is not a practice that lends itself to voluminous filings with the hope that some of it sticks to the wall," says New York City plaintiffs lawyer Neil V. Getnick. "These cases are not developed during the discovery phase. These cases are developed during the pre-pleading phase. The very nature of the practice does not lend itself to a blunderbuss approach."

Still, Boese says that qui tam plaintiffs lawyering in recent years has come to resemble what he describes as the "franchise model" of the highly criticized 1990s state tobacco litigation, where the handful of plaintiffs firms in control spread their costs and made billions of dollars in fees by farming out much of the actual work to local counsel.

Boese says he regularly encounters plaintiffs lawyers in false claims cases who appear to use a similar tag-team approach. "Will this become tobacco?" Boese asks. "It already has."

A STAUNCH SUPPORTER IN THE SENATE

That's not the kind of talk U.S. Senate Finance Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley wants to hear.

"It ought to be black and white as far as state legislators are concerned," says the Iowa Republican, the act's loudest supporter. "If you are a forward-looking state legislator, you should have passed this years ago, instead of waiting for an incentive from the federal government."

Grassley helped breathe new life into the False Claims Act in 1986 after it had fallen into disuse. He sponsored amendments that tilted the odds toward plaintiffs and prosecutors, and that receive most of the recognition for raising recoveries from close to zilch before enactment to more than $15 billion over the last two decades.

Grassley also was the leading sponsor of the Deficit Reduction Act's current state inducements, which take effect on Jan. 1.

Besides health care, the False Claims Act also deals with fraud in virtually any federal endeavor that involves outside contractors—from defense procurement to student loans and veterans benefits. The law also covers fraudulent Medicare payments. The federal government pays 100 percent of Medicare, so the new incentives apply only to the unique federal-state Medicaid partnership. The feds pick up almost 60 percent of Medicaid's cost, with the states responsible for the remainder.

No one disputes that fraud poses a monster problem in health care and other government programs. Government and private estimates of health care fraud losses range from 3 percent to 10 percent of state and federal outlays. And the Department of Health and Human Services, which administers Medicare and Medicaid, places fraud losses at 5 percent.

Even by conservative estimates, the potential losses are staggering, considering how much the government spends on health care.

Topping Social Security and the military, the federal and state governments spend more money on health care than just about anything else. For the 2006 budget year that ended Sept. 30, the feds expected to spend $343 billion on Medicare for senior citizens and another $192 billion on Medicaid coverage for poor people. Add an expected state Medicaid contribution of another $142 billion, and the two programs total $677 billion. By comparison, Social Security was expected to cost $550 billion at year's end, while the Pentagon was on track to spend $420 billion.

Though a handful of legislatures considered false claims statutes during the spring and summer, the Deficit Reduction Act's February passage came after bill-filing deadlines in many states. The issue promises to heat up considerably this fall with the approach of the deficit act's effective date, just ahead of the next round of legislative sessions.

Before deficit reduction passed, 15 states and the District of Columbia had false claims laws that allowed some form of qui tam litigation. Five of them deal only with health care fraud. If this year's limited experience is any indication, however, many legislators likely will balk at the qui tam provisions.

RESISTANCE FROM PROVIDERS

With strong bipartisan support that included a Republican governor and a Democratic attorney general, Missouri state Sen. Chris Koster figured his false claims act was a shoo-in. Though the Senate twice passed it unanimously, Koster could only watch as opposition to qui tam drowned his bill in May before the House Special Committee on Health Care Facilities, whose 11 members include six health care providers.

DOJ_NMG_0076705

"It was a hot bill," says Republican Koster, a former elected prosecutor from the Kansas City area. "It was very strongly worded. It had provisions in there that I think really shook the provider community."

To be sure, Koster's bill may not have received federal approval anyway, because it would have dismissed suits the state rejected, rather than let relators proceed alone as the federal act does. Though additional proposed criminal penalties also worried providers, even the limited qui tam section proved too much for House committee members. In an effort to keep money away from plaintiffs lawyers, they stripped out qui tam in favor of a straight reward system for tipsters. Neither that version nor the Senate's made it to a House floor vote before the session ended.

"We felt the attorney was going to get a huge chunk of the payout, just by referring the case to the attorney general," says Republican House committee chairman Dr. Rob Schaaf, a family physician from St. Joseph. "We just didn't think that was necessary."

Providers also are skeptical of President Bush's claim that the Deficit Reduction Act can save Medicare and Medicaid more than $48 billion by 2015 and not cut services. The administration aims to accomplish that by a combination of stepped-up fraud enforcement, higher Medicare premiums for some seniors and reduction of federal payments for prescription drugs.

But organized medicine in Missouri says already miserly Medicaid reimbursements don't justify the risk of doctors getting nailed for fraud to boot.

"They literally lose money on Medicaid," says Tom Holloway, lobbyist for the Missouri State Medical Association. "They get 30 to 35 cents on the dollar. They see it as charity care. A lot of them just point-blank told me they're going to get out."

In New York, plaintiffs lawyer Getnick reports similar reactions from legislators there, who passed a massive health care fraud bill in June sans qui tam. Costing $45 billion a year and eclipsing the entire budgets of most other states, New York's Medicaid program is the nation's largest and most generous. It's also a system repeatedly criticized as rife with fraud.

Opponents of qui tam conjure up visions of disgruntled employees clogging the courts and running up legal bills with meritless claims. But Getnick notes that rival providers in some competitive sectors, such as drug manufacturing, also can become qui tam plaintiffs.

"If a pharmaceutical company is able to make huge profits by cheating the government, it becomes much more difficult for a competitor to follow the law," says Getnick, who also serves as board chairman for Taxpayers Against Fraud. The influential lobbying organization also helps plaintiffs and their lawyers assemble qui tam cases and finances litigation.

Relators currently file qui tam actions under seal in federal court, usually along with corresponding state claims, while the Justice Department investigates the allegations to decide whether to intervene and take over the litigation before serving the defendant. The department on average accepts one in three cases. Though cases today typically wind up in a single federal court, the proposed state incentives hold the possibility of parallel proceedings across numerous jurisdictions.

As Justice investigates, defense lawyers scramble to learn the nature of the allegations, who filed them and where. Boese says it's like voting in Chicago.

"You show up early and often," he told an ABA conference on health care fraud in May. "I'm going to start calling state attorney general offices, and I'm going to talk to everyone as quickly as I can. You've got to figure out what's going on."

Though federal qui tam actions can continue without the government's participation, whistle-blowers who go it alone stand only about a 5 percent chance of success and average only $22,400 in payments when they do win, compared with a $175,754 average with government intervention.

The federal act hasn't always worked so efficiently. It saw only sporadic use until 1943, when Congress crippled it by severely curtailing qui tam in response to complaints of "parasitic suits" where whistle-blowers filed cases based on public knowledge, such as criminal indictments. For its success, the act depends on true inside information that normal investigative techniques often fail to reveal. The 1943 restrictions also applied to frauds the government knew about but didn't pursue.

Things changed in 1986 when Grassley assumed the lead in fighting fraud with amendments that changed the face of the False Claims Act.

Besides adding protection from retaliation for whistle-blowers, the amendments contained major financial plums. Included was an increase in relator shares, from a maximum of 10 percent, to at least 15 percent and up to 25 percent of the recovery, with government intervention and depending on the relator's contribution to the action's success. In the remedy department, lawmakers increased damages from double to triple the cost of the fraud, and upped other penalties from $2,000 to between $5,000 and $10,000 per false claim.

Moreover, because some courts demanded that plaintiffs produce clear and convincing evidence to prevail, Congress set a uniform standard of proof at the lower preponderance level. Lawmakers also expanded scienter from the knowing submission of a false claim to cover recklessness and deliberate ignorance.

This year, HHS Inspector General Daniel R. Levinson's office likely struck a nerve in the provider community when in late August it published guidelines for determining whether individual state false claims acts qualify for increased awards. Among other factors in evaluating compliance with the federal version, HHS, in consultation with the Justice Department, will consider whether state laws allow sealed complaints and contain qui tam provisions that permit relators to proceed solo should the government decline the case. HHS also recommends that states award relators at least 15 percent of any recovery from their shares and provide for assessments against defendants for costs and attorney fees.

'THE RIGHT THING TO DO'

Throughout the spring, Grassley had pressed HHS and Justice especially hard on the qui tam provisions.

"There's no doubt that this is the right thing to do, but if a state doesn't want to pass it, it doesn't have to," says Grassley. "But it's not worth doing if you don't have the qui tam provision. They can either pass it according to the intent of Congress or forget it."

Members of the defense bar had hoped that HHS would show some flexibility because the Deficit Reduction Act also states simply that state false claims statutes must be "at least as effective in rewarding and facilitating qui tam actions" as the federal law. Though HHS strongly suggests that states won't qualify for more money if they don't meet the minimum provisions laid out in the guidelines, the department also appeared to leave itself some wiggle room by saying it would evaluate more restrictive state laws on a case-by-case basis.

"No realistic evaluation of these guidelines will be possible until the OIG begins rendering decisions," Boese wrote in a client newsletter.

Texas could be an early testing ground for the HHS guidance. Though Texas has one of the nation's most successful state acts, it still may not qualify for larger recoveries, because a case dies and the relator gets thrown out of court if the state turns it down. Nevertheless, Congress and other states looked to Texas as a model in pondering the new weapons against health care fraud.

"No good deed goes unpunished," says Patrick J. O'Connell, civil Medicaid fraud chief for the Texas attorney general's office, which has recovered more than $100 million since 1999, when relators first began bringing qui tam cases after a change in the law. "We have become sort of a lightning rod for what a state can do if it uses its false claims act correctly."

Like New York, Texas sucks up Medicaid dollars big time. With about 30 percent of Texas residents lacking private insurance, the nation's highest rate, state Medicaid spending doubles every six to seven years. Today, Medicaid costs taxpayers $750 for each man, woman and child in the state, easily more than some families pay in premiums for private health insurance.

The Lone Star State's budget for Medicaid is expected to climb from the current $17 billion annually to $136 billion a year within 20 years, according to the nonpartisan Texas Public Policy Foundation. That's almost as much as the entire $138 billion state budget for the current year that began Sept. 1. So business is vigorous in O'Connell's office, which has grown from two to nine lawyers. "We've got more than we can do," O'Connell says. "We're working nonstop."

MORE THAN ENOUGH ENCOURAGEMENT

But defense lawyer Boese says the federal relator cut is more than enough to encourage the mega-national cases that yield global settlements responsible for much of the act's recent success, regardless of whether states have their own false claims acts. Of the top 25 federal cases that have settled since 1992 for $100 million or more, 21 involved pharmaceutical companies, hospital and nursing home chains, medical device makers and other medical providers or support industries.

Of greater concern to Boese is a separate provision in the Deficit Reduction Act that requires nearly every provider to conduct employee education programs on fraud and how to file false claims complaints. Besides their potential for increasing the number of new cases, Boese says such programs also undermine the stricter internal company compliance plans and financial controls that have become hallmarks of post-Enron corporate self-accountability.

Worker training in the False Claims Act could become the functional equivalent of a company hiring a plaintiffs lawyer and suing itself, Boese complains.

Indeed, some states actually could lose money with their own statutes if they must pay at least a 15 percent relator's share. Washington state prosecutor David W. Waterbury says he's no math whiz, but a 15 percent relator's share sounds like more to him than the promised 10 percentage point increase in the state's share of damages.

"As portrayed, it looks like states are leaving money on the table," says Waterbury, Medicaid fraud control director for the state attorney general's office. What's more, he says, nothing would stop legislators from passing an even more ambitious false claims act aimed at all sorts of state contracts. Waterbury wonders who would pay for that.

"You have to take the blinders off," Waterbury says. "While this sounds seductive, it may cover the waterfront. If the statute covers everything, you're looking at replicating the Civil Division at the Department of Justice."

At the Civil Division, commercial litigation director Michael F. Hertz says his prosecutors likely will notice little difference in their jobs as state involvement increases.

"I'm not sure we know exactly how this is going to play out or work," Hertz says. "But I don't think it will change that much."

Though total damages are expected to increase and the distribution of awards will change, the states, as they now do, are expected to continue to divvy up recoveries among themselves through the National Association of Medicaid Fraud Control Units, which operates out of the attorney general's office in most states.

"Both of those are mathematical calculations," Hertz says. "The work for lawyers won't change that much."

Federal and state prosecutors say they already work together smoothly, though they expect to see much more of one another in the future. The national association already assembles state teams to assist in cases, and representatives from states with false claims acts meet by conference call every two weeks.

"It will intensify the relationship with DOJ," says Vermont fraud chief Linda A. Purdy, the outgoing association president. "It brings more people into the mix, which requires more efforts at coordination."

MORE TO CONSIDER

But though Justice Department lawyers publicly downplay problems the approaching era may cause, one former health care fraud prosecutor says Congress failed to appreciate the increased complexity that would accompany an explosion in parallel proceedings. Jonathan L. Diesenhaus served as a senior Justice Department trial counsel specializing in false claims cases from 1998 to 2005, when he left for private practice and defense work in Washington, D.C. He envisions control over qui tam sliding away from federal prosecutors to relators and their lawyers.

"Every step of the way, you have a national consortium of people in a case," Diesenhaus says. "The federal prosecutor's job becomes one of traffic cop, not law enforcer."

Besides creating new perils for defendants and administrative headaches for prosecutors, Diesenhaus says criminal enforcement may become a major victim of stepped-up state civil litigation in multiple forums. He cites the possibility of a rogue state unsealing a civil complaint on its own or allowing discovery and tipping off defendants who may be under criminal investigation elsewhere where complaints remain sealed.

"Those circumstances would present a real possibility that the relator could seek deposition testimony from witnesses the government would not want deposed or, of greater concern, individuals whose status in the criminal investigation dictated that they assert their Fifth Amendment rights and decline to testify," Diesenhaus writes in a recent analysis of the Deficit Reduction Act.

Career federal criminal prosecutors often single out New York's Eliot Spitzer as a prime specimen of a genus of political creatures that inhabit the offices of elected state attorneys general and just don't respect the integrity of other agencies' investigations.

As the Democratic gubernatorial candidate in the November election, Spitzer enjoys widespread recognition as the state prosecutor who embarrassed the feds by getting the jump on them in a string of high-profile Wall Street corruption cases. He also severely chastised New York legislators early in the summer for failing to include qui tam in this year's health care fraud legislation.

DOJ_NMG_0076708

"Having these state AGs ride along really can undermine federal criminal prosecutions," Diesenhaus says. "The problem is many times greater with state qui tam out there. Criminal prosecution would grind to a halt. Prosecutors would lose interest if there are too many players."

Grassley says in one way he's reliving the resistance to his 1986 amendments, which largely came from defense contractors. He says state legislators should expect more of the same from health care providers as they debate false claims acts.

"They're going to be fighting the same battle I fought 20 years ago," Grassley says. "But we're right, and right wins out—most of the time."

And he says he's not about to listen to federal prosecutors sing the blues about states crowding the field.

"If they want to do their jobs, then they should take these cases from the whistle-blowers," Grassley says. "Sometimes they don't want to. Sometimes it's workload, and sometimes there are more powerful forces at work. Sometimes they don't want a farmer from Iowa who knows something about fraud on the government telling them what to do."

FBI Arrests 2 In Alleged Sex Case In Samoa (AP)

AP, October 10, 2006

PAGO PAGO, American Samoa » Police have arrested two people accused of luring two Chinese women to American Samoa, trapping them in a karaoke bar and forcing them into prostitution.

The women claim they paid $2,000 to travel to the U.S. territory to get jobs as cashiers at a grocery store, but instead they were imprisoned in a karaoke bar and made to have sex with customers, according to an FBI affidavit by Special Agent Jason Cherry.

After six months the victims eventually escaped by climbing down a rope from the third-story balcony of the Bao Kai Karaoke Bar, according to the FBI.

Fu Shen Kuo, 39, and Shenji Wang, 35, were indicted Wednesday by a federal grand jury in Honolulu. They are being held without bail at the federal detention center in Honolulu, said Pamela Tamashiro, Wang's attorney.

The women told police they were recruited around Jan. 26 to work in American Samoa. But once they arrived in March, Wang threatened to beat them if they did not have sex with her customers.

Wang told one of the victims that her family's arms and legs would be cut off if she attempted to escape, according to the affidavit.

One victim told the FBI she was forced to have various forms of sex with between 60 and 70 customers during the six months she was held.

Ex-officers May Face U.S. Trials, Despite State Outcome (MJS)

By Gina Barton

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 10, 2006

The constitutional prohibition against double jeopardy says the same person can't be tried twice by the same sovereign for the same crime.

So far, the three former Milwaukee police officers who were tried and acquitted in state court in the beating of Frank Jude Jr. - Jon Bartlett, Andrew Spengler and Daniel Masarik - have not been charged federally. But they could be, and federal plea agreements last week by two other officers involved in the beating make it seem likely.

Bartlett already faces a retrial in state court because the jury could not reach a unanimous verdict on one of the charges against him.

DOJ_NMG_0076709

And a federal prosecution against Bartlett, Spengler and Masarik wouldn't be double jeopardy even though they already have been tried in state court. Why? Because the state and the nation are separate sovereigns - and because Wisconsin and the United States have different criminal statutes.

Even so, it is unusual for federal prosecutors to intervene after a failed state case, said Tom Schneider, a former U.S. attorney for the Eastern District of Wisconsin.

"There are policies within the U.S. Department of Justice that limit when the federal government will step in and bring a prosecution where there has already been a state prosecution," he said.

Prosecutors in Washington, D.C., must review and approve such a case before a local U.S. attorney can bring charges, Schneider said.

"The department is looking for particularly serious cases where there appears to have been a real injustice," he said.

One example is the Rodney King case in Los Angeles. In the 1992 state prosecution, three police officers were acquitted of beating King and the jury was unable to reach a verdict concerning a fourth officer. Federal prosecutors then filed charges, and two of the four officers were convicted.

One of the same Washington, D.C.-based prosecutors who worked on the King case is assisting in the Jude investigation.

U.S. Winning Access For The Disabled Through Mediation (WP)

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

In nine of every 10 cases involving federal disability laws in the past five years, the Justice Department achieved compliance by government agencies and businesses by using mediation and not imposing penalties.

Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales said that 1,800 complaints out of 2,000 cases involving the Americans With Disabilities Act had been settled through mediation. The department's civil rights division also settled 151 such cases against state and local governments.

"We have accomplished this through an aggressive program of enforcement and public education," Gonzales said in Minneapolis on Thursday at the annual conference of the U.S. Business Leadership Network, which promotes employment of people with disabilities.

The cases were pursued under a Bush administration initiative to improve the access that people with disabilities have to theaters, sport venues, hotels and other destinations where large numbers of people gather.

The administration is also taking steps to ensure more cities and counties make their public spaces and services accessible to disabled people. Those efforts include modifying sidewalk curbs for wheelchairs, allowing guide dogs for the blind in shelters and installing telephone systems that assist deaf people in making 911 calls.

In Hennepin County, which includes Minneapolis, local officials agreed to provide a sign language interpreter for deaf people who are undergoing chemical dependency treatment and other programs. Anne Arundel County in Maryland agreed to improve services for the deaf and the hard of hearing in its two jails.

The report included a few cases in which offenders faced penalties. In one, movie theater chain AMC Entertainment had to pay $100,000 in damages to customers discriminated against because of access problems.

John Wodatch, who runs the disability rights section at the Justice Department, said most employers are eager to fix problems. He estimated that as much as 70 percent of his staff spends time helping businesses and local governments comply with the law. Department lawyers try to reach a negotiated solution first. "We're not trying to get litigation. We're trying to get compliance," he said.

Former Partners Tied Up In Court (WP)

By Griff Witte, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

Contractor Alleges Racial Bias

Two Washington area government contractors that were once partners on work in Iraq and Afghanistan are now tussling in federal court over allegations of racial discrimination, with one firm claiming the other has nearly driven it out of business.

DOJ_NMG_0076710

Worldwide Network Services LLC filed suit in D.C. federal court last week, alleging that its workers were subject to racial epithets, banned from meetings and in some cases forced to leave Iraq as part of a deliberate effort by security firm DynCorp International to force the African American-owned company off of a pair of large State Department contracts. District-based WWNS had been a subcontractor to DynCorp, and the lawsuit claims that DynCorp used WWNS's status as a small, minority-owned firm to help win the deals before the relationship soured.

The suit names as defendants both Falls Church-based DynCorp and EDO Corp., a New York-based firm that was also a DynCorp subcontractor.

"DynCorp's actions, clearly designed to force WWNS out of the Iraq and Afghanistan projects, were motivated by racial animus toward WWNS and its African American founders and owners," the suit contends. "Piling on DynCorp's racially discriminatory actions, DynCorp and EDO have conspired to defame WWNS, interfere with WWNS's contracts with its employees, and interfere with WWNS's prospective business relationships."

DynCorp spokesman Gregory Lagana disputed the suit's claims, saying that DynCorp chose not to renew WWNS's contracts because the firm was not getting its work done. "The charge of racial discrimination is outrageous. The issue with WWNS all along was performance," he said. "We will fight this all the way."

An EDO spokeswoman declined to comment because the company had not been served with the suit as of late Friday afternoon.

Lagana said that DynCorp, which had $2 billion in revenue last year, had been getting complaints from the State Department about poor performance by WWNS.

In the suit, WWNS defends its work, and points to e-mails from DynCorp employees and U.S. officials that praised the accomplishments of the communications firm.

It is not unusual for relationships between prime contractors and their subcontractors to turn bitter. But the suit against DynCorp casts light on an unusually acrimonious end to what WWNS said had been a harmonious partnership as recently as two years ago.

Founded in 1993, WWNS lately had been receiving more than 95 percent of its business from DynCorp subcontracts, amounting to approximately $30 million a year, according to WWNS senior vice president Reginald Bailey Sr.

Much of the work stemmed from State Department deals to train police officers and provide protection for dignitaries in Iraq and Afghanistan. DynCorp picked WWNS to provide information technology support for those deals, but the suit claims DynCorp soon decided it wanted to get rid of WWNS in favor of EDO.

One DynCorp official, according to the suit, told WWNS employees that they had been hired only because they were black. Another DynCorp manager used a well-known racial epithet in reference to a WWNS manager, the lawsuit says.

The suit claims that WWNS employees were banned from meetings and denied their identity cards, so they could not do their jobs. One WWNS employee was ordered out of Iraq without explanation, and another had to leave because of "his refusal to give [DynCorp] WWNS's proprietary employment information."

Since the relationship between the companies dissolved, the suit contends that DynCorp spread false information that WWNS was going bankrupt, and hired away many of WWNS's workers.

Bailey said that WWNS, which had nearly 100 employees in Iraq and Afghanistan at its peak, is now completely out of both countries and is fighting for its life with a skeleton staff. "Our business has been drained," he said. "DynCorp has essentially taken away our employees. And they were our company."

Asked how his business will survive, founder and president Walter L. Gray Jr. replied, "With a lot of prayer."

Don't Remove Safeguards (USAT)

By Rose Saxe

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Required consent, counseling aren't barriers to testing for HIV.

DOJ_NMG_0076711

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention is right to want more people to get tested for HIV. But eliminating specific consent and pretest counseling, as the CDC recommends, would remove safeguards guaranteeing that testing stays voluntary and informed.

It's not surprising that some doctors and health care workers are welcoming what they see as time-saving measures. But testing people without informed consent doesn't ensure that people with HIV get the care they need. Studies have shown that patients who are tested without consent are less likely to get necessary follow-up care.

Without pretest prevention counseling, we also lose a critical opportunity to educate. The reason people aren't getting tested is not consent requirements or even stigma about testing; it's because people still don't understand HIV. A recent survey found that 22% of Americans wrongly believe that you can get HIV from sharing a glass of water. And 25 years into the epidemic, people continue to lose jobs and housing because of prejudice. Can we really afford to abandon this chance to help people understand HIV?

The new recommendations also raise privacy concerns. Virtually every state now collects the names of those who test positive. If the government is going to collect names and deeply personal information, people tested deserve to know that this information is being collected and how it will be used.

Early in the epidemic, our government ignored AIDS until it was confronted by persistent protests by gay people. As the demographic of the disease shifts to include more women and people of color, why are we abandoning those safeguards? And why is the government so heavily focused on promoting testing, while continuing to fund misleading sex education and refusing to adequately support proven programs, such as needle exchange, that reduce the transmission of HIV in the first place?

Written consent and counseling need not be barriers to HIV testing. Everyone wins when people are able to make informed decisions to protect their health.

South Dakota Nears Vote On Abortion Ban (AP-Y)

By David Crary, Ap National Writer

AP, October 9, 2006

Circled around a living room, sipping coffee, five long-acquainted couples grappled with their stark differences on a topic they would have skirted in the past but now cannot avoid — abortion.

Like other South Dakotans, people in this tiny farming town are confronting a historic opportunity on Nov. 7. They'll sway a tortuous national debate by making a choice no statewide electorate has faced before: whether to approve a sweeping ban on virtually all abortions.

"None of us think abortion is a desirable thing," said Tom Dean, a family physician who hosted the discussion along with his wife, Kathy. "But it's not a problem for government to solve by passing a rigid law."

Yet Lynn Ogren, who helps her husband run a sheep and cattle ranch, choked up with emotion as she explained her support for the ban.

"I value every child's life, whether it's from a rape or not," she told her friends. "Who's fighting for these kids?"

The measure would allow abortions only to save a pregnant woman's life. It makes no exception for other health concerns, or for cases of rape or incest; a doctor performing illegal abortions could face five years in prison.

The Legislature passed the law overwhelmingly in February, expecting it to be challenged in court and perhaps lead to a U.S. Supreme Court reversal of the 1973 Roe v. Wade decision legalizing abortion. Instead of suing, opponents swiftly collected signatures to force a referendum; the law will be scrapped if voters reject it.

Each side depicts the other as dominated by out-of-state groups — and indeed such forces are active, viewing the vote as an unprecedented gauge of public sentiment on abortion. The Rev. Jerry Falwell has urged his conservative followers to donate in support of the ban; Planned Parenthood and NARAL Pro-Choice America have raised funds to oppose it.

"We're David, they're Goliath," contended Leslee Unruh, head of the campaign group supporting the ban. Parked outside her VoteYesForLife.com office in Sioux Falls were cars with a blunt bumper sticker: "The Killing Stops Here."

DOJ_NMG_0076712

The most recent independent poll, in July, found 47 percent of voters opposed the ban, 39 percent favored it, 14 percent were undecided. When asked if they would approve a ban with exceptions for rape and incest, support rose to 59 percent.

Unruh, who had an abortion years ago that she now regrets, says momentum is turning as more voters hear her side's core message: Abortion hurts women. In the event of defeat, she vows to keep fighting.

"Sometimes it's not about votes — it's about the truth," she said.

Jan Nicolay, a former school principal and Republican state legislator, is co-chair of the campaign to keep abortion legal. She knows the stakes are high.

"People from other states are telling me, 'You're in the limelight. Good luck. Please do everything you can to defeat it,'" she said.

Among her colleagues is Russ Tarver, a retired Methodist minister who signed a statement against the abortion ban along with 16 other ministers. "Some legislators were stunned to learn there were pastors on the other side of the issue," he said.

If the ban is defeated, anti-abortion activists might try again later with a milder version making exceptions for rape and incest, but the outcome would be heralded nationally as a major victory for abortion rights. If the ban is approved, several other state legislatures might follow South Dakota's example — building momentum for a possible Supreme Court review of Roe v. Wade.

Each side has recruited South Dakota rape victims to aid their campaigns. Connie Pich, impregnated by a rapist as a teenager in 1973, said victims must be able to choose freely whether to bear the child. On the pro-ban side, Megan Barnett has spoken at the Legislature and in campaign videos about how glad she is to have borne a daughter resulting from a rape.

Barnett, in a telephone interview, expressed empathy with women in comparable plights, but said abortion shouldn't be an option. "Two wrongs don't make a right," she said. "It's a baby, whether you're raped or not. You need a choice both you and your baby can live with."

The ban's supporters note that the measure allows rape and incest victims to get emergency contraception, which is effective if taken within 72 hours. Opponents say emergency contraception isn't widely available in South Dakota, and argue that many victims are too overwrought to seek prompt help.

"It's a sham," Nicolay said of the contraception provision. She noted that anti-abortion lawmakers quashed a measure this year that would have required hospitals to inform raped women that emergency contraception is available.

One of the legislators responsible for the toughly worded measure is House Majority Leader Larry Rhoden, a Republican cattle rancher. He was swayed by women's testimony that their abortions left emotional scars, but now — aware of polls showing his side behind — he has second thoughts.

"I've spent a great deal of time and thought wondering if it would have been wiser to write in the exceptions," he said. "We have a long row to hoe based on the numbers I've seen."

In some ways, South Dakota is an odd venue for the showdown. It has had no resident abortion provider for 10 years, and most of its 800 or so annual abortions are performed at an often-picketed Planned Parenthood clinic in Sioux Falls by doctors flying in once a week from Minnesota.

Sarah Stoesz, president of Planned Parenthood's Minnesota/Dakotas chapter, said even people on the sidelines of the abortion debate rallied to help the petition drive after lawmakers approved the ban.

"It was a political moment like I've never seen, a spontaneous uprising of grass-roots fury," she said. "Abortion isn't a subject people normally discuss, but this has forced ordinary mainstream people to talk about it."

A case in point is Wessington Springs, a town of 1,000 where pride in its seven churches and Shakespearean Gardens mingles with worries over business failures and an exodus of young people.

Tom Dean, whose family's local roots date to 1882, and his wife, Kathy, a nurse-midwife, decided to serve on the anti-ban campaign's statewide board, then placed a small ad in the local paper explaining their stance.

"We were a little concerned — not for our safety, but of offending our friends," said Kathy Dean, a longtime abortion-rights supporter.

For several years, the Deans have hosted a monthly discussion group, broaching an array of topics. Its members recently convened to wrestle with the abortion ban.

DOJ_NMG_0076713

Near the end, after listening in silence, Evelyn Bradley spoke out.

"Life isn't always black and white," said Bradley, the wife of an Air Force retiree. "There are situations where it would be really difficult to have another child, and I'd resent the law saying you have to have it. Shouldn't I be allowed to make that choice?"

The issue has been raised at the town's Roman Catholic church by the priest, Jim Friedrich, who fervently supports the ban.

"So far no one (in the parish) has spoken against it," he said quietly in his rectory. "The way I spoke, I doubt they'd have the guts to tell me otherwise."

John Paulson, minister at nearby Our Savior's Lutheran Church, takes a different tack.

"We can't read God's mind on this," he said. "As pastor, I'd support people voting their conscience with a prayerful heart."

Antiabortion Campaign Waves Feminist Flag (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon

The Los Angeles Times, October 9, 2006

SIOUX FALLS, S.D. — In the fight to preserve the toughest abortion ban in the nation, the talk is not of a fetus' right to life. It's of a woman's right to motherhood.

Antiabortion activists here deliberately avoid the familiar slogans of their movement. They don't talk about the "murder of innocent babies" or quote the Bible on the sanctity of life. Instead, campaign manager Leslee Unruh has taken what she calls a feminist approach, arguing that legalized abortion exploits women and — for their sake — must be stopped.

The bumper stickers and T-shirts that fill campaign headquarters spell out her message, in pink and blue: "Abortion Hurts Women."

"We women buy the choice line. We're panicked, or we're being pressured, or we're ashamed to have a child outside marriage," Unruh said. She speaks from personal experience; she had an abortion nearly 30 years ago and said her life since has been darkened with regret and longing. "If you don't do your job right as a mother," Unruh asked, "what good is everything else?"

Abortion-rights supporters call such rhetoric patronizing and presumptuous; they say many women find that ending unwanted pregnancies brings relief and the freedom to pursue other dreams. But they acknowledge that Unruh's tactic is effective — and that it has thrown their campaign off balance.

"Historically, this debate has been focused on fetal rights, fetal life. We have a lot of language about that," said Sarah Stoesz, president and chief executive of Planned Parenthood of Minnesota and North and South Dakota. "This adds an element we're not accustomed to. It's a different line of debate…. And that is something we struggle with politically."

The ban, passed overwhelmingly by the South Dakota Legislature in February, makes it a felony to help any woman terminate a pregnancy at any stage, unless an abortion is necessary to prevent her death. Women would not face criminal charges, but their doctors could get up to five years in prison.

Rather than challenge the law in court, Planned Parenthood chose to put it to a public referendum, gambling that people would vote to repeal it on Nov. 7. (South Dakota law permits interest groups to refer legislation to the ballot if they can collect enough signatures.)

If voters reject the ban, abortion-rights advocates hope it will deter states such as Ohio, Indiana, Missouri, Georgia and Rhode Island, which have been considering similar measures. If the ban is upheld, Planned Parenthood will challenge it in court. Antiabortion leaders would welcome that battle. They hope the U.S. Supreme Court will use the case to overturn Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 ruling that found a constitutional right to abortion.

Both sides call this election crucial and are putting out urgent appeals to raise millions of dollars for the fight.

But if this is the frontline of the abortion wars, the guns sound oddly muted.

DOJ_NMG_0076714

Attuned to the values of this very conservative state, abortion-rights activists have decided not to make a stand on a woman's right to choose. The big poster outside their campaign headquarters makes a much milder point: "This law simply goes too far." One of their TV ads starts out: "South Dakotans agree, honor and protect human life." The ad goes on to affirm support for reducing the number of abortions, but argues that the law is too inflexible.

The only exception in the law states physicians will not be prosecuted for procedures "intended to prevent the death of a pregnant mother." Even then, however, doctors must try their best to save "the life of her unborn child."

A provision allows women to use the morning-after pill, which can prevent pregnancy if taken within 72 hours of sex. But under South Dakota law, pharmacists are not required to dispense the pill — or refer women to a pharmacy that will. And the Legislature has repeatedly voted down a bill to require emergency rooms to stock the contraceptive.

Walking a neighborhood of gracious homes the other day to rally voters against the law, Emma Tupper, 20, made just one pitch, again and again. "Our main concern is the lack of exception for rape and incest," she said. Some residents nodded and pledged to vote against the ban. Nearly as many politely said they would support it.

"Even if there's no exception for rape and incest?" Tupper asked one elderly man.

"I've looked at the bill pretty closely, and I feel comfortable with my decision," he replied, and closed the door.

Tupper — who came from Seattle to work on this campaign — walked on, crunching through drifts of yellow leaves. "It's a tough state," she said.

An independent Mason-Dixon poll in June found voters opposed to the ban, 47% to 39%. But a Zogby International survey last month, commissioned by an antiabortion group in Washington, D.C., found that gap had narrowed to 47% to 44%. In another unsettling sign for abortion-rights supporters, four Republican state senators who opposed the ban lost their seats in the primary election this summer.

"I don't know if I want to say we have a lot of momentum," said Jan Nicolay, a former Republican legislator working to overturn the ban.

The antiabortion camp has attracted hundreds of activists; some have brought with them the strident language Unruh had hoped to avoid. A voter guide produced by the Roman Catholic Diocese of Sioux Falls refers to abortion as a "moral evil," part of "the culture of death." Last month, activists from Wisconsin waved photos of dismembered fetuses at a busy intersection in Rapid City.

Unruh says she hates such messages "with a passion." Banning abortion should be about "compassion and love," she says — not "anger and death."

On a recent afternoon, she spotted a family of volunteers wearing olive-green T-shirts that read "Abortion — the leading cause of death in America." Unruh sent an aide to get them official campaign shirts, which feature the cheery faces of three women and a bright-eyed baby.

One of the women on the shirt is Kayla Brandt, 29, who had an abortion four years ago. "My mind-set was, if it's OK for so many other people, it will be OK for me," she said. But she was so burdened with guilt and shame, she said, she could barely function. In a radio spot, she says mothers "weren't designed to abort our babies" and asks voters to spare other women "the pain of imagining a life that could have been."

Her voice catching, she adds: "Please, to protect women like me, vote yes on Referred Law 6."

The spot caught the attention of Dick Murphy, 58, a local shop owner. He thought at first it was intended to evoke sympathy for a woman's right to choose. "Then it flipped the other way around," he said. "I thought, 'That's a new twist.' " The ad did not change Murphy's mind; he still plans to vote against the ban.

But other voters are torn.

Roger Turnquist, 57, a rancher in town to take his wife and daughter out to lunch, said he could speak for the family: They all backed the ban. "We're Catholic," he explained. His wife, Helen, looked uneasy.

"I'm a little pro-choice," she said. "But I'll probably vote for the ban because I'm Catholic." She paused. "I really haven't decided."

DOJ_NMG_0076715

The South Dakota fight marks the first time antiabortion groups have built a public campaign around abortion's effect on women. But for the last few years, activists have tested the tactic as they lobby state legislatures for measures such as more counseling for women seeking abortions.

"It's been very helpful for the pro-life movement.... Who doesn't want to protect women?" said Daniel McConchie, vice president of Americans United for Life, a national group based in Chicago.

Unruh's campaign has made that point in several ways. Along with the radio spot, Brandt tells her story in an online video and campaign fliers. The campaign has also distributed a DVD with testimony from Brandt and three women who decided against abortion in tough circumstances. (One segment is titled, "I love my baby who was conceived by rape.")

Volunteers offer the DVD to voters as they canvass door to door; it's also been shown in churches and at dozens of house parties.

"The clips really hit me hard," said Jazmine Brown, 13, who was moved to volunteer for the campaign after seeing the DVD at church. "I knew women were hurt by abortion, but that implanted it in my heart."

The concept that women are exploited by abortion has been nurtured by the many "post-abortive support groups" around the nation. Unruh runs one such group in Sioux Falls; the women gather to mourn and to help one another through "side effects" as varied as substance abuse, anorexia and detached parenting.

Their stories have led to a shift in perspective that parallels the religious right's changing attitude toward homosexuality. After years of condemning homosexual behavior as evil, some ministries have begun to portray gay men and lesbians as victims of an immoral society, led astray by gay-pride parades, gay romances on TV, and other signals that same-sex relationships are normal.

Similarly, women who choose abortion are now increasingly treated as victims, let down by a society that keeps abortion legal and relatively accessible.

Abortion-rights supporters respond with exasperation. The American Psychological Assn. has found that abortion carries few long-term emotional risks. And clinic doctors routinely turn away women who are uncertain or seem to have been coerced.

Some women undoubtedly regret their abortions. "But women also marry someone who turns out to be an abusive spouse, and we don't therefore say that marriage hurts women," Stoesz said.

With so much at stake, political scientist Robert Burns says he expects both sides to turn up the rhetoric as the election draws near. Burns, who teaches at South Dakota State University, will not venture to predict the vote's outcome. But it's safe, he said, to foretell this much: "It will get down and dirty before it's all over."

Military Ballots Still Have Glitches (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 9, 2006

The system used by military personnel to cast absentee votes is still not working well, six years after the problem was highlighted by disqualified ballots in the contested Florida recount of 2000, election officials say.

But the Pentagon is releasing statistics and fact sheets to show that armed-forces voting is, in fact, increasing, with more avenues available to the estimated 1.7 million uniformed and civilian personnel in the states and abroad to obtain ballots.

This year, Congress has heard from many sources, including the election commission and the Government Accountability Office, that problems remain less than a month before the Nov. 7 midterm elections.

Sen. Conrad Burns, Montana Republican, says the Pentagon has been reluctant to embrace the Integrated Voting Alternative Site (IVAS), a fast way to get ballots to far-flung troops via the Internet.

Congress started IVAS in 2004 by providing money in a defense-spending bill, but Mr. Burns had to block six Pentagon nominations before he got results, his office says. The Pentagon changed this summer from a pilot program to a permanent IVAS operation.

But the senator says the Defense Department lost precious time.

"If the current bureaucracy can't do it, then we need to throw it out and start over with one that does," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0076716

By the Pentagon's own count, only nine states participate in IVAS. The system works by allowing personnel to go to an IVAS Web site and request a ballot from their home county. An election official sends an e-mail alert, and the person then logs on to a secure server, prints the ballot, fills it out and returns it by postal mail.

"This program eliminates the most time-consuming step in the process: getting the ballots to a potentially moving target," said a statement from the senator's office.

A Senate aide says Mr. Burns' attack on the bureaucracy was really criticism of David Chu, undersecretary of defense for personnel and readiness. The aide said Mr. Chu has shunned IVAS in favor of another Internet program.

The Pentagon is defending Mr. Chu's record on making registration and voting more accessible.

"I think we are working very hard here to carry out the [IVAS] initiative," said Maj. Stewart Upton, a Pentagon spokesman. "We support the IVAS program. We believe that it's working and this year has been very effective."

The main voting problem for military personnel away from home is meeting the ballot deadline.

It takes on average 45 days to get an absentee ballot to the troops, have them fill it out and then mail it back to the election board. The constraint has resulted in late, disqualified ballots. In the tight 2000 Florida recount, where a majority of overseas service members voted for President Bush, Democratic lawyers fanned out to election boards to challenge any military ballot that did not strictly meet requirements.

While the Pentagon talks of voter progress, other officials see persistent problems.

Paul DeGregorio, chairman of the U.S. Election Assistance Commission, told Congress that a summit of election officials last spring concluded that "the current voting process for military and overseas citizens is not working." He blamed the time it takes to mail out and then receive ballots from people thousands of miles away.

Still, the federal voter-assistance program reports a higher military participation rate.

Mr. Chu has told the Senate Armed Services Committee that 73 percent of military personnel voted by absentee ballot in 2004, compared with 57 percent in 2000. The 2004 rate exceeded the 60.4 percent turnout of the general public.

An unscientific poll by the Army Times Publishing Co. in 2004 garnered e-mail responses from more than 4,000 service members. The results: 73 supported Mr. Bush and 18 percent Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat. Nearly 60 percent identified themselves as Republicans and 13 percent as Democrats.

Where Faith Abides, Employees Have Few Rights (NYT)

By Diana B. Henriques

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

J. Jeffrey Heck, a lawyer in Mansfield, Ohio, usually sits on management's side of the table. "The only employee cases I take are those that poke my buttons," he said. "And this one really did."

His client was a middle-aged novice training to become a nun in a Roman Catholic religious order in Toledo. She said she had been dismissed by the order after she became seriously ill — including a diagnosis of breast cancer.

In her complaint, the novice, Mary Rosati, said she had visited her doctor with her immediate supervisor and the mother superior. After the doctor explained her treatment options for breast cancer, the complaint continued, the mother superior announced: "We will have to let her go. I don't think we can take care of her."

Some months later Ms. Rosati was told that the mother superior and the order's governing council had decided to dismiss her after concluding that "she was not called to our way of life," according to the complaint. Along with her occupation and her home, she lost her health insurance, Mr. Heck said. Ms. Rosati, who still lacks health insurance but whose cancer is in remission, said she preferred not to discuss her experience because of her continuing love for the church.

In court filings, lawyers for the diocese denied her account of these events. If Ms. Rosati had worked for a business or almost any secular employer, she might have prevailed under the protections of the Americans With Disabilities Act. Instead, her complaint was dismissed in December 2002 by Judge James G. Carr of the United States District Court for the Northern District of Ohio, who decided that the order's decision to dismiss her "was an ecclesiastical decision" that was "beyond the reach of the court" because "the First Amendment requires churches to be free from government interference in matters of church governance and administration."

Legislators and regulators are not the only people in government who have drafted special rules for religious organizations. Judges, too, have carved out or preserved safe havens that shield religious employers of all faiths from most employee lawsuits, from laws protecting pensions and providing unemployment benefits, and from laws that give employees the right to form unions to negotiate with their employers.

Some of these exemptions are rooted in long traditions, while others have grown from court decisions over the last 15 years. Together, they are expanding the ability of religious organizations — especially religious schools — to manage their affairs with less interference from the government and their own employees.

The most sweeping of these judicial protections, and the one that confronted the novice nun in Toledo, is called the ministerial exception. Judges have been applying this exception, sometimes called the church autonomy doctrine, to religious employment disputes for more than 100 years.

As a rule, state and federal judges will handle any lawsuit that is filed in the right place in an appropriate, timely manner. But judges will almost never agree to hear a controversy that would require them to delve into the doctrines, governance, discipline or hiring preferences of any religious faith. Citing the protections of the First Amendment, they have ruled with great consistency that congregations cannot fully express their faith and exercise their religious freedom unless they are free to select their own spiritual leaders without any interference from government agencies or second-guessing by the courts.

To do otherwise would be an intolerable government intrusion into employment relationships that courts have called "the lifeblood" of religious life and the bedrock of religious liberty, explained Edward R. McNicholas, co-chairman of the national religious institutions practice in the Washington, D.C., office of Sidley Austin, a law firm with some of the country's largest religious organizations among its clients.

Judges have routinely invoked the ministerial exception to dismiss lawsuits against religious employers by rabbis, ministers, cantors, nuns and priests — those "whose ministry is a core expression of religious belief for that congregation," as Mr. McNicholas put it.

But judges also have applied the exception to dismiss cases filed by the press secretary at a Roman Catholic church, a writer for The Christian Science Monitor, administrators at religious colleges, the disgruntled beneficiaries of a Lutheran pension fund, the overseer of the kosher kitchen at a Jewish nursing home and a co-founder of Focus on the Family, run by the conservative religious leader James C. Dobson. Court files show that some of these people were surprised to learn that their work had been considered a "core expression of religious belief" by their employer.

Religious employers have long been shielded from all complaints of religious discrimination by an exemption that was built into the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and expanded in 1972. That historic exemption allows them to give preference in hiring to candidates who share their faith. In recent years, some judges have also refused to interfere when religious groups have dismissed lesbians, unwed mothers and adulterous couples, even if they profess the same faith, because they have violated their employers' religious codes.

A federal court decision has given religious broadcasters an exemption from some of the fair-hiring requirements of the Federal Communications Commission, even when they are hiring secretaries and receptionists. Two other decisions, one in federal court affecting a Mormon church and the other in a state court of appeals case involving a Roman Catholic nursing home, affirmed the right of religious employers to dismiss employees whose faith changed after they were hired.

"These are very difficult cases because they pull at some very fundamental heartstrings," said Steven C. Sheinberg, a lawyer at Outten & Golden, specializing in employment law. "There's our belief that employees should be free of discrimination in their work, versus our belief that religious organizations should be free to hire people who best help them fulfill their religious mission, without the intrusion of government."

Employees at religious institutions face other risks as well, thanks to pension law exemptions granted by Congress and upheld by the courts. Religious employers are exempt from Erisa, the federal pension law that establishes disclosure requirements and conflict-of-interest restrictions for employee pension plans. That exemption has given rise to several cases in which workers at religious hospitals found that their pensions had vanished because of practices that would not have been allowed under Erisa's rules.

DOJ_NMG_0076718

A related exemption frees religious employers from participating in the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation, the government-run insurance program that provides a safety net for corporate pension plans. And some significant court decisions in labor disputes in the last several years have made it easier for religious schools and colleges to resist collective bargaining efforts.

But for Mr. Heck, the question of whether these workplace exemptions are fair to religious employees was crystallized by the case of Ms. Rosati, the novice nun in Toledo.

He said the doctor involved in her case had been prepared to testify under oath on Ms. Rosati's behalf. The doctor "had quite a vivid memory about these events." In fact, Mr. Heck said, the doctor had cautioned the nuns who accompanied Ms. Rosati that it would be virtually impossible for the ailing novice to get affordable insurance anywhere else if she were dropped from the diocesan health.

Lawyers for the diocese disputed Ms. Rosati's account of that visit and denied that health reasons were the causes of her rejection by the order, the Sisters of the Visitation of Holy Mary, which is covered by the diocesan health plan. For the court "to even begin to inquire into that decision-making process, we believe, crosses the line set by the First Amendment," said Gregory T. Lodge, a lawyer for both the Toledo diocese and the order, which operates under papal authority.

"I understand and absolutely appreciate that in matters of religion, the state has no business meddling," Mr. Heck said. "It would be unthinkable for a judge to be able to say, 'Hey, I don't like the way you're interpreting the Book of Luke.' "

But what religious principle is offended when an employee simply grows old or becomes ill, he asked. If the answer is "none," he continued, judges should be more willing to "look behind the curtain."

Exemptions From Employee Suits

For 28 days last May, Lynette M. Petruska, a former nun who now lives in St. Louis, thought she had finally found judges willing to listen to her complaint against Gannon University, a coeducational Catholic college in downtown Erie, Pa. As it turned out, she was wrong.

Ms. Petruska was educated in Catholic schools from kindergarten to college commencement, graduated at the top of her law school class and practiced law for several years before deciding to become a nun. In 1999, as she was working toward taking her final vows, she became the first woman to serve as Gannon's chaplain.

Three years later she was demoted and, according to her complaint, effectively forced out. In her lawsuit, she said this action was in response to her having notified the administration of a case of sexual misconduct by a senior university official, resisted efforts to cover up that case and opposed proposals to weaken campus policies on sexual harassment. In 2004, she sued, accusing the university administration of forcing her out simply because she was a woman and because she had opposed the sexual harassment others experienced on campus.

Gender bias claims against religious employers have generally been dismissed under the ministerial exception. But some judges across the country have been less quick to dismiss cases where sexual harassment or abuse of an employee is involved. And unlike many other plaintiffs, Ms. Petruska claimed that her supervisor had actually acknowledged to her that she was being demoted solely because of her sex, not because of any religious doctrine.

Judge Sean J. McLaughlin of the United States District Court for the Western District of Pennsylvania nevertheless ruled that Gannon was protected by the First Amendment and the ministerial exception from any court interference in its choice of chaplain. Gannon itself argued that it had many women in leadership positions and that Ms. Petruska had resigned simply because she was unhappy with a staff reorganization. But its fundamental argument was that it would be unconstitutional for the court to second-guess these disputed decisions.

"You may ask, 'Why should these decisions go unquestioned?' The reason is plain and simple: The First Amendment protects a church's right to freely exercise its religion," said Evan C. Rudert, a lawyer for the university. "And that includes organizing itself as it chooses and selecting those who it believes will serve best as its leaders — without interference from the courts."

Then, last May, in a decision that caused considerable comment in legal circles around the country, a federal appeals court panel reversed the trial judge's decision.

DOJ_NMG_0076719

For four weeks, the prevailing law in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware and the Virgin Islands — the jurisdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit — was that "employment discrimination unconnected to religious belief, religious doctrine, or the internal regulations of a church is simply the exercise of intolerance, not the free exercise of religion."

Appellate Judge Edward R. Becker wrote that opinion; his colleague on the three-judge panel, Judge D. Brooks Smith, filed a stinging dissent. A few days later, Judge Becker died. On June 20, in a rare move, the Third Circuit granted Gannon's routine request to have the case reconsidered and named Judge Smith to the new three-judge panel that would do so.

On Sept. 6, the new panel swept the earlier decision away, unequivocally restoring the protections for religious employers that it had put in doubt. As Judge Smith put it, the ministerial exception "applies to any claim, the resolution of which would limit a religious institution's right to choose who will perform particular spiritual functions."

Ms. Petruska, who has left her order and returned home to work at her old law firm, describes herself as a feminist who is "committed to peace and freedom." She has a long history of putting her words into action — she has been arrested at protest marches, most recently at an antiwar rally the day before the Iraq war began, she said. She plans to appeal the ruling against her.

"I think this issue needs to be decided by the Supreme Court," she said. And she has hopes that the justices will agree with Judge Becker that, absent some grounding in religious doctrine, sex discrimination by religious employers is wrong.

No Recourse On Age Bias

At 73, Mr. Hankins can look back on 50 years in a loving marriage, 40 years as a minister in the United Methodist Church — and 3 years as the plaintiff in an uphill court fight over his denomination's mandatory retirement policy.

Eight months after he turned 70, that policy forced Mr. Hankins to leave his pulpit in the historic Stony Brook Community Church in Stony Brook, N.Y., where he had served for 37 years. He loved his flock and the feeling was mutual: the congregation withheld part of its annual contribution to the regional church that year to express its dismay.

"He had served for many, many years and wanted to continue to serve, and his congregation wanted that, too," said David S. Warren, a professor of computer science at Stony Brook University who had been a member of the congregation for more than 25 years but who left because of how Mr. Hankins was treated.

Mr. Hankins said he was suing because age discrimination is almost as hateful and senseless to him as the racial segregation and bias against women that used to be "mandatory policies" of his church.

"I feel, and have long felt, that discrimination in any form has no place in the life of a faith community," he said.

Under the federal age discrimination law, most employees of all but the smallest businesses can sue if they are forced to retire for no other reason than that they reached a certain birthday; increasingly, government and academic employees have the same protection. But Mr. Hankins knows his complaint will probably never come to trial simply because he is a clergy member trying to sue his church. Indeed, court rulings around the country suggest that if he had been forced out at any age and for almost any reason — for a deceptive reason, or even for no reason at all — he would face the same judicial roadblock.

"I never, ever thought that the last years of my ministry would be involved in a fight like this," Mr. Hankins said.

Lawrence H. McGaughey, the lawyer for the regional Methodist governing body and its bishop, acknowledged that there is a movement in the church to eliminate the retirement rule opposed by Rev. Hankins. But if the rule is ultimately changed, it should be the church's decision, not a court's, he said.

"Any private employer would feel the same way — they'd like to be able to make these decisions without having to face the courts," Mr. McGaughey said. "But the difference is the First Amendment."

He continued: "We're talking about worship here. Are you going to go into church and have someone standing there who was ordered to be there by the courts? There are certain things a government just cannot do in this country."

In September 2003, a federal trial judge on Long Island ruled that Mr. Hankins's complaint was barred by the ministerial exception. Last February, a federal appeals court panel sent the case back, directing the trial judge to decide the case by applying a 1993 federal law, the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, rather than the ministerial exception doctrine. But there was little in the instructions to the trial court to encourage Mr. Hankins.

He nevertheless thinks his complaint will eventually help his church see that its mandatory retirement rule is unfair.

DOJ_NMG_0076720

"I don't need to win the case," Mr. Hankins said. "I feel the movement of history at work here, I really do. Ideas find their feet, and start to walk."

State judges have been equally reluctant to interfere in disputes between religious employers and their staff members — to the sad frustration of Rabbi Isaac H. Celnik of Albuquerque.

Rabbi Celnik, one of the youngest men ever ordained in Conservative Judaism, was just 30 when he was hired in 1971 as the spiritual leader of Congregation B'nai Israel. Eight years later, he entered into a 30-year contract with the synagogue, an arrangement his congregation endorsed by a margin of almost nine to one, he said.

Then the medical problems began. In 1996, Rabbi Celnik was told he was in the early stages of Parkinson's disease; in April 2000, his wife, Peggy, was told she had breast cancer. In October 2000, he said, the president of the congregation's governing board at the time suggested he retire on disability.

But the rabbi did not consider himself disabled and did not want to retire, he said. He had two young children and a wife whose treatment required continuing health insurance. He "loved the work, and loved the congregation," he said. Indeed, when the synagogue's cantor resigned a month after the retirement discussion, Rabbi Celnik proposed, and the board agreed, that he would take on the cantor's duties as well, he said.

But the relationship deteriorated as he tried to negotiate retirement terms that would provide him and his family with adequate financial security. In January 2002, after those negotiations faltered, he was dismissed; in 2003, he sued. But last February, the state's court of appeals dismissed his case, based on the ministerial exception, also called the church autonomy doctrine.

"We are sympathetic to Rabbi Celnik's struggles with Parkinson's and the manifestation of the disease after so many years of service," the chief judge wrote. But he ruled that the dispute "is precisely the type of religious debate that the church autonomy doctrine is intended to protect from judicial review."

The congregation's current president, Alan M. Chodorow, declined to discuss the details of the dispute. "I do not want to talk about anything that might impair our search for reconciliation and forgiveness" with Rabbi Celnik, he said. "But I will say that we believe strongly in the separation of church and state, and that the state should not have any part in choosing our spiritual leaders."

But Mr. Chodorow said that he was sympathetic to the situation that this freedom for congregations created for employees and that he believed that religious institutions have to provide other protections by contract. Although clergy members in many faiths work without formal contracts, the model contract in wide use within Conservative Judaism provides that rabbis and cantors can terminate the agreement without cause and seek binding arbitration to resolve disputes, he said.

The church autonomy doctrine "takes away certain rights and this is put in specifically for the purpose of preserving rights," Mr. Chodorow said.

Rabbi Celnik and his wife continue to struggle with the financial and physical burdens of his deteriorating health and her second episode of cancer. "They don't teach this in rabbinical school," the rabbi said in a recent interview. Teach what? Mrs. Celnik answered before he could: "Don't get old. Don't get sick."

Mr. McNicholas, the Sidley Austin lawyer, acknowledged that some "unjust and sinful" treatment has been protected from litigation by the ministerial exception. But he argued that "the openness of the religious process" would remedy those situations, making it possible for a clergy member dismissed by one congregation to find a home in another.

But what if they are sick? "That's harder — and very troubling," Mr. McNicholas said. "But if you have a judge deciding it, that's just too much intervention in the process of deciding the hiring issues" at religious institutions. "There's no easy answer."

Protections Against Unionization

The University of Great Falls, in Montana, has a tidy urban campus, a bold crucifix-topped chapel, a master's program in criminal justice and, according to one student's Internet posting, a cafeteria that serves pretty good spaghetti.

It wasn't for lack of trying. In 1995, the Montana Federation of Teachers, which had unionized most of the public universities in Montana, asked the National Labor Relations Board to recognize it as the collective bargaining agent for the teaching staff at Great Falls.

DOJ_NMG_0076721

"Some of the faculty members there traveled in circles that included professors at the other schools," recalled James McGarvey, who was president of the Montana Federation of Teachers at the time. (It has since merged with the Montana Education Association.) Teachers at those other campuses had better pay and more favorable work rules, and some professors at Great Falls had expressed interest in seeing whether the federation could help them as well, according to Mr. McGarvey. "We felt we had a pretty strong showing," he said.

J. C. Weingartner, a union lawyer who worked on the campaign, said that while "pay did come into it, it wasn't what got it started." That spark was discontent among some professors over the president's appointing members to an important advisory council who "did not reflect the views of the majority of the faculty" in negotiations with the administration, he said. "So they felt their interests would be better served with collective bargaining."

The university, which has a new management team today, declined to comment on the long legal battle.

But when the labor board held a hearing on the union's request, the university's lawyers argued that the board had no jurisdiction because the university was a religious institution, and to force it to negotiate with the union would violate its religious liberty.

The university based its case largely on a 1979 decision in which the United States Supreme Court ruled that the labor board's jurisdiction did not extend to religious schools. After that decision, which resulted in what is called the Catholic Bishop doctrine, the board began case-by-case examinations to determine whether the schools that came before it were sufficiently religious — whatever their faith — to be exempt from its jurisdiction.

The University of Great Falls did not qualify, the board concluded in February 1996.

For the next seven years, the little Catholic college fought both the federal labor board and the faculty union, keeping lots of lawyers busy and incurring official charges of unfair labor practices in the process. In 2002, it won.

The federal appeals court panel in Washington ruled that a three-prong test should be the labor board's only standard for determining which schools were religious enough to be exempt from the nation's collective bargaining laws under the Catholic Bishop decision.

Any school that is nonprofit, has a religious affiliation and presents itself to the public as a religious institution must be exempted from jurisdiction, the court said. And that included the University of Great Falls.

And the court ruled that the labor board's old case-by-case approach had to stop immediately. For the board even to conduct such inquiries raised serious issues of religious freedom, the judges said.

Of course, some casually faithful or broadly tolerant schools that might previously have failed to win a labor board exemption would easily pass the court's new test.

The appellate judges anticipated that complaint, and dismissed it. "If the university is ecumenical and open-minded, that does not make it any less religious, nor N.L.R.B. interference any less a potential infringement of religious liberty," they said.

David Strom, general counsel of the American Federation of Teachers in Washington, doesn't mince words about the impact of the Great Falls decision. "It means that the difficulty of organizing a religiously affiliated college has become enormous."

Although federal statistics show that one of every seven colleges in the country describes itself as a religious institution, it is not clear how far-reaching the Great Falls decision will be. On its face, it would seem likely to reduce any union-driven salary pressures on exempt religious schools, allowing them to maintain more competitive tuition levels. However, some colleges that might be eligible for an exemption under the new rules may already have collective bargaining in place or may not oppose unions as fiercely as the Montana university did.

And the decision limits only the protections of the National Labor Relations Act. But last fall, in a case involving teachers at Catholic schools in Boston, a federal district judge in Massachusetts ruled that part of another federal labor statute called the Taft-Hartley Act could not be applied to church-operated schools without raising First Amendment issues.

Notwithstanding the protracted battle in Great Falls, Catholic institutions are not doctrinally opposed to collective bargaining, said Julie N. Secviar, senior vice president for strategic resources for the Franciscan Sisters of Chicago Service Corporation, which manages Catholic hospitals, nursing homes and retirement communities.

DOJ_NMG_0076722

In fact, the ethical health care directives of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops require "recognition of the rights of employees to organize and bargain collectively without prejudice to the common good."

Next, Exemptions for Hospitals?

At the other end of the spectrum stand the Seventh Day Adventists, a Christian denomination with more than 14 million members worldwide. Like many denominations, it provides global humanitarian relief and maintains a large network of church schools and colleges, including Loma Linda University in California. But it also operates the largest Protestant nonprofit he alth care system in the country, with 38 hospitals in 10 states, 23 nursing homes and 44,000 employees.

And not one of those employees is in a union, for a very simple reason: The church believes that collective bargaining "defies Christ's admonitions that behavior must be directed by individual conscience" and "is inherently disruptive" of the c hurch's healing mission, as lawyers for the denomination first explained to the national labor board in 1998.

The lawyers were responding to a petition by the California Nurses Association to represent the nonsupervisory nurses employed at Ukiah Valley Medical Center.

As in the Great Falls case, the lawyers argued that the labor board had no jurisdiction because the hospital was a religious institution and to force it to recognize or bargain with a union would violate its freedom under the First Amendment and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act.

As in the Great Falls case, the labor board ruled otherwise. The next step should have been union balloting, explained Jeffrey A. Berman, the Sidley Austin lawyer who represented the hospital in the case. But the nursing association withdrew its petition and the case ended, he said.

According to the American Hospital Association, about one of every four of its members has a religious affiliation. But the Adventists' problem before the labor board was that hospitals, unlike religious schools, were specifically included in the board's jurisdiction by Congress. The only labor-law accommodation that Adventists have been able to win from Congress was a provision in 1974 allowing church members to pay the equivalent of their union dues to one of several agreed-upon secular charities, according to Mr. Berman.

Adventist hospitals are still waiting for their own Great Falls moment. As Mr. Berman put it, "We're not asking for carte blanche, for the ability to be exempt from all laws — just with respect to what is unique about these hospitals."

Church advocates: Zoning rules unfair

Churches are being turned away by cities and towns that hope to enliven a fading downtown or boost their tax base.

"There's more interest than ever in attempting to exclude churches and other houses of worship," says Kevin "Seamus" Hasson, president of the Becket Fund for Religious Liberty. "They say they don't want churches there. They want something tha t generates tax revenue."

The Liberty Legal Institute, which represents churches in religious-freedom disputes, says more communities are tightening zoning codes or considering other ways to restrict church locations.

The group received 18 calls last year from churches concerned about restrictive zoning ordinances, up from four in 2004, says Hiram Sasser, director of litigation. There have been 12 calls so far this year.

Sasser's institute, the Becket Fund and others often go to court to fight the restrictions. A federal law passed in 2000 says zoning rules must treat a house of worship the same as any secular meeting place.

The communities with restrictions say they're not against churches, they just want a variety of services for their residents and businesses that attract customers seven days a week.

Some recent examples:

•Kenly, N.C., adopted a moratorium on storefront churches in August and later expanded it to include halls, theaters and other gathering places.

DOJ_NMG_0076723

•Stafford, Texas, home to 51 places of worship in its 7 square miles, intends to tighten the zoning rules that govern church location, Mayor Leonard Scarcella says. Only 300 acres of empty land remain available for development.

"There has been this desire to locate these religious facilities in our city," he says. "That has precluded other types of development."

•Miramar, Fla., put a six-month hold on "places of public assembly," including churches, in June and is working on a permanent plan.

Miramar's leaders worry about storefront churches and other halls because they're "taking up parking at particular times and not contributing to the dynamism" of the area, says Wazir Ishmael, assistant city manager.

•The Liberty Counsel, a group that defends churches, sued Titusville, Pa., in July over zoning that prohibits churches in commercial zones where clubs and theaters are allowed. "If theaters or private clubs are permitted, then churches cannot be banned," Liberty Counsel President Anita Staver says.

Titusville Mayor Brian Sanford says the rule protects businesses that cannot be near churches. The Pennsylvania Liquor Control Board, for instance, may refuse to grant a liquor license application to an establishment within 300 feet of a church.

"When you establish a church in a commercial district, that changes the rules for everyone," he says.

Faith Embraces Pop Culture, Technology (USAT)

By Tom Krattenmaker

USA Today, October 9, 2006

Evangelical Christians have always used innovative outreach to spread their message, and the tech boom has given the movement new platforms to be 'culturally relevant.' It's a wave other faiths might want to catch.

If you want to understand why evangelical Christians are such an influential force in American culture these days, revisit a recent moment from the Steelroots television program on the i-Lifetv Christian cable channel.

The host, Ben Cerullo, is a youthful-looking skateboarder type in a T-shirt and backward ball cap who blows up objects on camera for the sheer entertainment value. "Awesome," he says as he interviews Chandler Brownlee of the outreach group Christian Surfers. Brownlee tells Cerullo and his viewers about the success of the Florida-based ministry bringing thousands of surfers into the Christian fold. He uses a telling phrase for his ministry's approach to evangelism. "Culturally relevant," he calls it.

Brownlee is talking about surfer outreach, but culturally relevant applies across the landscape of the evangelical Christian engagement with American popular culture. The basic idea: Identify the communications channels that have the attention of the public and use them to spread the message of Jesus. Skeptics might question the appropriateness of this melding of the sacred and "profane," but there's no doubting its effectiveness as a means of reaching people.

Think of a pop culture form, and chances are there's an evangelical Christian ministry reaching out to its devotees and, wherever possible, creating an alternative Christian version. Action sports, rock and rap music, pop literature, movies, news, radio and television — few cultural stones are unturned, and in production quality, the Christian versions are often indistinguishable from their mainstream corollaries. Don't forget video games. Are you ready for Bibleman: A Fight for Faith?

In Christian TV, the Inspiration Network — the parent company of i-Lifetv airing Steelroots programming — might be the most technologically forward. Like other well-known Christian TV networks, such as the Trinity Broadcasting Network and Pat Robertson's Christian Broadcasting Network, the Inspiration Network reaches its subscriber base (22 million households) via cable and satellite. But that's just the start. The network is making Steelroots and its other signature programs available on the Web. Click on the episode, and watch it on your computer.

Jumping on the latest content-delivery bandwagons, the Inspiration Network is also touting soon-to-launch features that would allow viewers to download ring tones, devotionals and video to their cellphones and iPods for use wherever, whenever. Last month, the organization rolled out video-on-demand programming for 177,000 cable subscribers in its home market of Charlotte.

"One way we try to be 'fishers of men' is by seeking to be culturally relevant," says Inspiration Network spokeswoman Kristina Hill, "which means being sensitive to the needs and interests of different demographic groups." As Hill suggests, Steelroots is more likely to connect with its skateboarding, snowboarding audience than would a program featuring a sermon by a fiftysomething man in a gray suit. Blowing up objects on camera is more reminiscent of MTV's Jackass than Jesus, but it's sure to raise the show's cool quotient and improve the odds of a 15-year-old viewer listening to the religious message.

In the quest to market Christianity to the masses, is the Inspiration Network watering down the exclusive message of the evangelical faith? Judging from the network's name — note the conspicuous absence of the word "Christian" — I initially thought as much. Before I began sampling the network's offerings, I expected Oprah-style, vaguely Christian lifestyle programming.

Underneath the broad-appeal gift wrap, however, I found straight-up evangelical Christianity with heavy promotion of the imperative to accept Jesus and the Christian Right worldview. The shows condemn abortion and homosexuality. Guests on Inspiration Today! recently have included author John McTernan, who argues that God elevated America to supremacy but is turning away from our country because of its liberal direction. (Such talk on Christian TV is hardly rare. Think Robertson.)

Featured in recent appearances on the same program was evangelical preacher and writer John Hagee, whose book Jerusalem Countdown argues that the Bible demands that the United States stand squarely with Israel or incur God's wrath. The network hypes such guests, and their views, approvingly.

That's its right, of course. The difficulty of getting these messages taken seriously by mainstream media is a major reason why Christian media exist. If secularists lack the motivation to create their own media universe, it's because, in a sense, they already have it. Their outlets are known as CBS, CNN, USA TODAY and the like.

Except for the particulars, there is nothing new about the innovative outreach by evangelicals today. Entrepreneurship and energy have characterized the movement in this country for decades, which explains its continued vitality in a time when mainline Protestantism has waned. While claiming to represent an unchanging, timeless truth, evangelicals continue impressively to reinvent the language of the message and the means of delivering it. That is why fans will soon be able to watch Inspiration Network video on their iPods.

Certainly, liberal Christians — perhaps in recognition of the advances made by the competition — are starting to get in the game. The National Council of Churches, for example, produced a TV program on poverty for NBC affiliates that aired last month. On the other hand, you will be hard-pressed to find progressive Christian groups running skateboard outreach programs, proselytizing to snowboarders, or developing video games.

As Woody Allen famously said, 80% of success is just showing up. Evangelicals are definitely showing up, and with a lot of hustle and muscle. Those Americans who worry that conservative Christians go too far in imposing their religion and values on the rest of the country — and polls show they are many — will need to do more than complain if they're to counteract that influence. They will need to get very busy.

Polish Consulate Says Jewish Groups Called To Oppose Historian

NEW YORK -- Two major American Jewish organizations helped block a prominent New York University historian from speaking at the Polish consulate here last week, saying the academic was too critical of Israel and American Jewry.

The historian, Tony Judt, is Jewish and directs New York University's Remarque Institute, which promotes the study of Europe. Judt was scheduled to talk Oct. 4 to a nonprofit organization that rents space from the consulate. Judt's subject was the Israel lobby in the United States, and he planned to argue that this lobby has often stifled honest debate.

An hour before Judt was to arrive, the Polish Consul General Krzysztof Kasprzyk canceled the talk. He said the Anti-Defamation League and the American Jewish Committee had called and he quickly concluded Judt was too controversial.

"The phone calls were very elegant but may be interpreted as exercising a delicate pressure," Kasprzyk said. "That's obvious -- we are adults and our IQs are high enough to understand that."

Judt, who was born and raised in England and lost much of his family in the Holocaust, took strong exception to the cancellation of his speech. He noted that he was forced to cancel another speech later this month at Manhattan College in the Bronx after a different Jewish group had complained. Other prominent academics have described encountering such problems, in some cases more severe, stretching over the past three decades.

The pattern, Judt says, is unmistakable and chilling.

"This is serious and frightening, and only in America -- not in Israel -- is this a problem," he said. "These are Jewish organizations that believe they should keep people who disagree with them on the Middle East away from anyone who might listen."

The leaders of the Jewish organizations denied asking the consulate to block Judt's speech and accused the professor of retailing "wild conspiracy theories" about their roles. But they applauded the consulate for rescinding Judt's invitation.

"I think they made the right decision," said Abraham H. Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League. "He's taken the position that Israel shouldn't exist. That puts him on our radar."

David A. Harris, executive director of the American Jewish Congress, took a similar view. "I never asked for a particular action; I was calling as a friend of Poland," Harris said. "The message of that evening was going to be entirely contrary to the entire spirit of Polish foreign policy."

Judt has crossed rhetorical swords with the Jewish organizations on two key issues. Over the past few years he has written essays in the New York Review of Books, the London Review of Books and in the Israeli newspaper Haaretz arguing that power in Israel has shifted to religious fundamentalists and territorial zealots, that woven into Zionism is a view of the Arab as the irreconcilable enemy, and that Israel might not survive as a communal Jewish state.

The solution, he argues, lies in a slow and tortuous walk toward a binational and secular state.

He has, of late, defended an academic paper -- co-authored by professor Stephen M. Walt of Harvard University's John F. Kennedy School of Government and John J. Mearsheimer, a professor at the University of Chicago -- which argues the American Israel lobby has pushed policies that are not in the United States' best interests and in fact often encourage Israel to engage in self-destructive behavior.

These are deeply controversial views -- Foxman of the ADL and writer Christopher Hitchens, among others, have attacked the Walt and Mearsheimer paper as anti-Semitic. And Judt's advocacy of a binational state has drawn a flock of critics, the more angry of whom accuse him of "pandering to genocide" as the Committee for Accuracy in Middle East Reporting in America put it. Former Bush speechwriter David Frum said Judt was pursuing "genocide liberalism."

Foxman has referred to Judt's views of Israel as "an offensive caricature."

The Mearsheimer and Walt paper, however, has drawn praise in some quarters in Israel, particularly on the left. So, too some Israeli writers, not least Israeli historian and social critic Amos Elon, have praised Judt's writings on Israel. Nor are Judt's arguments without historical precedent: Massachusetts Institute of Technology linguist and political philosopher Noam Chomsky, who is Jewish, has advocated a binational solution in Israel, a view that three decades ago sparked such anger that police stood guard at his college talks. More recently, the ADL repeatedly accused DePaul University professor Norman G. Finkelstein, who is Jewish and strongly opposes Israeli policies, of being a "Holocaust denier." These charges have proved baseless.

"There is an often organized and often spontaneous attempt to marginalize anyone in the Jewish world who offers a critique of Israeli policy," said Rabbi Michael Lerner, editor of the liberal magazine Tikkun. "It's equated with anti-Semitism and Israel denial."

Foxman says such complaints are silly. "Nobody has called Judt an anti-Semite," Foxman said. "People who are critical of Israel and of the Jewish people often flaunt their Jewishness. Why isn't that an issue?"

Judt replies that he only reluctantly talks of his Jewishness, in no small part to inoculate himself against charges of anti-Semitism. "For many, the way to be Jewish in this country is to aggressively assert that the Holocaust is your identification tag," Judt said. "I know perfectly well my history, but it never occurred to me that my most prominent identity was as a Jew."

A Vote We Can Believe In (WP)

By E. J. Dionne Jr.

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076726

Sometimes, paranoids are right. And sometimes even when paranoids are wrong, it's worth considering what they're worried about.

I speak here of all who are worried sick that those new, fancy high-tech voting systems can be hacked, fiddled with and otherwise made to record votes that aren't cast or fail to record votes that are.

I do not pretend to know how large a threat this is. I do know that it's a threat to democracy when so many Americans doubt that their votes will be recorded accurately. And I also know that smart, computer-savvy people are concerned about these machines.

The perfectly obvious thing is for the entire country to do what a number of states have already done: require paper trails so that if we have a close election or suspect something went wrong, we have the option to go back and check the results.

So it is heartening that a diverse group -- Republicans and Democrats, liberals and conservatives -- in Congress has proposed legislation to give everyone, even the supposedly paranoid, confidence that our elections are on the level.

The bill has been pushed by Rep. Rush Holt (D-N.J.), with strong support from Reps. Tom Davis (R-Va.) and Tom Cole (R-Okla.). It has 219 co-sponsors, which happens to be a majority of House members.

The bill requires that voting machines produce a permanent paper record that voters themselves can verify. It requires random, unannounced hand-count audits in 2 percent of all precincts to make sure the machines recorded votes properly.

It prohibits connecting any voting machine component to the Internet and bans political and financial conflicts of interest among manufacturers, test laboratories and political parties. It also includes protections for voters with disabilities.

Pretty much common sense, right? The problem is that the issue of protecting the right to vote has been mired in partisanship and in the suspicion that all who worry about electronic voting are crazy conspiracy-mongers who imagine the worst about everybody.

But Holt and Davis don't fit the stereotype. "I have steered clear of conspiracy theories because I'm not a conspiracist by nature," says Holt who has a PhD in physics and has no problem with innovation. "But I'm quick to say that you cannot disprove the conspiracy theories if you don't have a paper trail." Anyone with confidence in these machines should have faith that they'll pass any tests of how well they'd work.

Because of the bitter disputes over what happened in Florida in 2000 and Ohio in 2004, some Republicans are suspicious that all the noise surrounding the new voting machines is being generated by angry Democrats. "When I first introduced the bill a couple of sessions ago," Holt says, "a lot of Republicans stayed away from it because they believed that it was payback for Florida."

But over time, many Republicans have come to realize that machine errors are nonpartisan. Tom Davis is about as loyal a Republican as you'll find. He came to this cause in part because a result in a Virginia school board race not only defied everyone's expectations but seemed to him flatly wrong.

"Some people will call me paranoid," Davis chuckles, "but it was real clear to me that in that race, some votes weren't picked up." And the technology, he says, made it impossible to check the count.

In fact, as Davis notes, partisan splits on the new technologies vary sharply from state to state. Whichever party happened to control the election board that spent a lot of money on the new technologies tends to resist challenges to it. But defensiveness, by election officials or by vendors, should not get in the way of reforms and protections.

Nor, says Davis, should political polarization be allowed to stop even those reforms that have a lot of bipartisan support. "A lot of no-brainers that ought to be getting done," he says, "aren't getting done."

There are respectable studies -- for example, one released this summer by the Brennan Center for Justice at New York University School of Law -- suggesting that the new machines may be far easier to hack than we want to know. But Holt explains why even skeptics of such studies should favor technological safety nets just in case they someday prove to be right.

"The winners will always believe the results of elections," says Holt. "But it eats away at democracy if the loser thinks that something went wrong, for accidental or malicious reasons."

Let's hope that things go okay this November, and then let's make sure that winners and losers alike can have confidence in our system the next time around.

Real Bad ID (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

It's unfair to say that the Republican Congress has done nothing on immigration. In one respect, according to a new report from state officials, Congress made matters worse.

In May of last year Congress passed the Real ID Act at the urging of House Judiciary Chairman James Sensenbrenner (R., Wis.). It was yet another border-security measure, intended to thwart illegal immigration by denying drivers' licenses to undocumented aliens. President Bush signed the legislation in hopes that Republicans then would meet him halfway on comprehensive immigration reform. Didn't happen. We now know that the Tom Tancredo "enforcement first" crowd has no intention of ever compromising with Mr. Bush.

We doubt Mexicans willing to risk their lives crossing hundreds of miles of desert on foot care much about not being able to obtain a drivers' license once here. Nor is deputizing Department of Motor Vehicle officials going to force many illegal aliens already in the country to return home. The most likely result is more unlicensed and uninsured motorists, which means more dangerous U.S. roads.

Real ID gets worse. According to a new analysis from the National Governors Association, the National Conference of State Legislatures and the American Association of Motor Vehicle Administrators, the law is also going to be costly and burdensome.

Under Real ID, all 245 million existing holders of drivers' licenses must apply -- in person -- for new, standardized identification cards. The report says that state motor vehicle department staffs will need to be more than doubled, and workers will have to be trained to verify copies of original birth certificates, Social Security cards and the like. Misplaced your Social Security card? Have fun getting a new one. We're pretty sure that voters don't elect Republicans to increase the size of their already bloated state bureaucracies.

And yes, you can expect longer lines at the DMV in the future. "Real ID will reduce efficiencies and increase wait times," according to the report. "Real ID will also effectively reverse state practices designed to ease an applicant's interaction with motor vehicle agencies (e.g., Internet, mail in renewal, over-the-counter issuance)." The deadline for compliance is May 2008. After that, identification from states that don't meet the new national requirements won't be accepted at federal agencies.

Proponents claim that standardizing drivers' licenses is essential to fighting terrorism on the domestic front. Mr. Sensenbrenner has said that Real ID will stop the next Mohamed Atta. But the 9/11 hijackers entered the country legally, which means they qualified for valid drivers' licenses. Nothing in the new law changes that reality, or the fact that you still don't need a driver's license to board a plane. Other forms of ID, such as a passport, will continue to suffice.

All this cost and inconvenience might be acceptable if the law did what its proponents claim. But like a 700-mile fence along a 2,000-mile border, Real ID amounts to one more anti-immigration measure that ignores the economic incentives that draw immigrants here in the first place.

State agencies put the total cost of standardizing drivers' licenses at upwards of $11 billion; Congress has so far appropriated all of $40 million. Again, this is from a Republican Congress that made its first legislation upon taking power in 1995 a bill against imposing "unfunded mandates." It included a pledge not to impose any burden on the states that wasn't fully financed from Washington. Now comes Real ID, transforming state departments of motor vehicles back into everyone's worst nightmare. Some accomplishment.

ANTITRUST:

Google To Buy YouTube For $1.65bn (FT)

By Kevin Allison And Aline Van Duyn

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

Google, the internet search giant, has agreed to acquire YouTube, the California-based video start-up, for $1.65bn in an all-stock transaction that will turn the company's 20-something co-founders into instant multi-millionaires.

DOJ_NMG_0076728

The deal makes YouTube – which has yet to turn a profit but which has grown into one of the most popular internet destinations with 100m daily video viewings – the first site dedicated to user-generated content to be sold for more than $1bn, setting a new price level for the sector.

"The YouTube team has built an exciting and powerful media platform that complements Google's mission to organise the world's information and make it universally accessible and useful," said Eric Schmidt, Google chief executive. "Our companies share similar values; we both always put our users first and are committed to innovating to improve their experience. Together, we are natural partners to offer a compelling media entertainment service to users, content owners and advertisers."

Google said the start-up would retain separate offices and all its 67 employees.

In spite of YouTube's popularity there have been questions about the sustainability of the company in light of the large amount of illegally copied material viewed on the site and limited advertising revenues to date.

However, YouTube has struck deals with big US media companies to legitimately distribute their video content – three were announced on Monday – reducing the threat of copyright lawsuits.

Chad Hurley, YouTube chief executive, said the acquisition would allow the company to "sharpen our focus" in working with content providers to overcome the copyright issue.

In addition, Google's technical expertise and clout with advertisers could turn YouTube into a highly profitable venture, especially as advertisers increasingly look to target the young audience which is spending less time watching television and more time watching videos on sites such as YouTube.

"Large advertisers are looking to spend more money with Google," said Ben Schachter, analyst at UBS. "Video is a major focus, and YouTube increases [Google's] inventory."

The deal is one of Google's biggest acquisitions in its eight-year history. It marks a tacit admission by Google that the search group's own video site has failed to gain the same traction among its audience as YouTube.

"When we looked at the marketplace, there was a clear winner in [the] networking and social networking side of video," said Mr Schmidt.

The deal follows the acquisition last year by Rupert Murdoch's News Corp of MySpace.com, the social networking site, for $580m in cash, at the time considered a hefty price for a media start-up but now widely regarded as having been a good investment in order to tap the online youth audience.

Facebook, another social networking site which has also grown hugely in terms of its online audience, has also had talks with media and internet companies about a possible acquisition.

YouTube signed deals on Monday to offer music videos from Vivendi's Universal Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment, as well as television content from CBS, sharing any related advertising revenue.

YouTube has had acquisition talks with a number of media companies. A deal would make Mr Hurley and Steve Chen, its other co-founder, multi-millionaires.

Google, YouTube To Join Web Forces (WT)

By Kara Rowland

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

Internet search behemoth Google Inc. said yesterday it would buy online video leader YouTube Inc. for $1.65 billion, vaulting the Mountain View, Calif., company to the forefront of the online video craze.

The much-anticipated deal, announced after the markets closed, confirmed press reports last week that Google, jockeying for a bigger slice of the online video business, was set on buying the 19-month-old YouTube.

"This is the next step in the evolution of the Internet," Eric Schmidt, chief executive officer of Google, told analysts and reporters on a conference call yesterday.

Mr. Schmidt and YouTube executives touted the potential of Google's search technology and advertising model combined with the loyal online community of YouTube, which receives 100 million video views per day.

DOJ_NMG_0076729

"Right now, we're in the middle of a shift in digital media entertainment," said Chad Hurley, chief executive officer and co-founder of YouTube. "Users are now in control of what they watch and when they want to watch it. They decide what rises to the top. By joining forces with Google, we'll be able to sharpen our focus on that vision."

Both companies have received corporate approvals for the deal, which they expect to close in the fourth quarter. Under the transaction, YouTube will retain its brand and continue to operate independently, officials said on the call.

In terms of market share, YouTube is the clear leader over Google's competing service: Last month, the video service posted a share of visits four times greater than Google Video, according to Hitwise, a New York Internet market research firm. YouTube ranked first in online video services with a share of 45.97 percent, ahead of MySpace Videos at 21.17 percent. Google Video came in third at 11.01 percent.

"This is an extremely volatile space when you consider the fact that YouTube didn't even exist a year ago in terms of having a launched service," said Bill Tancer, general manager of global research at Hitwise.

Mr. Schmidt stressed that Google Video will continue to exist, noting that it will become "even more integrated with Google overall."

Mr. Hurley, who in previous reports had said YouTube was not for sale, said the Google deal was the right fit.

"Those comments were made because we wanted to remain independent and continue on our mission to build great products for users," he said. "By working with Google, that's still the case."

YouTube, which just 20 months ago was running on credit-card debt, will keep its headquarters in San Bruno, Calif. All 67 employees will remain with the company.

Executives said it is too early to tell how the integration will take place and how user experiences might change.

"There's no shortage of projects in the weeks ahead," said Steve Chen, co-founder of YouTube.

Both companies stressed their dedication to protecting copyrights in response to analysts' concerns over potential lawsuits that could result as users incorporate copyrighted content into their creations.

By next month, YouTube plans to roll out new audio fingerprinting and search mechanisms to identify and protect copyrighted content, Mr. Chen said.

Dmitry Shapiro, chief executive officer and founder of Veoh Networks Inc. in La Jolla, Calif., said the Google-YouTube deal paves the way for thousands of similar peer-to-peer video-sharing sites.

YouTube "is much more than another Web site that shares video; what we're all trying to do is reinvent television broadcasting," said Mr. Shapiro, calling his company, which focuses on delivering longer, TV-grade content to viewers, "the next thing after YouTube."

"I think that traditional media companies very much understand that the world is changing right in front of their eyes and that they need to jump in and make some decisions and play or be disenfranchised."

The acquisition comes on the heels of announcements yesterday morning that both Google and YouTube are teaming up with major music labels to distribute music videos online and share in the advertising revenue.

Google inked deals with Warner Music Group Corp. and Sony BMG Music Entertainment, while YouTube teamed up with Universal Music Group, as well as Sony BMG.

YouTube also announced a partnership with CBS Corp. to air clips from popular shows such as "Survivor," "CSI" and "Late Show With David Letterman."

The companies described the new media partnerships as mutually beneficial to content producers, who can compensate artists and better enforce copyright protections, and video service providers, who can use the additional content to attract more viewers.

Users will be able to access streaming content and incorporate it into their own videos. In addition, Google Video will make Warner Music Group's content available for purchase at $1.99 per download.

Google Looks To Boost Ads With YouTube (WSJ)

By Kevin J. Delaney

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076730

With its $1.65 billion agreement to acquire YouTube Inc., Google Inc. may be able to broaden its online-advertising business and boost its video offerings to meet the rapidly changing viewing habits of consumers.

The all-stock purchase announced yesterday of closely held YouTube, a 19-month-old, San Bruno, Calif., startup with 67 employees, highlights users' growing consumption of video online and the booming sales of Web advertising. The hefty price tag also reflects the interest of other media and technology companies in acquiring YouTube as a way to jump-start their online-video efforts.

The deal -- the largest in Google's eight-year history -- marries Google's massive collection of computers, data lines and systems for serving up online ads from hundreds of thousands of advertisers with YouTube's leading position in playing videos for users on the Web. It could transform Google, of Mountain View, Calif., into a bigger power broker for the distribution of video online, following the mixed track record of its own online-video efforts. YouTube has said that consumers view videos through its service, ranging from homemade videos to movie clips, more than 100 million times daily.

"This is going to allow us to continue to develop features for our community and our partners, allow us to sharpen our focus," said YouTube Chief Executive Chad Hurley in an interview. "We'll be able to leverage the technology and resources of Google to supercharge our efforts in those areas."

The acquisition could also boost Google's ambitions to significantly broaden its ad-brokering activities beyond simple text ads on Web pages to larger amounts of video advertising online. The Web-search company places ads, often targeted by specific keywords such as "Chicago hotel," on its own and partner sites using an automated online system and has said it intends to also broker ads in radio, print media and television.

"We believe the combination of Google and YouTube will create this very new and interesting global media platform for users, content providers and advertisers all around the world," said Google CEO Eric Schmidt during a conference call announcing the deal.

The sale is a huge windfall for YouTube, which Mr. Hurley, 29, founded in Feb. 2005 in his garage along with chief technology officer Steve Chen, 28, and another former colleague from eBay Inc.'s PayPal electronic-payment unit. Mr. Hurley had said in a June interview that an initial public offering in the future was a possibility. But the offer from Google was attractive enough to lead YouTube to abandon that interest.

Some analysts raised questions about YouTube's price tag. Critics said Google could be exposing itself to liability for copyright violations, since videos posted by users without permission of content owners are available through YouTube's site. The start-up already faces one lawsuit related to this issue. YouTube has been racing to sign deals with media and entertainment companies to license their content and head off any additional litigation, generally agreeing to share online ad revenue with the content owners. "The YouTube commitment to enforcing copyrights is very consistent with Google's," said David Drummond, Google's senior vice president of corporate development. Mr. Drummond said the two companies remove any infringing content when notified by a copyright holder.

In a prelude to the acquisition announcement, YouTube early Monday announced agreements with Vivendi SA's Universal Music Group and Sony Corp. and Bertelsmann AG joint venture Sony BMG to make their music videos available through YouTube and to allow consumers to use music from the two companies as soundtracks for their own videos on YouTube. The video site also signed a content and ad-revenue-sharing agreement with CBS Corp. related to video from CBS Television Network, Showtime Networks Inc. and CSTV Networks Inc. Google separately announced agreements with Warner Music Group Corp. and Sony BMG to make music videos and other content available for free through its video service and on partner sites.

YouTube's deal with Universal Music is particularly significant since Universal Music Chief Executive Doug Morris told investors last month that YouTube violates copyright laws by allowing users to post music videos and other content. Universal Music has considered taking legal action against YouTube over that issue, say people familiar with the matter.

Yahoo Inc., News Corp. and Microsoft Corp. were among the other companies that expressed interest in acquiring YouTube, say people familiar with the matter. YouTube had earlier passed on a lower offer from Google and held acquisition discussions with Yahoo, which tendered an offer in recent weeks, say people familiar with the matter. Yahoo's offer, valid for 24-hours, expired amid its concerns about copyright- and revenue-related issues though talks continued after the expiration, one of the people says.

A Microsoft spokeswoman said the company "evaluated acquiring this type of technology several months ago" but decided to build its own service, a test version of which opened recently.

Meanwhile, Google significantly increased its offer and deal talks between the two gathered intensity late Tuesday, when Google's Mr. Drummond and YouTube Chief Financial Officer Gideon Yu drafted a term sheet, a person familiar with the matter says. In parallel, the two companies worked to complete content and ad-revenue-sharing partnerships with the major music companies and CBS Corp. that were announced yesterday morning.

News Corp. sniffed around YouTube as recently as last week, but never made a firm offer because the start-up said it was not for sale, say people familiar with the matter. On Friday, when the news of the Google negotiations surfaced, News Corp. sent a letter to YouTube asking for an opportunity to participate in the sale process, according to the familiar people. YouTube didn't respond, these people said. Behind the scenes, Google's deal to purchase YouTube is threatening to create a rift between Google and News Corp., which jointly made headlines in August with an ad-brokering deal under which Google guaranteed revenue of $900 million over three and a half years to News Corp. for its MySpace social-networking service and other sites.

Over the weekend, News Corp. executives expressed their displeasure with the deal to Google and threatened to remove any links to YouTube videos placed by users on their MySpace blog pages, according to a person close to the situation. Google's Mr. Schmidt and Advertising Sales Vice President Tim Armstrong are scheduled to meet this week in Los Angeles with News Corp. Chairman Rupert Murdoch, President Peter Chernin and Ross Levinsohn, head of its Fox Interactive Media online unit, to discuss the matter.

News Corp. earlier this year held discussions with NBC Universal and Viacom about jointly building a YouTube rival, according to people familiar with the situation. The three media companies discussed putting their television videos on a new site, but ultimately the talks foundered, these people say. This month, News Corp. announced it would put video clips from its Fox television shows up on MySpace.

YouTube's sale could represent a significant financial gain for venture capital firm Sequoia Capital, which has provided funding to the start-up. Sequoia holds roughly 30% of YouTube, says a person familiar with the matter. Under the sale agreement, YouTube will retain some independence, keeping its brand, offices and management. Google will also continue to operate its separate Google Video service.

Google Cues Up With YouTube (USAT)

By Jefferson Graham

USA Today, October 10, 2006

Internet search giant Google on Monday snapped up red-hot video-sharing website YouTube for $1.65 billion in an all-stock deal.

Video “is the next step in the evolution of the Internet,” Google CEO Eric Schmidt told news reporters in a conference call.

YouTube, which launched in 2005, has grown overnight into the Internet's most popular place to watch videos, showing 100 million daily. Yet, along the way it became a hotbed for copyright infringement, with many contributors posting videos of TV shows or using copyrighted songs in homegrown productions.

YouTube, in clearing the way for a deal, announced an alliance with record label Universal Music — one of the site's harshest critics — that called for a filtering system that would automatically weed out videos with its songs.

By aligning with Google, YouTube now has the resources to build an even stronger filtering system that would please all content owners, said Chad Hurley, 29, one of YouTube's co-founders.

Google said YouTube will remain independent, with a separate website. Google will continue to run its own Google Video site, which also features homemade videos and professional content from networks and movie studios.

Where visitors will see change is in Google searches: Videos from YouTube will begin appearing in search results.

The addition of YouTube videos brings “a humongous amount of content that will be searchable” on Google, says John Battelle, who runs the Searchblog website. That makes Google that much more valuable, he says, because it can profit with more advertising from YouTube videos.

DOJ_NMG_0076732

Google reported $6.1 billion in revenue last year, virtually all from little text-based ads that appear near search results. It's been on a tear this year, trying to expand into video advertising and creating recent alliances with MTV Networks and MySpace.

Now, says Scott Kessler, an analyst at research firm Standard & Poor's, Google is "far and away the leader in video advertising."

Investors applauded Google's deal. Shares in the company rose $2.75 in after-hours trading after closing at $429, up $8.50 a share, in regular trading.

In less than a year, YouTube in San Bruno, Calif., quickly became a social phenomenon as a way for users to easily share — and discuss — homegrown videos. It has seen a 2,500% increase in its audience base, according to measurement firm ComScore Media Metrix.

The site had 72 million visitors in August, up from just 2.8 million visitors a year before. It's now the Internet's 14th-most-visited site. Google is No. 3 after Yahoo and MSN.

Google-YouTube Deal Joins Net Search And Video Forces (USAT)

By Kevin Maney

USA Today, October 10, 2006

A landmark in the future of media happened over a meal at Denny's.

Last week, as multiple offers swirled around YouTube, Google co-founder Larry Page and CEO Eric Schmidt met YouTube founders Chad Hurley and Steve Chen at a Silicon Valley Denny's.

"We discussed the possibilities and the excitement we both shared" for video on the Internet, Hurley says. "They have the resources to help us accelerate that."

Google is buying YouTube for $1.65 billion, the companies said Monday. The biggest force in search and Internet advertising is soaking up the biggest force in online video. But the combination means more than that.

The deal is part of a vision consistent across the technology and media landscape. It's the same vision that brought together YouTube and Google. Mass media — the grand media trend of the 20th century — is becoming personal media.

The Internet is making it possible for people to find and consume any song, TV program, video or movie anytime they want. That's because video content, from instructions on how to groom a poodle to clips from CBS' 60 Minutes, is increasingly available on the Net.

At the same time, cheap technology like video cameras and editing software is allowing just about anyone to create video content, adding ever more personal and esoteric media to the mix of offerings.

If you listen to YouTube's founders or Google's leaders, you can hear what that's going to be like. Search Google for "plumbing toilet flusher" and you'll probably find a how-to video on YouTube. "For queries like that, a lot of times video is the best result," Google's Page says.

Planning a vacation to Osaka, Japan? Search and find all the home videos taken by tourists and posted on the Web. Music videos, news and movie trailers will all be there. A few hours before Google said it will buy YouTube, YouTube announced deals to legally put music videos from Universal and Sony BMG on its site, and news and sports from CBS.

"This is the next step in the evolution of the Internet," Google CEO Schmidt says. On Monday, he kept noting that YouTube founders Chen and Hurley remind him of Google's founders in Google's early days — a couple of guys with a plan to alter the universe.

All of this helps explain an explosion in Internet video. Venture capital investments in video-sharing sites are on track to set a record this year. VCs pumped $156 million into such start-ups during the first half of this year vs. $267 million all of last year, says Dow Jones VentureOne.

Internet video sites have exploded from barely any just one year ago to more than 240. New ones appear every week. The industry hasn't seen anything like it since the Web-retailing zaniness of the mid-to-late-1990s. Recent arrivals include Eefoof, Bix, Guba, Blennus, Stickam and Frozen Hippo.

DOJ_NMG_0076733

Big players are crashing the party. In January, Google put up Google Video — which, by the way, isn't going away. “Google video doesn't go away ever — I want to make that clear,” Schmidt says. Meanwhile, Yahoo and AOL are aggressively moving into video. So is News Corp.-owned MySpace.

Advertisers in just the past six months have come to love Internet video and are increasingly pushing ad dollars that way.

“You've got more video being viewed on YouTube than you do on some cable channels,” says Ian Schafer, CEO of Deep Focus, a marketing firm that represents studios such as The Weinstein Co. He says that the marriage of Google and YouTube could form “another video network that in many ways eclipses the eyeballs of some mass media.”

“We are seeing the number of terabytes of video delivered doubling every three months,” says Alan Ramadan, a top executive at Macromedia, which makes the Flash player that shows video on both Google and YouTube. “I haven't seen this kind of demand before, and it's something that we all felt the Web could become one day — a distribution platform for rich content and experiences.”

At the center of the whirlwind stands YouTube, which actually moved its headquarters over the weekend from San Mateo to San Bruno in California's Silicon Valley — while the founders negotiated the Google deal. “It was a busy weekend,” Chen says with a laugh.

The company launched in the summer of 2005, and by March 2006 was the star at high-level tech conference PC Forum. In January of this year, YouTube had 9.5 million unique visitors, according to ComScore. In August, that had grown to 72 million. To those users, YouTube is streaming more than 100 million videos a day. Yes, a day.

“This was a company that was moving very, very quickly," says Mark Heesen, president of the National Venture Capital Association trade group. He compares YouTube's trajectory to Skype, the Internet phone company started in August 2003 and sold to eBay last year for $2.5 billion in cash and stock.

In the past few months, it seems that everyone in technology realized the power of the video trend on the Net and saw the movement toward personal media. That's when the suitors came calling.

“A lot of parties expressed interest,” Hurley says. Though he won't name them, Yahoo and News Corp. were among names that surfaced as suitors. “We wanted to remain independent, but as discussions progressed with Google, we saw an opportunity to remain independent and continue our vision, but with a lot more resources and experience behind us.”

Google did, in fact, promise to leave YouTube alone — it will keep all its employees, separate headquarters, its own brand.

“I've been pretty giddy over this,” Chen says. But he admits that he's not yet sure what, exactly, will change about the way YouTube or Google handles video. Right now, for instance, a search on Google Video will not find a video that's on YouTube. That will change.

“It all happened so quickly, the exact details of integrating the products are still up in the air,” Chen says. “We're forming integration teams right now.”

For Google, the deal means it now owns the top brand in Internet video and a backup plan for its own push into video. Google Video has failed to catch fire.

Some critics say Google just bought itself a boatload of potential lawsuits. A good deal of video on YouTube is snatched off TV programs and movies by individuals and posted there — and that could be infringing on copyrights. But Google and YouTube both waved that off on Monday, pointing to the day's deals with CBS and record labels as proof that content owners would rather work with YouTube than take it to court.

“The copyright concerns are overblown,” says Suranga Chandratillake, CEO of BlinkX, a video search engine that competes with Google Video. “Content owners are more interested in doing business than ever” for Internet video.

They see how powerful this new personal media can be. The rock band OK Go recently proved that. It made a simple video with a handheld video camera of its four members dancing on treadmills and posted the video on YouTube. In four weeks, the video was viewed more than 3.5 million times. As a result, OK Go's album saw a 182% jump on Billboard's Digital Album chart and shipped another 50,000 CDs.

In the grand scheme of things, the $1.65 billion Google is paying for YouTube doesn't rank high among the largest U.S. buyouts so far this year, tracker Dealogic says. The biggest was a deal in March by AT&T to buy BellSouth, valued at $67 billion at the time. Alcatel agreed to pay $13.4 billion for Lucent in April.

But when it comes to shaping the future, a couple billion dollars negotiated under Denny's fluorescent lights might be the winner.

Google Buys Video-Sharing Site YouTube (LAT)

By Jesus Sanchez

The Los Angeles Times, October 10, 2006

Google Inc. today agreed to purchase YouTube Inc. for $1.65 billion in stock in a deal that will combine the Internet's largest search engine and its most popular site to watch video.

The transaction, which had been widely expected, comes after YouTube's owners had fielded proposals from such media giants as Viacom Inc. and News Corp. Those suitors and others wanted to capitalize on the company's fast growing website, where visitors view an estimated 100 million videos a day

"By joining forces with Google, we can benefit from its global reach and technology leadership to deliver a more comprehensive entertainment experience for our users and to create new opportunities for our partners," said YouTube Chief Executive Officer and co-founder Chad Hurley in a statement.

Mountain View-based Google said that YouTube would continue to operate as a separate company and retain all employees. The acquisition is scheduled to be completed by year's end.

"The YouTube team has built an exciting and powerful media platform that complements Google's mission to organize the world's information and make it universally accessible and useful," said Eric Schmidt, chief executive officer of Google, in a statement.

In addition to attracting hoards of viewers, YouTube has also drawn threats of lawsuits from music labels and TV studios for not adequately blocking copyrighted works. Meanwhile, the 60-person start-up is struggling to make enough money to offset its bandwidth costs.

The deal marks the first time Google, which prefers to fill in its product line with small acquisitions, has bought a technology company that makes a competing — and more successful — product.

It also would be a major acknowledgment by Google that its own video service, launched in January, failed to keep pace with the San Mateo, Calif.-based upstart, founded by Hurley and Steve Chen.

YouTube received 46% of all visits to online video websites in September, compared with 11% for Google, according to Hitwise, a market research firm.

Observers said Google could give YouTube the advertising connections, technology team and legitimacy it needed to dominate the video-sharing business in much the same way that social-networking site MySpace blossomed into an Internet heavyweight since it joined News Corp. last year.

YouTube is experimenting with ways to make money, including charging advertisers to feature videos on its home page, and to create branded channels for the content.

Also, Warner Music Group Inc. agreed to license its entire catalog of music and videos to YouTube in exchange for a cut of any revenue from advertising or sponsorships sold around its music.

Google Gambles On Web Video (WP)

By Sara Kehaulani Goo

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Google said yesterday that it will acquire Internet video phenomenon YouTube for $1.65 billion in stock, a deal that leaves the search giant betting on the future of online video as well as tackling some of the risks that come with managing a site built by a homegrown audience.

The deal, which Google called "the next step in the evolution of the Internet," is reminiscent of the late 1990s, when Web companies judged their success by the buzz they created more than by immediate profits. This time, YouTube, an as-yet-

In less than a year, YouTube attracted more than 72 million unique monthly visitors by allowing users to share short homemade video clips. Through word of mouth, the site became an instant Internet phenomenon, providing a huge library of entertaining videos and giving a voice to budding Internet stars every week.

"There's a new class of sites that have really developed very quickly, are very successful and very attractive to users and are obviously delivering value," Sergey Brin, a Google co-founder, said in a conference call. "It's kind of a next generation of Internet sites and companies. . . . It's a whole new ecosystem, and we're excited to be a part of it."

Behind the buzz of the high-priced deal come a number of gambles, including a large amount of copyrighted material on the site that attracted both viewers who shared the videos and lawyers who cried foul on behalf of the copyright holders. Clips of popular shows such as "South Park," "The Daily Show with Jon Stewart" and "Laguna Beach" can be found on the site.

Also a factor is the fickleness of YouTube's online audience, which could migrate elsewhere or become turned off by the large amount of corporate advertising making its way onto the site. A year after online star MySpace.com, a social networking site, was acquired by News Corp. for $580 million, the core audience has shifted from teenagers to people in their thirties.

"The game back in the 1990s to 2001 was to attract as many eyeballs as possible. That hasn't changed," said Tim Bajarin, a longtime technology consultant and futurist with Creative Strategies. "The big difference today is the social network. One of the most powerful methods for spreading information is word of mouth, and the incredible explosion of that use, from spreading information and inviting people, especially within this young age group, is one huge difference."

Several analysts said they were surprised by the nature and price of YouTube's sale, which equates to about $22 per visitor, according to senior analyst Brian Haven of Forrester Research. That's a substantial jump from the roughly $10 per visitor in the MySpace acquisition. College-oriented networking site Facebook, which has about 14.7 million visitors monthly, has been said to be in acquisition talks with Yahoo for $1 billion -- about $67 per visitor.

Haven judged the YouTube price to be "a little high," but said "online video is really exploding. There's a lot of profit for it in the future."

Some analysts had cautioned Google not to purchase YouTube out of concern that online audiences could shift if they didn't like how a site was evolving. Earlier this year, several thousand members of social networking site Tribe.net left to start another site in protest of new restrictions put in place by new management.

"We would be cautions about [Google] paying up to buy a hot video site like Youtube.com because hot sites may fetch bubble-like valuations, and what is a fad today may be forgotten by next year," wrote Guzman & Co. analyst Phil Remek in a research note earlier this year.

After MySpace was acquired by News Corp., the Web site attracted more media companies, music labels and movie studios, which built their own pages as members of the group. But that gave the site a more corporate feel. Before the acquisition, teenagers made up 25 percent of the membership. Today, only 12 percent of the site's members are teens, according to ComScore Networks Inc.

Today, people over age 35 dominate, making up 40 percent of the membership. Overall, MySpace has gained 34 million members in the past year, according to ComScore.

MySpace "got a lot more people in the older age bracket, but not at the expense of losing people in the younger bracket. The buying power of the older people probably exceeds the younger people, so for advertisers, it's a positive," said Gian Fulgoni, chairman of ComScore. "It might turn out that News Corp. got a heck of a deal."

Google said it planned to keep YouTube separate from its own video site, though it would leverage Google search and other technology to enhance YouTube. Google declined to answer questions about how quickly it expected to earn profit from YouTube.

YouTube has received $11.5 million in venture funding from Sequoia Capital and is estimated to be spending at least $2 million monthly to operate the content-rich site. Sequoia owns roughly 30 percent of YouTube, according to the Associated Press. Google also will inherit a copyright-infringement lawsuit filed against YouTube by a journalist who operates the Los Angeles News Service. YouTube has been able to prevent more lawsuits by negotiating with media companies to provide their content on the site in revenue-sharing deals. So far, the site has announced deals with NBC Universal and Warner Music Group. Yesterday, deals were announced with Sony BMG, CBS and Universal Music Group.

Greg Kostello, a former executive at Mp3.com, which was sued for copyright infringement over its music content years ago, said YouTube has not been hit by more lawsuits because it has had few assets. "If you sue them [before they are acquired], you're not going to get much," Kostello said.

YouTube said yesterday that it is developing a technology that will scan keywords and audio in the uploaded clips for potential copyright infringements. YouTube and Google left open the possibility that the site could become more commercial. YouTube chief executive Chad Hurley said he planned to introduce new advertising platforms and ways to integrate search and advertising technologies into the video clips. But he was noncommittal when asked if he would allow "pre-roll" advertisements to run before certain videos begin playing, a move counter to YouTube's current policy.

"We're going to be exploring a lot of options," he said. Google's advertising technologies "present a good experience that benefits our users' experience and helps partners monetize their content."

But it could also upset members, who react when they feel that the site is heading in the wrong direction, such as what happened when rapper and hip-hop mogul Sean "P. Diddy" Combs was featured in a video.

Shortly after, member Lisa Donovan created her own video that mimicked the rap star's video clip.

"YouTube is very much a community. There's a community voice, and there's a group of people very protective of their space. They were turned off by P. Diddy. It was so apparent they were just being advertised to," Donovan said. "That's what you expect on TV."

Like it or not, though, this sort of site is attractive to larger companies.

For Google, the YouTube acquisition boosts its traction in the online video space, where it hasn't had much success. Google's own video site has consistently lagged behind YouTube. With more than 100 million videos being viewed on YouTube daily, it attracts about four times more traffic than Google Video, according to Hitwise.

Google To Acquire YouTube For $1.65 Billion (NYT)

By ANDREW ROSS SORKIN And JEREMY W. PETERS

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

Google announced this afternoon that it would buy YouTube, the popular video-sharing Web site, for stock that it valued at $1.65 billion.

Google beat out a number of other YouTube suitors, including Microsoft, Viacom, Yahoo and the News Corporation. By successfully negotiating the deal, Google has once again proved that it is the Internet's dominant player.

Under the terms of the deal, YouTube will retain much of its identity and will keep its name and its office in San Bruno, Calif., more than 25 miles from Google's headquarters in Mountain View.

Chad Hurley, YouTube's co-founder and chief executive, has repeatedly said he would prefer for his company to remain independent. Asked about such comments in a conference call with Wall Street analysts and investors held late this afternoon, Mr. Hurley said his company did want to stay independent, adding that "by working with Google, that's still the case."

Steve Chen, also a YouTube co-founder, said, "It is hard for me to imagine a better fit for two companies," both in terms of technology and company culture.

The rise of YouTube has been meteoric. The Internet start-up has been in operation for less than a year, yet it already has an estimated 50 million users worldwide.

The acquisition of the privately held YouTube will enable Google to thrive in one area of the Internet where it has so far failed to gain footing. According to Hitwise, which monitors Web traffic, has the lion's share of online video traffic. YouTube has a 46 percent share, MySpace has 23 percent and Google Video has 10 percent.

The deal will also greatly benefit YouTube, which would have Google's vast resources to help it navigate some sticky legal issues. Copyrighted videos often find their way onto YouTube's pages despite efforts by the site to prevent it. YouTube could also benefit from a Google alliance as it tries to develop new software to prevent copyright infringement.

These copyright issues have led some in the technology industry to compare YouTube to Napster, the song file-sharing service that eventually had to shut down after a protracted legal fight with the recording industry.

Earlier today, YouTube signed three separate deals that should provide some legal protection from copyright infringement claims. One of the deals will allow YouTube to broadcast CBS programming. In addition, YouTube reached agreements with the Universal Music Group and Sony BMG Music Entertainment that will allow it to broadcast music videos.

YouTube, Google and Napster all share one common thread: a bootstraps success story of young technology buffs who started with nothing. Mr. Hurley and Mr. Chen started YouTube after the two struggled to share videos of a dinner party in January 2005. Still in their 20's and working from a garage, the two secured $3.5 million in capital from Sequoia Capital, the same firm that helped finance Google when it was still a fledgling company, as well as other Silicon Valley stars like Apple, Cisco, Oracle and Yahoo.

The YouTube deal represents a significant payday for Sequoia Capital, one of Silicon Valley's most successful venture capital firms. Sequoia invested a total of $11.5 million in two separate rounds and was the only venture firm to invest in the company.

Sequoia's stake in YouTube has been estimated at approximately 30 percent, which means it would be worth about $495 million based on the acquisition price.

Experts say Sequoia's go-it-alone investment in YouTube represents the kind of aggressive move for which Sequoia is known. A more typical, and safer, approach would have been to bring in other investors, especially for an early stage investment in a company at risk of becoming the target of costly lawsuits.

"They had an absurdly high level of confidence with what they were doing," said Paul Kedrosky, a venture capitalist and author of the blog Infectious Greed.

The fact that a Sequoia partner, Michael Moritz, sits on the board of Google, while his colleague, Roelof Botha, led the investment in YouTube, could have given Google more insights, and therefore, more confidence, into the legal risks associated with YouTube, Mr. Kedrosky said.

Google has experienced explosive growth in recent years, and in the past two years the value of its stock has more than quadrupled. Today, Google's shares gained $8.50, or 2 percent, to close at $429 following news reports about a deal with YouTube. The deal was announced after the stock market closed.

Google's most recent earnings report showed that the company's second-quarter profits more than doubled from a year earlier. Its employee base has grown by about a fifth during the first half of the year.<NYT_AUTHOR_ID>

Ready For Its Close-Up (NYT)

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

Even by the standards of the online world, YouTube has been something of an overnight sensation, spreading like a gale-driven wildfire almost from the moment it officially debuted last December. The Web site cracked the code for successful video on the Internet when it chose an egalitarian approach, putting the ease of posting and viewing short videos ahead of slick design and ultra-high resolution.

That course paid off. Now YouTube shows more than 100 million clips each day, a figure enticing enough that Google announced yesterday that it would buy the upstart company for $1.65 billion.

While it may be one of the most popular sites on the Internet, YouTube is not without detractors. The company has yet to turn a profit and could face significant legal challenges. It has often been likened to Napster, which was shut down by a federal court ruling in 2001 as an illegal file-swapping service.

But comparisons to the early days of music piracy are off the mark. Much of what is on the site is user-generated material, posted by pranksters and budding auteurs, politicians and video diarists seeking attention rather than money. YouTube has been working with professional content providers from the very beginning, however fitfully it may appear at times. In the site's first few months, publicity-seeking corporate marketing teams would post clips that were sometimes followed by cease-and-desist letters about the very same content from those companies' legal departments.

The 10th-most-viewed video in the site's history is "Ronaldinho: Touch of Gold," a Nike commercial featuring fancy footwork by the Brazilian soccer star. Consumers have watched it on YouTube more than seven million times. Many companies see potential and are lining up to work with the site, rather than begging a court to shut it down. Yesterday, YouTube announced deals with CBS, Sony BMG Music Entertainment and Universal Music Group.

For Google, acquiring YouTube is hardly risk-free. The posting of videos by Iraqi insurgents and recent scuffles over charges of censorship demonstrate the complexity of running a site where anyone in the world can post a video. But those are the kinds of problems a business wants to have. They signal that a critical mass of people is tuned in.

Private-Equity Firms Face Anticompetitive Probe (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman And Henny Sender

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

U.S.'s Informal Inquiries Have Gone to Major Players Such as KKR, Silver Lake

The Department of Justice has begun an inquiry into potentially anticompetitive behavior among some of the world's leading private-equity funds, according to people familiar with the matter.

In recent weeks, Justice Department officials have sent out a series of letters to a number of the industry's most well-known players including Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and Silver Lake Partners but likely not limited to those firms.

These informal requests have asked for a range of information and documents related to deals and business practices, according to three people briefed on their contents, and ask about company auctions staged since 2003.

The Justice Department doesn't explicitly state a purpose for its requests, but those briefed on the matter describe the letters as expressing interest in matters broadly related to anticompetitive behavior.

It is unclear exactly who may be the subject of any inquiry, or whether any Justice Department action will develop from the information requests. A KKR spokeswoman and a Silver Lake spokesman declined to comment. A Justice Department spokesman also declined to comment.

The letters, from the New York regional office of the Justice Department, nonetheless put the clubby world of top-tier private-equity firms on notice that government officials are closely watching how they put together their transactions. And they come at a time when these funds -- which gather capital from institutions, pension plans, and state investment pools -- are on an historic buying spree for some of the country's corporate icons. In recent months, private-equity buyers have announced plans to purchase hospital operator HCA Inc., Hispanic broadcasting power Univision Communications Inc., and pipeline operator Kinder Morgan Inc.

At times the firms are avidly jostling with one another to gain an advantage in an auction. At other moments they are cooperating in "club" deals in which they combine their capital and know-how to pursue a given target.

A set of polite rules has largely applied to this dynamic. For instance, once a private-equity firm signs a definitive merger agreement with a target, competing buyout groups have shied from "jumping" the transaction with a competing bid.

The formation of the "clubs" -- which have drawn as many as seven members into one bidding team -- may at least theoretically depress prices because they limit the number of competing players in an auction.

Indeed, often these competitive auctions can have surprise endings as bidders who submitted a losing offer later join the winning group.

But the heads of private-equity firms say that such dynamics aren't evidence of collusion so much as the desire to share the risks with people who have already studied the business.

And at the heart of any inquiry into anticompetitive behavior is the nature of information -- how it is used, shared, and traded among a group of players.

If competing bidders were sharing information about their bids, for instance, or agreeing that the losers would later be invited to join in the winning group, that might represent suspect behavior, as it would artificially suppress prices that companies would fetch at auction.

DOJ_NMG_0076739

"The issue of anticompetitiveness is a live one. It is easy to wonder about whether auctions can be collusive," says Josh Lerner, a professor at Harvard Business School who focuses on the private-equity firms. "So much is a repeat game. There are bitter confrontations but then they do deals with each other again and that softens things."

It is nonetheless difficult to define what exactly collusive behavior means, let alone prove it in a world where a dozen top firms constantly are battling with one another.

Executives at private-equity firms say it is hard to imagine that there would be something as overt as an exchange of promises not to compete on respective deals. At the same time though, many are aware that one of the reasons the fabled KKR deal for RJR Nabisco wasn't so lucrative in the end was that undisciplined bidding drove up the price and say that they have absorbed the lesson, which is to exercise restraint in the bidding process.

"The buyout business has always been competitive," said Steve Pagliuca, a senior executive at Bain Capital, at a recent conference. "It is just that now it isn't one on one but team versus teams."

If anything, private-equity executives say, the implicit gentleman's code is coming under pressure as firms jockey to lead the next big transaction. Such was the case for Freescale Semiconductor Inc., which signed a $17.7 billion deal with KKR, Silver Lake and Bain Capital. A rival group from Blackstone was close to mounting its own offer but ultimately backed away.

Is that a sign of anticompetitive behavior? Most private-equity executives would say not. "It has been civil and I expect it to remain so." said David Rubenstein, co-founder of Carlyle Group in a recent speech.

Two Quit BA Amid Price-fixing Probe (FT)

By Kevin Done, Aerospace Correspondent

Financial Times, October 10, 2006

Martin George, commercial director of British Airways, resigned on Monday after admitting that “inappropriate conversations” had taken place in his department over the setting of fuel surcharges on long-haul air fares.

Iain Burns, BA head of communications, has also resigned.

Both men had been on leave of absence since mid-June, when BA was plunged into a criminal and civil investigation by UK and US competition authorities into alleged price fixing by airlines over the fuel surcharges levied for the last two years on long-haul flights to and from the UK.

Mr George was a member of the BA board and was a candidate last year for the post of BA chief executive, a contest won by Willie Walsh, to replace Sir Rod Eddington.

BA premises were raided by the Office of Fair Trading in early June.

In a letter of resignation to Martin Broughton, BA chairman, Mr George said, “I now recognise that within my department, there may have been inappropriate conversations in violation of company policy in relation to long-haul fuel surcharges. I was not involved in such conversations.

“Although the board of BA has not found, that I have behaved in a dishonest way, I fully recognise my responsibilities as head of department and as a board director.”

Mr George said “I have always taken my responsibilities as a director and board member very seriously and I therefore depart with deep regret, whilst believing that departing is, in these circumstances and for these reasons, nevertheless, the right course.”

Robert Boyle, BA director of planning, has been appointed commercial director and Thomas Coops, former communications director at Abbey National has been appointed interim head of corporate and media relations.

In June it emerged that Virgin Atlantic, the UK long-haul airline controlled by Sir Richard Branson, had helped the OFT with information about its rival BA, which helped to trigger the investigation of alleged price fixing by some long-haul airlines operating to and from the UK.

BA has a history of stormy relations with Virgin Atlantic. It is understood that Virgin Atlantic passed information to the OFT about an approach made by a BA executive last year about a possible raising of the fuel surcharge.

BA said on Monday that it had emerged from work done by the airline in response to requests for information made by the regulators that "contacts took place with a competitor in respect of long-haul passenger fuel surcharges in breach of the company's compliance policy."

The airline said that it was continuing to assist the regulators in their investigations.

BA shares were 2 per cent lower at 429½ p in lunchtime trading.

The BA case is the first test that has become publicly known of the OFT's new powers, acquired under the 2002 Enterprise Act, to investigate criminal cartels.

The OFT has civil law powers to impose fines of up to 10 per cent of worldwide sales on companies guilty of price-fixing. Individuals found guilty of criminal cartel charges could face five years in prison or unlimited fines.

The BA surcharges, which have risen in steps to £35 per sector or flight leg on long-haul services (£70 for a return trip), were introduced two years ago in response to the rapid rise in oil prices. Many other airlines made similar moves.

According to legal sources in Washington the June inspection of BA's premises was triggered by documents and testimony uncovered during the separate ongoing global investigation into alleged price-fixing in the air cargo sector, which was launched in February.

The joint action on cargo started by the US Department of Justice and the European Commission against a number of airlines in Asia, Europe and the US has led to multiple class-action lawsuits from US and European freight companies and customers.

Lufthansa, the German national carrier, which triggered the cargo probe by agreeing to co-operate with the DoJ at the end of last year, agreed in September to pay $85m to settle an array of class-action suits pending in the US.

The German flag carrier has also sought leniency from cartel authorities in Europe, the US and elsewhere, and said last month it had received conditional immunity.

British Airways Commercial Director Quits Amid Probe (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Kamil Tchorek And Richard Blackden

Bloomberg, October 10, 2006

Oct. 9 (Bloomberg) -- British Airways Plc, Europe's third- largest airline, said Commercial Director Martin George resigned amid an antitrust investigation of the carrier's fuel-surcharge strategy.

George has been on leave since June, British Airways said in a Regulatory News Service statement today. Iain Burns, the airline's head of communications, also resigned.

``Within my department, there may have been inappropriate conversations in violation of company policy in relation to long haul-fuel surcharges," George said in the statement. ``Although the board of BA have not found that I have behaved in a dishonest way, I fully recognize my responsibilities."

British Airways is under investigation by the U.K.'s Office of Fair Trading and the U.S. Department of Justice for the way the airline priced long-haul passenger fuel surcharges. British Airways profit rose 20 percent to 451 million pounds ($824 million) in the year ended March 31 as the airline added six fuel surcharges since May 2004 to pass higher costs on to customers.

Shares of British Airways fell as much as 8.75 pence, or 2 percent, to 429.5 pence and were 1.9 percent down at 430 pence at 9:41 a.m. in London.

The investigation by the U.K. Office of Fair Trading is ``ongoing" said John Marciano, a spokesman for the U.K. agency. He declined to comment further.

Robert Boyle, British Airways' director of planning, has been appointed commercial director with immediate effect, the airline said. Thomas Coops, previously the communications director at Abbey National Plc, has been appointed interim head of corporate and media relations.

BA Executives Exit Over Long-haul Fuel Surcharges Violation (LONIND)

By James Daley

London Independent (UK), October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076741

Two senior British Airways executives quit yesterday after the airline revealed there had been a breach of its rules during the setting of its long-haul fuel surcharges earlier this year.

Martin George, the company's commercial director and an executive member of the board, resigned with immediate effect, conceding that "inappropriate conversations" may have taken place within his department, which were in breach of company rules. Iain Burns, BA's head of communications, also stepped down with immediate effect.

Mr George, who was paid £375,000 a year, stands to receive 12 months' pay in lieu of notice. Mr Burns is expected to receive six months' pay in lieu of his notice period.

The resignations came three and a half months after the Office of Fair Trading (OFT) and the US Department of Justice raided BA's offices and launched an investigation into allegations of price-fixing in the airline sector.

In particular, the OFT said it was exploring the possibility of collusion during the setting of long-haul fuel surcharges, which several airlines have begun charging over the past two years to compensate for the rapid rise in oil prices. The OFT inquiry is believed to have been prompted by a tip-off from BA's rival Virgin Atlantic.

Mr Burns and Mr George were sent on leave when the inquiry began in June. However, at the time, the BA chairman, Martin Broughton, said he was hopeful that he would have the pair back in their jobs, and the matter cleared up, very shortly.

In a letter to Mr Broughton yesterday, Mr George said it was with great regret he was resigning after 19 years with the company.

"I now recognise that, within my department, there may have been inappropriate conversations in violation of company policy in relation to long-haul fuel surcharges," he wrote. "I was not involved in such conversations. Although the board of BA have not found that I have behaved in a dishonest way, I fully recognise my responsibilities as head of department and as a board director.

"As you know, becoming a board member of British Airways has been the highlight of my career so far. I remain committed to doing what I can in the interests of the airline, to which I have dedicated my last 19 working years. I have always taken my responsibilities as a director and board member very seriously and I therefore depart with deep regret, whilst believing that departing is, in these circumstances and for these reasons, nevertheless, the right course."

Mr George is to be replaced with immediate effect by Robert Boyle, the airline's director of planning. Thomas Coops, a former communications director at Abbey National, will take over from Mr Burns on an interim basis. BA said its priority was to ensure it was abiding by all relevant competition rules, adding it was continuing to assist the regulators with their investigations. It admitted there had been a breach of its internal rules.

Two Top BA Executives Resign Amid Price Probe (AFP-Y)

AFP, October 10, 2006

British Airways has announced that two key executives have resigned amid a probe by British and American authorities into alleged cartel activity over fuel surcharges.

Martin George, commercial director, and Iain Burns, head of communications, have left their positions with immediate effect, BA said in an official statement to the London Stock Exchange on Monday.

George's resignation letter cited "inappropriate conversations" within his department over fuel surcharges, but noted that the director had not been involved in the discussions.

Both men had been on leave of absence since June when Britain's Office of Fair Trading and the US Department of Justice began an investigation focused on long-haul passenger fuel surcharges.

"It is with regret that I notify you of my decision to step down as Commercial Director of British Airways," George wrote in a letter which was quoted in the BA statement.

He continued: "I now recognise that within my department, there may have been inappropriate conversations in violation of company policy in relation to long haul fuel surcharges. I was not involved in such conversations.

"Although the board of BA have not found that I have behaved in a dishonest way, I fully recognise my responsibilities as Head of Department and as a Board Director."

BA said that Robert Boyle, BA's director of planning, has been appointed George's successor.

Thomas Coops, former communications director at banking group Abbey National, has meanwhile been appointed interim head of corporate and media relations.

BA had announced in June that British and American authorities were investigating the carrier over alleged cartel activity involving it and other airlines.

The Great Plane Robbery? (BBC)

By Nishi Bolakee, BBC Money Programme

BBC.com, October 10, 2006

Some of the world's biggest airlines, including our very own British Airways, stand accused of ripping off consumers in price fixing conspiracies.

BA has been subject to a dawn raid

The Office of Fair Trading in the UK and the Department of Justice in the US have launched investigations into two alleged conspiracies with a series of dawn raids on airline offices.

Competition law bans firms from agreeing prices so that customers benefit from cheaper goods and services as companies compete.

Higher prices for goods

The first alleged conspiracy concerns the prices of surcharges on cargo shipments.

BA, Lufthansa and other major airlines have been accused of agreeing to add some surcharges at exactly the same rate.

The allegations are being investigated by competition authorities throughout the world while American class action lawyers also pursue the airlines in civil suits.

What the air cargo carriers did was raise the prices over and above what they should have been

Michael Hausfeld, class action lawyer at Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld and Toll

Bruce Simon, of class action lawyers Cotchett, Pitre, Simon, and McCarthy, says "It is simply extraordinary, that all the prices were the same at the same time."

"And of course, one of the allegations is that the prices shouldn't be the same if the operating costs are different for the airlines, and there's no economic reason why it should be that way."

So how does this affect the consumer?

US lawyers suing for compensation reckon that shippers were forced to pay more for exporting their goods leading to higher prices for products in the shops.

Michael Hausfeld, another class action lawyer from the firm Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld and Toll, says: "They are definitely affecting every consumer literally in most purchases they make. It all goes into the price."

Recently, Lufthansa - the German national carrier, agreed to pay $85 million in compensation to shippers to settle with lawyers in the cargo case.

Other airlines may follow suit with similar payments and the total compensation bill could top $1 billion.

Increased cost of flying

BA's offices have been raided, and there is a mystery surrounding BA's old enemy Virgin Atlantic, run by renowned consumer champion Richard Branson, and its role in the affair.

Virgin has increased its chances of going scot free by playing the game smartly

The allegations relate to passenger fuel surcharges which have risen from £5 return for long haul flights when they were introduced in May 2004, to £70 from April this year.

They were introduced to help the airlines with the rising cost of fuel.

While Virgin's offices have not been raided by official agencies, Richard Branson's company is being sued, along with BA, by class action lawyers in the US who allege that the two companies conspired to fix the price of the surcharges.

Immunity?

DOJ_NMG_0076743

"I have nothing to indicate that Mr Branson, was involved or knows anything about the situation

Bruce Simon, class action lawyer at Cotchett, Pitre, Simon, and McCarthy

Virgin is said to have played for advantage in the controversy by blowing the whistle and reporting its old adversary to the UK's Office of Fair Trading.

That could mean that Virgin would qualify for immunity in official legal proceedings.

Some reports suggest Virgin did no more than report an illegal approach by BA although class action lawyers believe it went further.

Bruce Simon is doubtful that Mr Branson had any knowledge of a price fixing scheme and says: "I have nothing to indicate that Mr Branson, was involved or knows anything about the situation.

"Those matters don't have to rise to the level of the board. They don't have to rise to the level of a chief executive officer for them to be implemented."

Meanwhile, BA has suspended the number two in the company, Commercial Director Martin George, and its Director of Communications Iain Burns.

And on Monday BA announced that the two men had resigned.

Virgin is being sued along with BA for price-fixing

The surcharges have hit consumers like Chris and Carolyn Wood, frequent travellers to the US on both Virgin and BA.

Four generations of the Woods, eight people in total, flew to visit relatives in Florida in September.

Chris paid for five members of his family to take this trip. He was shocked to find just how much was added to the price of his tickets to help airlines pay for taxes, airport fees and the rising cost of fuel.

Chris says: "I'd offered to pay for my mother-in-law as a special treat. I found that in terms of just my cost, which was my two boys, my wife, my mother in law, and myself, we'd got an extra seven hundred odd pounds or so".

'Dirty Tricks'

The current row is the latest chapter in a long history of bitter conflict between the two companies.

Jeff Randall, Editor-at-Large of the Daily Telegraph and former BBC Business Editor says: "This is yet another delicious chapter in a saga that's been going on the best part of twenty years."

If airlines are found to be guilty of price fixing then the consequences could be severe.

Pat Treacy, a competition lawyer for law firm Bristows, says "The legal worst case scenario for BA - the very worst thing that could possibly happen to a company under the law, is that it would be fined 10% of its global turnover."

BA's turnover is around £8bn, so the company could be fined £800m.

The class action lawyers are seeking yet more huge sums in compensation for customers whom, they allege, have been overcharged.

The Money Programme report is shown on BBC Two at 10pm on Monday 9 Ocotber.

Sanofi-Aventis Is Said To Be The Mystery Suitor For ImClone, And Icahn's Competitor (NYT)

By Andrew Ross Sorkin And Peter Edmonston

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

The European drug giant Sanofi-Aventis was the mystery bidder for the biotechnology company ImClone Systems last month, people involved in the transaction said yesterday.

Shares of ImClone soared last week after the company announced that Carl C. Icahn, who holds a stake of nearly 14 percent in the company, had scuttled a potential takeover offer of $36 a share from a "major international pharmaceutical company" last month.

The disclosure of a would-be suitor, which ImClone did not identify, became the latest point of contention in an escalating battle between Mr. Icahn and the company. Mr. Icahn said last week that ImClone was worth more than $36 a share "if it is run by competent people."

DOJ_NMG_0076744

In trading yesterday, ImClone stock rose just over 1 percent, to $29.90, after Sanofi's identity was reported by DealBook, a Web log published by nytimes.com. ImClone licenses a patent for the cancer drug Erbitux from the Paris-based Sanofi-Aventis, one of the largest drug companies in the world.

Sanofi's interest in ImClone suggested that the company was considering expansion in the United States and might indicate that it would look at other possible targets. The United States accounted for 35 percent of Sanofi's net sales in 2005, according to filings with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Some analysts have said that Sanofi may be interested in Bristol-Myers Squibb, a company that has been seen as a potential takeover target since it ousted its chief executive, Peter R. Dolan, last month. Bristol markets Plavix, a best-selling drug used to fight blood clots, in partnership with Sanofi-Aventis. In a conference call with reporters last month, the chairman of Bristol-Myers, James D. Robinson III, declined to speculate on a possible sale of the company.

In Bristol-Myers, Sanofi or another acquirer would get a significant piece of ImClone. Bristol-Myers is ImClone's largest shareholder, with 17 percent. Bristol sells Erbitux in the United States and pays ImClone a royalty on these sales.

The emergence of Sanofi's interest may also give new life to ImClone's attempts to find a buyer. Earlier this year, ImClone put itself up for sale, but after a six-month search, the company announced in August that it would remain independent.

Calls to representatives of ImClone were not returned yesterday. Calls to Sanofi-Aventis were unsuccessful.

ImClone, meanwhile, continues to do battle with Mr. Icahn, who is known for trying to shake up companies that he thinks are underperforming.

Last month, ImClone shareholders voted Mr. Icahn and two allies onto the company's board. Since then, he has filed a proposal urging shareholders to remove 6 other members of the 12-member board and add one of his nominees.

In a proxy statement, ImClone has urged shareholders to reject Mr. Icahn's proposal, arguing that "a balanced board is better positioned than one dominated by Mr. Icahn."

Volkswagen Urges Scania And MAN To Reach An Amicable Deal (WSJ)

By Jason Singer And Christoph Rauwald And Stephen Power

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

An attempt to create Europe's largest truck maker through a €9.6 billion ($12.1 billion) acquisition of Scania AB of Sweden by MAN AG of Germany is being thrown back to the drawing board after Volkswagen AG Chief Executive Bernd Pischetsrieder said he wants both sides in the hostile battle to negotiate a new deal.

Mr. Pischetsrieder said in a conference call with analysts and investors that he supports the logic behind the recent hostile bid for Scania by MAN. Volkswagen is the largest shareholder in Scania and last week became the largest shareholder in MAN as well.

However, the Volkswagen CEO said that he wants negotiating teams from both sides to propose a new deal to replace the cash-and-stock bid made by MAN that was rejected by Scania as well as Volkswagen and Swedish investment firm Investor AB, Scania's second-largest shareholder. He suggested the teams take no longer than four weeks to reach a conclusion.

MAN's bid for Scania has drawn some of Europe's largest industrial companies into a bitter feud, where competing interests and rival corporate strategies have clashed. To gain an edge, Volkswagen last week made a surprise purchase of 15.06% of truck and diesel-engine maker MAN.

Mr. Pischetsrieder's conference call was the first time he has outlined his views since Volkswagen became the key shareholder in both the bidder and the target. He said his comments were made as Volkswagen's CEO and not as chairman of Scania, a position he also holds. He said he has recused himself from Scania board meetings because of his conflicting interests. Mr. Pischetsrieder refused to take questions from reporters during the call.

"We need the best solution, and at the end of the day the best solution has to be in the interests of the shareholders," Mr. Pischetsrieder said. "What kind of structure a new company or a merged company would have, I don't want to speculate on."

He declined to rule out a possible reverse bid by Scania to try to take over MAN, something that would allow Volkswagen to retain its super-voting shares in Scania. Mr. Pischetsrieder had said he would like to see the super-voting shares valued more highly than common. MAN's bid values all shares at the same level.

A combined MAN-Scania would be Europe's biggest maker of commercial vehicles by market share and No. 3 globally behind Volvo AB of Sweden and DaimlerChrysler AG of Germany.

Scania's other large shareholder, Investor, said yesterday it saw some industrial logic in a tie-up between the Swedish truck maker and MAN, and it was open to all options when it comes to Scania's future. The Swedish holding company, which is controlled by the Wallenberg family, had said it would support the deal that produces the highest value for its own shareholders.

Just prior to Mr. Pischetsrieder's conference call, MAN said in a statement that it would consider withdrawing its hostile bid in favor of friendly negotiations, if certain conditions were met. Mr. Pischetsrieder welcomed the move and said he wasn't aware of what those conditions were. A MAN spokesman declined to elaborate.

PNC To Buy Mercantile In $6B Deal (USAT/BLOOM)

By Adrian Cox And Elizabeth Hester

USA Today, October 10, 2006

PNC Financial Services, Pennsylvania's biggest bank, on Monday announced it is buying Mercantile Bankshares for $6 billion, its second acquisition in the Washington metropolitan area.

PNC offered $47.24 a share for Mercantile, valuing the Baltimore-based company 28% above its Friday closing price. Pittsburgh-based PNC will pay $2.13 billion in cash and 52.5 million of its own shares.

Mercantile owns 11 community banks and a mortgage lender with 240 branches in the Mid-Atlantic region, giving PNC more companies and wealthy individuals to serve in a market where the median income is 35% higher than the U.S. average. PNC, which entered Washington last year with the purchase of Riggs National, will become the 10th-largest U.S. bank after adding Mercantile's $17 billion in assets.

PNC “paid a premium for a premium franchise,” John McDonald, analyst at Banc of America Securities, wrote in a report to clients. “Mercantile has a strong franchise in an attractive and relatively faster growth footprint.”

Mercantile customers have a median income of more than $69,000 a year, 18% higher than PNC's customers, the bank said in a presentation to investors. Population is expected to surge 10% in the next five years in the counties where Mercantile does business, vs. 2.1% for PNC's population base.

Mercantile is “the jewel that fits between our Washington, D.C., franchise and our Philadelphia and Delaware and New Jersey franchise,” PNC CEO James Rohr said.

PNC expects the purchase to close in the first quarter of 2007, add to earnings per share in 2008, and generate about $100 million in cost savings.

Mercantile rose $8.16, or 22%, to $44.94 Monday. PNC is giving Mercantile shareholders 0.4184 PNC shares and $16.45 in cash for each share they own. PNC shares fell $3.20 to $70.40.

Mercantile CEO Edward Kelly, who will be a PNC vice chairman after the deal closes, has been expanding the lender in the Mid-Atlantic region. Mercantile agreed to buy Community Bank of Northern Virginia for $212 million in January 2005 and James Monroe Bancorp for $143 million this March.

PNC had a gain of about $1.6 billion from division BlackRock's purchase of Merrill Lynch's money-management unit last month. Rohr said in February that the bank would consider using the money for acquisitions.

The area that encompasses Washington and Arlington, Va., is the eighth-most populous in the USA with 5.28 million residents, and is the third-wealthiest in the nation with a median household income of $76,248. Its population is projected to expand 10.8% from 2005 to 2010, according to U.S. Census estimates, compared with 6.3% for the nation overall.

“PNC recognized that if it was going to jump in deeper into this Washington, D.C., Northern Virginia, Maryland market, it was going to be an expensive market to get into,” says Gerard Cassidy, an analyst at RBC Capital Markets. “This is a Neiman Marcus market, not a K-Mart market, and as a result, you've got to pay Neiman Marcus prices, which is what they did here.”

PNC Plans To Purchase Baltimore's Mercantile (WP)

By Terence O'hara, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076746

PNC Financial Services Group Inc. said yesterday it would buy Maryland's largest independent bank, Mercantile Bankshares Corp., in a $6 billion deal that would make PNC the second-largest such institution in the state.

The purchase is Pittsburgh-based PNC's second major acquisition in the mid-Atlantic region. It bought scandal-plagued Riggs Bank for $652 million in May 2005.

Mercantile of Baltimore is the last independent commercial bank of substantial size in either Washington or Baltimore, and it is considered one of Maryland's leading business banks. It has a robust old-line trust business and 240 branches stretching from Hagerstown to Ocean City. "This puts us in some of the most affluent suburbs in Maryland," PNC chief executive James Rohr said.

Mercantile's banks operate under 11 different names in the state, such as Mercantile Potomac Bank in the Washington area, National Bank of Fredericksburg in Spotsylvania County and Fidelity Bank in Western Maryland. All those banks will be converted into PNC branches after the deal closes by March of next year.

The two companies did not say if the merger would result in any job losses as they seek to cut $108 million in overhead expenses. Rohr did say that branch closings would be minimal because there is very little overlap between PNC's existing branches here, mostly old Riggs branches concentrated in the city and close-in areas, and Mercantile's largely suburban and outer-suburban branch network. Rohr said most of the cost savings will be in back-office expenses, such as duplicative software vendor contracts.

PNC is to pay Mercantile shareholders $2.1 billion in cash and about 52.5 million shares of PNC stock, which put the deal value at $47.24 a share, 28 percent higher than the closing price of Mercantile shares Friday. Mercantile stock rose 22 percent yesterday after the deal was announced, to close at $44.94, while PNC shares fell about 3.2 percent, to $70.40.

Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group bank analyst Gary Townsend issued an "outperform" rating on PNC after the deal was announced, saying that while PNC was "paying a full price" for Mercantile, the long-term promise for the alliance is strong because of the growth prospects in the region. Washington in recent years has been one of the fastest-growing banking markets in the country in terms of the rate at which deposits are increasing and is central to the growth plans of most major East Coast banks that do business here.

Mercantile has long been known as one of the industry's most conservative banks, one that survived relatively untouched by the early 1990s commercial real estate crash and the subsequent decade of mega mergers when all of its main competitors went out of business or were sold to larger regional banks. Its strong base of business customers has made it one of the most consistently profitable banks because it pays less for deposits than many of its peers. Like all banks in the mid-Atlantic, it's biggest source of profit growth has been traditional small business and consumer banking as the region's economy and population boomed in the last 10 years.

"I think at the end of the day it was our retail banking franchise that most interested PNC," said Edward J. Kelly III, who has been chief executive of Mercantile since 2001 and is to become vice chairman of PNC's holding company, PNC Financial Service Group Inc., after the deal is completed in the first quarter of 2007.

Wall Street had been watching PNC closely since its $10 billion deal to sell part of its BlackRock Inc. wealth management unit to Merrill Lynch & Co. That put about $6 billion in cash on PNC's books and analysts expected PNC to go hunting for more mergers in its core banking business. Rohr said yesterday that PNC had wanted a bigger presence in the Washington-Baltimore market since the Riggs deal because the region was growing so fast.

"The BlackRock transaction gave us flexibility," Rohr said. "It's nice when plans come together."

Family Finance Investors Are Wary Of Buyout Offer For Cablevision (WSJ)

By Peter Grant

The Wall Street Journal, October 10, 2006

For New York's powerful Dolan family, the time appears ripe for its $7.9 billion bid to take Cablevision Systems Corp. private: The cable company has been beating most phone companies and satellite-television operators in the battle for video, phone and Internet customers.

DOJ_NMG_0076747

That's also why the bid could fail. The Dolans have taken Cablevision shareholders on a financial roller-coaster ride over the years, and some institutional investors say they are reluctant to sell now that the outlook is brightening.

"I'm getting tired of management and private-equity firms trying to steal companies from underneath our noses, and I think this is another example of that," says John Linehan, a portfolio manager at mutual-fund company T. Rowe Price Group Inc., which holds more than two million Cablevision shares. "Shareholders have been asked to sit through a fairly fallow period of time. As things are beginning to look up, a lot of our upside is being taken away from us."

On Sunday, the Dolans -- who control 22.5% of the company's shares and hold 74% of the voting power -- offered $27 a share for all shares outstanding. Some investors contend the company's assets, which include a cable division servicing the New York City region, cable networks like AMC and the New York Knicks basketball team, would be valued at as much as $40 a share if sold separately. Shares closed yesterday at $26.50, up $2.57, or 11%, in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

After years in the doldrums, the stocks of Cablevision and other cable companies have performed better this year, and some investors predict that the gains will continue. The sector has been held back by investors' concerns about major capital-spending needs, competition from phone companies and new technologies for delivering TV programming over the Internet.

The Dolans have argued that Cablevision would be better off as a private company, which would allow it to make investment decisions without worrying about meeting quarterly earnings expectations. The cable industry sometimes requires large investments that cannot be recouped over the short-term.

In a letter Sunday to the company's board of directors, the Dolans described their offer price as "fair." They noted that it represented an 11.3% premium above Cablevision's 52-week closing high and a 14.9% premium to their unsuccessful 2005 offer for the company's cable division. A spokesman for the Dolans declined to comment further yesterday.

In buyouts and takeovers, investors are always eager to get higher prices, and they sometimes succeed. The fate of the Dolans' offer now rests with a special committee of Cablevision's board that consists of two independent directors, Thomas V. Reifenheiser, a retired banker, and retired Vice Admiral John R. Ryan. That was the same board committee that rejected the Dolans' earlier buyout offer, and the family has a better sense this time of how to appease them. A Cablevision spokesman said yesterday the two directors were unavailable for comment.

Investor griping about buyouts has intensified this year after the sales of several publicly traded companies generated quick profits for buyers. Earlier this year, for example, Fairmont Hotels & Resorts Inc. was acquired for $3.3 billion by Colony Capital LLC, a Los Angeles investment firm, and Saudi Prince Alwaleed bin Talal's Kingdom Hotels International. Fairmont recently announced the sale of seven hotels, far less than half of its portfolio, to a pension fund for $1.5 billion.

In recent years, the antics of the Dolan family have drawn far more attention than Cablevision's performance. Cablevision Chairman Charles F. Dolan and his son, Chief Executive James L. Dolan, fought openly and bitterly over the fate of Voom, a satellite television unit that the senior Mr. Dolan supported but that his son helped kill. The family also tussled with New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg over a new stadium that was proposed for Manhattan, which would have competed with Cablevision's Madison Square Garden. Recently, the company was drawn into the federal investigation of options backdating, admitting that it gave backdated options to an executive after he died.

Along the way, Bethpage, N.Y.-based Cablevision quietly has become the envy of the cable industry, in part due to the efforts of Chief Operating Officer Thomas Rutledge. He has kept the company focused on the cutting edge of phone and video technology. That has helped Cablevision to add more than 60,000 subscribers, while many rival cable operators were losing subscribers to satellite-TV competitors. The company has signed up about one million Internet-phone-service customers since November 2003, making it the cable-industry leader in grabbing market share, according to analyst Aryeh Bourkoff of UBS AG.

"My clients would like to see the company stay public with Rutledge at the helm," says Mario Gabelli, chief executive of Gabelli Asset Management, one of Cablevision's largest shareholders. If that doesn't happen, he says, he would like other companies to be able to bid against the Dolans. Time Warner Inc.'s cable division, he says, has long been interested. Time Warner declined to comment on the matter.

Some investors think the offer will be accepted by the board committee, noting that it is higher than the buyout offer made by the family in June 2005, when adjusted for the $10-per-share dividend that Cablevision paid earlier this year.

Other investors don't like what they see. The offer, they note, values the company at $19 billion, including debt. The Knicks, the cable-TV networks and additional assets other than the main cable unit are worth as much as $5 billion, they contend. That doesn't include the potential profits from a plan to redevelop Madison Square Garden, which the company is pursuing with Vornado Realty Trust.

That leaves a valuation of about $14 billion for the cable unit, they say, which is less than nine times the unit's earnings before interest, taxes, depreciation, and amortization, or Ebitda, a common metric in the cable industry. By contrast, Comcast Corp., the country's largest cable operator, is trading at more than nine times Ebitda. Many cable analysts contend that Cablevision's systems are more valuable than Comcast's because their average subscribers spend more.

Shares of Cablevision rose sharply yesterday but remained below the offer price, a sign that some investors think the buyout offer will collapse. That's what happened to the family's buyout attempt 20 months ago, after a special committee of directors found the price inadequate.

Cablevision's prospects looked bleaker in the summer of 2002. It was facing a cash crunch stemming from the debt it took on to finance cable-network upgrades, a perennial burden for the cable industry. In a presentation to investors, James Dolan outlined his plan for dealing with the financial problems that some investors criticized as rambling and unconvincing. The stock was trading below $5 a share.

To deal with its liquidity problems, the company laid off thousands of workers and sold noncore assets such as its Bravo cable network. It increased cash flow by steadily adding cable and high-speed Internet subscribers. By mid-2003, Cablevision's stock was over $20 a share.

Mr. Rutledge was one of the architects of the turnaround. He had joined the company in early 2002 after losing out in a struggle over strategy at Time Warner's cable unit, where he was president. He had extensive experience with customer service, network construction and other operational basics.

Cable operators were losing hundreds of thousands of subscribers to satellite TV companies. Mr. Rutledge pushed Cablevision to upgrade its technology. The company stopped using an advanced yet expensive set-top box manufactured by Sony Corp., opting for a more widely used device made by Scientific Atlanta Inc., now a unit of Cisco Systems Inc.

Cablevision increased spending on expensive network upgrades necessary to offer customers digital cable and high-speed Internet connections. "I found it painful personally to lay people off," says Mr. Rutledge. "But we had to manage the capital expenses for upgrades and get new businesses rolled out rapidly."

Verizon Communications Inc. targeted Cablevision's affluent New York City region for its rollout of TV and ultra-high-speed Internet. Last year, after James Dolan got mail from Verizon advertising its broadband speeds, he demanded that Cablevision match it, which it did.

Mr. Rutledge became the face of Cablevision on trade-show panels and on analyst calls, where James Dolan mostly discussed Madison Square Garden. He meets with Mr. Dolan every Monday, he says, to discuss everything from new technology to trimming trees in ways that don't anger homeowners. Together, they devised the "triple play" marketing strategy for selling phone, TV and high-speed Internet service in one package, which has been mimicked by much of the cable industry.

The Dolans had decided in the late 1990s to concentrate on the New York City market and had sold off their systems outside of it. That made it less expensive for the company to introduce new technology because just three distribution points served all its customers. The concentration on one region also made it easier to roll out phone service. Mr. Rutledge says he and the Dolans planned to do this as early as 2002, but were delayed by the wait for advances in Internet technology. The company avoided using traditional circuit-switch technology, which is more expensive.

The new phone service and the triple-play pricing plan, which costs customers $89.95 a month, caught on with customers. More than 20% of the homes reached by Cablevision's networks now take phone service from the cable operator, and most of those take TV and Internet service as well. Marketing experts say it is more difficult for rivals like Verizon to poach subscribers to Cablevision's three-service package than it is for them to steal traditional cable customers.

Mr. Rutledge also helped devise Cablevision's strategy for offering customers a service for recording live TV for later viewing. Most cable companies offered customers devices for their homes. While Cablevision does too, it's been reluctant to embrace that route, because the devices can cost more than $350 each -- a cost that was passed on to customers in the form of monthly fees.

Earlier this year, Cablevision announced a plan to build a recording capability into its network. Households that signed up for the service would be able to record programs without adding any special equipment to their homes.

The strategy raised questions about whether Cablevision would violate copyrights of programmers. Major movie and TV producers have filed suit against Cablevision, which is holding up the launch of the technology.

Glaxo Agrees To Acquire CNS Inc. For $566 Million (Update4) (BLOOM)

By Andrea Gerlin

Bloomberg, October 10, 2006

Oct. 9 (Bloomberg) -- GlaxoSmithKline Plc, Europe's largest drugmaker, agreed to buy CNS Inc. for about $566 million to add Breathe Right nasal strips and FiberChoice dietary supplements to consumer health products including heart-burn reliever Tums.

Glaxo will pay $37.50 a share in cash for the Minneapolis- based company, or 31 percent more than the stock's closing price on Oct. 6, the London-based drugmaker said today in a Regulatory News Service statement. CNS shares jumped to their highest price in almost two decades.

The acquisition expands Glaxo's range of consumer health- care products, which already includes smoking cessation aids Nicoderm CQ and Commit, Panadol pain reliever, Abreva cold-sore treatment, and Aquafresh and Sensodyne toothpastes. Breathe Right products are sold in 27 countries, while FiberChoice supplements are available only in the U.S.

``This outstanding business provides a great global growth opportunity for GSK," John Clarke, president of GSK Consumer Healthcare, said in the statement. ``Its two major brands, Breathe Right and FiberChoice, fit with our growth strategy and are great additions to our portfolio."

Shares Rise

Shares of CNS rose $8.38, or 29 percent, to $36.94 at 12:42 p.m. New York time in Nasdaq Stock Market composite trading. That's the stock's biggest increase in five years and its highest value since 1987. Shares of Glaxo rose 9 pence, or 0.6 percent, to 1454 pence in London.

The acquisition sends a message about Glaxo's intentions, according to analyst Gbola Amusa of Sanford C. Bernstein Ltd. in London.

``There are some people in the market who would like to see Glaxo spin off its consumer health-care division," Amusa said in a telephone interview. ``The signal is that Glaxo is serious about staying in consumer health."

CNS's board began investigating selling the company at the end of last year when it undertook an annual review of strategic options, CNS Chief Executive Officer Marti Morfitt said on a conference call. The board unanimously agreed to recommend approving the transaction to shareholders, Morfitt said.

`Good for Business'

``We believe this merger is good for the business, our stockholders and our customers," Morfitt said. ``We believe this is an excellent opportunity to maximize value for CNS stockholders."

The purchase is expected to be completed in early 2007, pending approval from CNS's shareholders and U.S. antitrust regulators, Glaxo said. The acquisition will have a neutral impact on earnings next year and a positive effect starting in 2008, Glaxo said.

Glaxo had sales of 21.66 billion pounds ($40.4 billion) in 2005, with almost $5 billion coming from consumer health-care products, according to the company's Web site. CNS had sales of $118.5 million in the 12 months ended June 30, an 18 percent increase from a year earlier, Glaxo said.

``It seems quite an expensive acquisition because they're paying $566 million for a business with sales of around $119 million," Max Herrmann, a health-care analyst at ING Financial Markets in London, said in a telephone interview. ``So they're paying quite a substantial multiple on sales."

GlaxoSmithKline Seeks Approval To Sell Cancer Drug (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0076750

AP, October 10, 2006

GlaxoSmithKline PLC said Monday it is seeking regulatory approval to sell its breast cancer drug Tykerb - one of the most promising high earners in its pipeline of new medicines - in Europe.

Glaxo, Europe's largest drug maker, also revealed it has agreed to buy CNS Inc., the U.S.-based manufacturer of Breathe Right nasal strips and FiberChoice fiber supplements, for around $566 million. The company has dual U.S. headquarters in Research Triangle Park, N.C. and Philadelphia.

Glaxo has already lodged an application with the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to approve Tykerb. The FDA last month gave the drug so-called "fast track" status, which may lead to quicker approval.

Glaxo is applying to the European Medicines Agency to market the pill in Europe in combination with Roche Holding AG's chemotherapy treatment Xeloda, for the treatment of advanced breast cancer in women who have received other therapies.

The company said it hopes to launch Tykerb, also known as lapatinib ditosylate, in both markets next year, but declined to comment on its sales prospects. The drug is one of the most promising in Glaxo's pipeline - analysts say it could bring in revenue of more than $1 billion each year.

"A few people have been skeptical about Tykerb because they saw a limited market, but oncologists will vote with their prescribing pen when they see good data," said Mike Ward, an analyst at Nomura Code.

Ward added that the drug's use was likely to widen to earlier stages of breast cancer, increasing its sales prospects.

The findings of an international study on the drug presented earlier this year to the American Society of Clinical Oncology found that it delayed the growth of advanced breast cancer in women who had stopped responding to rival Roche Holding AG's drug Herceptin and were out of treatment options.

Patients who received Tykerb plus the chemotherapy drug Xeloda had no growth of their tumors for 8 1/2 months. That compares to 4 1/2 months for those given only Xeloda, according to the team led by Dr. Charles Geyer Jr. of Allegheny General Hospital in Pittsburgh.

Glaxo said that there are more than 360,000 new cases of breast cancer diagnosed every year in Europe.

"We hope that lapatinib (Tykerb) will offer these patients a much needed effective alternative treatment," Paolo Paoletti, senior vice president of Glaxo's oncology medicine development center, said in a statement.

Glaxo said it aims to have filed for approval to sell Tykerb in Australia, Canada and a number of countries in Asia, Latin America and the Middle East by the end of the year.

In a separate announcement on CNS, Glaxo said it will pay $37.50 per share in cash for the company - a premium of 31 percent on CNS' stock price at the close of trade on Friday.

CNS President and Chief Executive Marti Morfitt said Monday the company picked Glaxo after reviewing multiple offers.

"We are a company that's been growing, with a good pipeline of future growth, two strong brands, and I think it is a great fit for what they're doing and what they're building," Morfitt said.

"Their scale and their resources really do create greater opportunity there," Morfitt said.

CNS reported sales of $118.5 million in the 12 months to June 2006, an 18 percent rise over the previous 12 months. About 85 percent of the company's current sales are in the U.S. The company has wanted to expand its sales outside the U.S., and that can happen faster through Glaxo.

Morfitt said it's not yet clear where Minneapolis-based CNS will be based or who the management team will be after the acquisition. CNS employs about 70 people, most of them in Minnesota. The Breathe Right strips are made by a separate company in Tennessee.

CNS has paid a licensing fee to the inventor of the Breathe Right strips, and that will continue after the sale, she said.

Glaxo said it expects to complete the purchase by early next year, dependent on shareholder approval and antitrust clearance.

DOJ_NMG_0076751

"The opportunity for growth through geographic expansion and pipeline innovation make this acquisition an exciting prospect," said John Clarke, the president of GSK Consumer Healthcare.

Glaxo shares rose 1 percent to 14.60 pounds ($27.22) on the London Stock Exchange.

Citigroup Sets Sights On Overseas Banks (FT)

By David Wighton In New York And Peter Thal Larsen In London

Financial Times, October 9, 2006

Chuck Prince, chief executive of Citigroup, is targeting several banks outside the US for acquisitions as he speeds up his plan to reduce the world's biggest financial group's dependence on the slow-growing US market.

He wants to increase the proportion of Citigroup's earnings coming from outside the US from the current 45 per cent to 60 per cent in the next few years.

Citigroup has considered a number of potential deals in recent months, including banks in Taiwan, Turkey, Central America, China and western Europe, and Mr Prince said he was expecting progress before the end of the year.

"The pipeline is filling up nicely," he said in an interview with the Financial Times.

When he became chief executive three years ago, Mr Prince said he wanted to shift Citigroup from its historic reliance on acquisitions under his predecessor, Sandy Weill, to a balance between acquisitions and organic growth.

But a series of regulatory problems resulted in the US Federal Reserve banning the company from doing big deals until it improved its internal controls. That restriction was lifted six months ago.

The Fed ban left Mr Prince dependent on internal growth and he has come under increasing criticism for slower-than-expected returns from Citigroup's stepped-up investment in branch openings and for the relatively sluggish stock price.

Prince Alwaleed bin Talal, the Saudi prince who owns a 4.3 per cent stake in Citigroup worth $10bn, told the Financial Times in July that costs were out of control and called for "draconian" measures to curb expenses.

Sandy Weill, who constructed Citigroup through a series of acquisitions in the 1990s and stepped down as chairman in April, has told friends he agrees with Prince Alwaleed's criticisms. "He says the cost discipline has been lost," one said.

In an interview with the FT, Mr Weill said he had raised concerns about costs with Mr Prince. "I think Chuck definitely feels the need to rein in costs as well as invest for the future."

But Mr Prince insisted he would not cut back on investment. "We are on the cusp of organic growth showing through."

Some large investors say Mr Prince will need to show better progress in the third-quarter results, announced next Thursday, and for the rest of the year or the board will come under pressure to make changes.

Executives have become frustrated with the bank's share price, which has placed a limit on its ability to pay for large deals with stock.

Hollywood Warned About Piracy (FT)

By Matthew Garrahan In Los Angeles

Financial Times, October 9, 2006

Hollywood studios must accelerate electronic distribution of their film content if they are to halt the rapid growth of digital piracy, which is projected to increase three-fold by 2015, Bain & Company has warned.

Digital film piracy currently costs Hollywood $2.3bn a year in lost revenues, equivalent to about 3 per cent of total international film industry revenues, according to Bain. However, the consultancy firm estimates digital piracy will represent at least 10 per cent of international film revenues by 2015, equivalent to almost $8bn a year if industry returns stay at existing levels.

David Sanderson, a partner in Bain's Los Angeles office and the head of the firm's global media and entertainment practice, said studios had to offer consumers the opportunity to buy their digital content legally if they were to stop piracy.

"The most important thing [the film industry] needs to do is give consumers a legal choice to buy content electronically," he said. "Studios have to keep looking at consumer needs to give them better alternatives [to buying illegal content]."

Failure to do this could lead to a repeat of the music industry's experience, when fast growth in illegal file sharing decimated record label returns, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0076752

Mr Sanderson also indicated that release "windows" – the time between theatrical release, DVD and pay-TV sale – would have to be compressed if the studios were to beat digital pirates.

The video-on-demand and DVD windows had already "collapsed", although making films available for digital download near, or shortly after, their theatrical release, "would have a big bearing on studio economics. Historically, windows have been a way to sell a piece of content as many times as you can."

One solution would be to sell a film digitally in a format that allowed the content to be played on multiple platforms, such as a PC, DVD player or hand-held device, and then charge consumers accordingly, he added.

"The studios have to figure out how the consumer is going to buy the content and move it around different devices."

The Bain warning comes amid a period of belt-tightening in Hollywood. Studios are increasingly bringing in financial partners, such as hedge funds and private equity firms to share the burden of escalating production costs.

Most studios have made their movies available for digital download on websites such as CinemaNow. However, these moves have had limited success. Walt Disney has enjoyed better results by making its content available on Apple's iTunes platform.

Rival studios are expected to follow next year, although concerns about the effect on DVD sales of downloading films continue to influence studios' thinking.

Danaher Is Close To Deal For Vision As Its Rivals Fade (WSJ)

By Dennis K. Berman

The Wall Street Journal, October 9, 2006

Industrial conglomerate Danaher Corp. late yesterday was on the verge of clinching a deal for Australian medical-technology concern Vision Systems Ltd. for about $595 million, or 3.75 Australian dollars ($2.79) a share, according to people familiar with the transaction.

Danaher's offer appears to trump rival bids from two other U.S. companies, Ventana Medical Systems Inc. and Cytyc Corp., which had in recent weeks been vying for Vision Systems. The board of the Melbourne, Australia, company was expected to recommend Danaher's proposal, which is expected to come in the form of a tender offer, people familiar with the matter said.

Danaher, Washington, D.C., is paying a full price for Vision, a maker of technical equipment and biological materials used in pathology laboratories. Vision is primarily engaged in the business of cancer detection, producing technical instruments and materials known as reagents used in tumor biopsies.

Ventana, for instance, had originally announced a deal two months ago that valued Vision at A$2.13 a share. Then Cytyc waded into the battle, eventually offering A$3.25 a share for the company, a price that seemed a knockout bid. But it turned out to be insufficient, given Danaher's offer and the company's overwhelming financial firepower against the smaller Cytyc.

Danaher is paying up for Vision, though, because it sees an opportunity in combining Vision with its Leica Microsystems Inc. business, whose lab equipment and high-powered microscopes are used in the same pathology labs as Vision's equipment. People familiar with the transaction said that Danaher will be able to sell laboratories a full grouping of the equipment, integrating it to improve the processing time for the biopsies and cell cultures that cycle through pathology labs.

The people close to the transaction say that the acquisition still fits into Danaher's overall acquisition framework, in which it aims to notch a double-digit return on invested capital within five years of the original purchase.

A Vision purchase would mark the latest in a long line of acquisitions for Danaher, which sports a $21 billion market capitalization. During 2005, the company reported revenue of $7.98 billion and net income of $907.7 million.

Company Searching For Recalled Lettuce (WP/AP)

By Juliana Barbassa

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0076753

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 9 -- The company that recalled its lettuce after irrigation water tested positive for E. coli scrambled Monday to locate 250 remaining cartons of the greens, which could be scattered across seven Western states.

On Sunday, Nunes Co. recalled more than 8,500 cartons of green leaf lettuce grown on one farm in the Salinas Valley, the agricultural region at the center of the contaminated-spinach outbreak that killed three people and made 199 others sick.

By Monday morning, all but 250 cartons of the lettuce distributed under the Foxy brand between Oct. 3 and Oct. 6 had been located and were being destroyed, Nunes President Tom Nunes said.

The search continued for the remaining cartons, which Nunes said were believed to be in supermarkets or restaurants in Arizona, California, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana.

"If we can get it all back, I'll be a happy camper," Nunes said, emphasizing that the recall was precautionary since there had been no evidence of E. coli on the lettuce, or any reports of illnesses.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration commended the company for its action.

"Clearly, the company did the right thing in terms of taking the proper approach in not putting the public at risk and initiating a voluntary recall," said David Acheson, chief medical officer in the FDA's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition.

Acheson said the lettuce recall does not appear to be related to the contaminated-spinach outbreak.

E. Coli Worry Spreads To Lettuce; California Grower Issues Recall (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 8 (AP) — Less than a week after the Food and Drug Administration lifted its warning on fresh spinach grown in the Salinas Valley in California, a popular brand of lettuce grown there was recalled on Sunday over concerns about E. coli contamination.

The lettuce does not appear to have caused any illnesses, said the president of the grower, the Nunes Company.

The recall comes amid warnings that some brands of spinach, bottled carrot juice and recent shipments of beef could cause health risks.

Executives ordered the recall after learning that irrigation water may have been contaminated with E. coli, said Tom Nunes Jr., president of the company. The company has not found E. coli bacteria in the lettuce itself, Mr. Nunes said.

“We’re just reacting to a water test only,” he said. “We know there’s generic E. coli on it, but we’re not sure what that means.”

The recall covers green leaf lettuce sold from Oct. 3 to Oct. 6 under the Foxy brand in grocery stores in Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon and Washington. It was also sold to distributors in those states who may have sold it to restaurants or institutions.

The lettuce was packaged as “Green Leaf 24 Count, waxed carton,” and “Green Leaf 18 Count, cellophane sleeve, returnable carton.” Packaging is stamped with the lot code 6SL0024.

Julie Zawisza, an F.D.A. spokeswoman, said the agency was aware of the voluntary recall but had no details. Mr. Nunes said the bacteria in the lettuce fields probably did not share the source of the E. coli found in spinach that has sickened nearly 200 people and has been linked to three deaths nationwide.

The recall at Nunes, a family-owned business with more than 20,000 acres of cropland in Arizona and California, comes days after federal agents searched two Salinas Valley produce companies connected to the nationwide spinach scare.

Epidemiologists also warned consumers last week to stay away from some bottled carrot juice after a Florida woman was paralyzed and three people in Georgia experienced respiratory failure, apparently from botulism poisoning.

On Friday, an Iowa company announced that it was recalling 5,200 pounds of ground beef suspected of having E. coli. The government said no illnesses had been reported from consumption of the beef.

The outbreaks have sparked demands to create a new federal agency in charge of food safety. Senators Charles E. Schumer and Hillary Rodham Clinton, both New York Democrats, are sponsoring legislation written by Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, to create a unified Food Safety Agency.

The outbreaks have devastated the economy of the Salinas Valley, where farmers in the area began plowing spinach crops under and laying off workers last month.

Calif. Lettuce Recalled Over E. Coli Concerns (WP/AP)

By Rachel Konrad, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 9, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 8 -- Less than a week after the Food and Drug Administration lifted its warning on fresh spinach grown in California's Salinas Valley, a popular brand of lettuce grown there has been recalled over concerns about E. coli contamination.

The lettuce does not appear to have caused any illnesses, the president of Salinas-based Nunes Co. said.

The lettuce scare follows other federal warnings that some brands of spinach, bottled carrot juice and recent shipments of beef could cause grave health risks -- including paralysis, respiratory failure and death.

Executives ordered the recall after learning that irrigation water may have been contaminated with E. coli, said Tom Nunes Jr., president of the company.

So far, company investigators have not found E. coli bacteria in the lettuce itself, Nunes stressed.

"We're just reacting to a water test only. We know there's generic E. coli on it, but we're not sure what that means," he said. "We're being extra careful. This is precautionary."

The recall covers green leaf lettuce purchased in grocery stores Oct. 3-6 in Arizona, California, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana. It was also sold to distributors in those states who may have sold it to restaurants or institutions.

FDA spokeswoman Julie Zawisza said the agency is aware of the voluntary recall but had no details.

"As a standard course of action, we would expect the firm to identify the source of the contamination and take steps to . . . ensure that it doesn't happen again," Zawisza wrote in an e-mail.

It's unlikely, Nunes said, that the bacteria in the lettuce fields share the source of the E. coli found in spinach that has sickened nearly 200 people and has been linked to three deaths nationwide.

Pathogenic Escherichia coli bacteria, or E. coli, can proliferate in uncooked produce, raw milk, unpasteurized juice, contaminated water and meat. When consumed, it may cause diarrhea and bloody stools.

Although most healthy adults recover within a week without long-term side effects, some people may develop a form of kidney failure.

That illness is most likely to occur in young children, senior citizens and people with compromised immune systems. In extreme cases, it can lead to kidney damage or death.

Epidemiologists also warned consumers last week to avoid some bottled carrot juice after a Florida woman was paralyzed and three people in Georgia experienced respiratory failure, apparently because of botulism poisoning.

Also on Friday, an Iowa company announced that it was recalling 5,200 pounds of ground beef suspected of having E. coli. The government said no illnesses have been reported from consumption of the beef.

'Foxy' Brand Lettuce Recalled; E. Coli Feared (USAT)

By William M. Welch, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

LOS ANGELES - A California company is voluntarily recalling its "Foxy" brand of lettuce because of fears of E. coli contamination in produce sold last week.

The move is the latest worry over tainted produce from the Salinas, Calif., area, coming less than a week after the Food and Drug Administration ended a national warning on spinach grown in the area.

FDA Assistant Commissioner Julie Zawisza said Sunday that the agency was aware of the lettuce recall, "and we are looking into it."

Green leaf lettuce sold to distributors in seven western states under the "Foxy" brand is being recalled, according to the producer, The Nunes Co.

DOJ_NMG_0076755

The lettuce was distributed in Arizona, California, Nevada, Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana. No illnesses have been attributed to the lettuce thus far, said Tom Nunes Jr., president of the family-owned company.

All affected lettuce came from one farm and was shipped from the company's Salinas facilities Tuesday through Friday, he said.

Nunes called the recall a precaution ordered after the company discovered that water used to irrigate the lettuce crops had tested positive for E. coli bacteria in an initial test. “Samples of the recalled product are now being tested," he said.

E. coli can cause diarrheal illness and, in some patients, can lead to kidney damage and even death.

The lettuce was sold to stores and to distributors who may have resold it to restaurants. The produce were sold under lot code 6SL0024 and packaged as “Green Leaf 24 Count, waxed carton," and “Green Leaf 18 Count, cellophane sleeve, returnable carton."

Consumers who have purchased these products are urged to return it to the place of purchase for a full refund, said the company. Consumers with questions can reach the company at 1-800-695-5012.

Zawisza said the FDA was seeking to determine the scope of the problem.

“We would expect the firm to identify the source of the contamination and take steps to correct and prevent to ensure that it doesn't happen again," she said.

Outbreak Exposes Weakness In Food Chain (FWST)

By Libby Quaid

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON - The recent outbreak of E. coli in spinach from California exposed a weakness in the nation's food chain: A system that quickly delivers meat, fruits and vegetables to consumers just as easily can spread potentially deadly bacteria.

Like most food, spinach travels from the field to a central facility where it mixes with spinach from other fields. If any is tainted, the threat to people is amplified as leaves are washed, dried, bagged and shipped throughout the country.

Within days of the first reported E. coli-related case on Aug. 30, illness from the tainted California spinach had spread to two dozen states. Nearly 200 people were sickened - one-third of them in the first 72 hours. Two elderly women and a 2-year-old boy died.

"When you open a bag of spinach, do you wonder how many different plants are in there, and how many different fields it came from?" said Dr. Robert Tauxe, chief of foodborne diseases at the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

"If something went wrong on any one of those fields ... one rotten apple spoils the whole barrel," Tauxe said.

It was the 20th time lettuce or spinach has been blamed for an outbreak of illness since 1995.

On Sunday, green leaf lettuce from the same growing area, California's Salinas Valley, was recalled in more than half a dozen states after Nunes Co. Inc. discovered possible E. coli contamination of irrigation water. The bacteria hasn't been found in the company's Foxy brand lettuce. No illnesses have been reported.

Food safety advocates are calling for stringent regulations, and they say a single agency should be in charge of making sure all food is safe.

"If you raise spinach in the Salinas Valley and it's in 40 states in a few days, you can't have a system that says we won't do anything until somebody gets sick," said Carol Tucker Foreman, director of food policy for Consumer Federation and a former USDA official.

"Because look how many people get sick before you can even know it," Foreman said.

The Food and Drug Administration has repeatedly told the entire industry to get the problem under control, but FDA does not have inspection or safety programs for produce like the Agriculture Department has for meat and poultry.

While the food system is vastly centralized, "what we don't have is a centralized agency that's really in charge of ensuring that the products are safe," said Caroline Smith DeWaal, director of food safety for the Center for Science in the Public Interest.

An E. coli outbreak in 1993 was a painful demonstration of weakness in the highly centralized beef supply chain. Hundreds of people got sick and four children died after eating undercooked hamburgers from Jack in the Box restaurants.

DOJ_NMG_0076756

The outbreak prompted the Agriculture Department to tighten safety standards and expand government testing. And in 1996, it replaced its old visual inspection with one that requires a scientific look at vulnerable places in the production chain and constant monitoring of those points.

Today, illnesses from E. coli are down 29 percent from when the government tracking system began a decade ago, although illness rates inched up from 2004 to 2005.

"It took a few years, but I think we have a really good handle on how to control this organism," said Randy Huffman, vice president of science for the American Meat Institute, an industry group.

The company at the center of the spinach crisis, Natural Selection Foods, has begun sampling every lot of greens and holding shipments until test results come back.

"Even if we nail this particular problem down to a certain point, I think it's really important to have that firewall in place, so no matter where it might come from, we feel like we can catch it," company spokeswoman Samantha Cabaluna said.

With beef, an important step was figuring out just how contamination happened in the first place. Government scientists discovered the primary source entered the slaughterhouse on the hides of cattle, and that it could transfer directly to the surface of the meat.

Solving that mystery may be more critical for lettuce and spinach because - unlike beef - much of leafy produce is eaten raw and not cooked to temperatures that will kill E. coli.

So far, no one has determined the cause of nine outbreaks, including the one from late August, in lettuce and spinach grown in Salinas, Calif.

In the spinach case, the FBI has searched processing plants for evidence of problems and state investigators are looking into contamination from manure, irrigation water or even workers relieving themselves in fields.

In addition, it is unknown exactly where E. coli lurks in spinach and lettuce plants. Research suggests the bacteria can get inside the stems and leaves, Tauxe said, adding that more research is needed.

It's unlikely whether FDA will ever know if the E. coli bacteria was on the surface of the tainted spinach or inside the greens themselves, because it was ground up for testing, Dr. David Acheson, chief medical officer in the FDA's Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition, told reporters Monday.

Tauxe said: "It took the meat industry some years to get a grip on how contamination was occurring during slaughter, and it will take some time for the produce industry to get a better handle on this."

Voluntary Lettuce Recall Creates More Worry For Farmers (NYT)

By Jesse McKinley

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 9 — It is, in scope and severity, a fairly minor recall: about 8,500 cartons of lettuce, which may or may not have come into contact with irrigation water contaminated with E. coli bacteria. No one has gotten sick, the lettuce company involved emphasized, adding that the move was precautionary.

But for farmers in the Salinas Valley of California, already reeling from last month's deadly E. coli outbreak in spinach, the timing could not have been worse.

"It clearly has the potential to set back our effort to regain consumer confidence," said Bob Perkins, the executive director of the farm bureau in Monterey County, one of three counties to which the contaminated spinach was linked. "Right now, I don't know how the story is playing out with the general public, whether it's an example of another problem with the industry or it's an example of how the system works."

The voluntary recall of the lettuce, announced Sunday by the Nunes Company, based in Salinas, involved about 8,500 cartons of green leaf lettuce sold under the Foxy label. Tom Nunes Jr., the company's president, said Monday that only 250 cartons could have reached consumers and that those were believed to be in one of seven Western states: Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, Oregon or Washington. Mr. Nunes said the other cartons had been found and were being destroyed.

DOJ_NMG_0076757

The recall was decided on, Mr. Nunes said, after a test of reservoir water at a single Salinas Valley farm that supplies the Nunes Company found "a dangerous concentration of generic E. coli." But he said there was no evidence yet that it was the potentially lethal strain E. coli O157:H7, which contaminated spinach last month, causing three deaths and sickening nearly 200.

"We don't know what kind of E. coli it is," said Mr. Nunes, who added that further test results on the E. coli were expected back Tuesday. "But it was enough to get our attention."

Federal health authorities commended the recall and said Monday that no illnesses had been linked to the Nunes Company's products or to the irrigation water. Finding very low levels of E. coli in water is not unusual, said Dr. David Acheson, chief medical officer of the Center for Food Safety and Applied Nutrition at the Food and Drug Administration.

Whether that will reassure customers or result in lettuce wilting at the salad bar remains to be seen. In downtown San Francisco, some delis posted signs informing customers that the shops were not using Foxy lettuce alongside notices that their spinach was safe.

Tina Lopez, an office worker at Washington Mutual here, said she was not worried about the salad she had just bought for lunch. "I figured if they had it out, it was probably O.K.," Ms. Lopez said. "If anything it's probably safer because they're scrutinizing everything."

That was exactly the kind of reaction farmers' groups were hoping for. Tim Chelling, a spokesman for Western Growers, which represents 3,000 farmers and shippers in California and Arizona, said the response to the lettuce recall had been more forceful than the one to the spinach.

"I've been hearing from everybody and their brother," Mr. Chelling said. "Everybody is communicating, trading information. People aren't stumbling around in the fields in shock, but very quickly trying to organize themselves as professionally and diligently as possible."

The lettuce recall is the latest in a series of food scares, including a recent recall of carrot juice linked to an outbreak of botulism in Georgia and Florida, and an Iowa company's recall of 5,200 pounds of ground beef thought to have been contaminated with E. coli.

And though the nationwide spinach warning has been lifted, the investigation continues. Last week, officials from the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Office of Criminal Investigations at the F.D.A. searched two processing facilities in the Salinas Valley.

Even more than spinach, however, contaminated lettuce has long been a source of concern for health authorities. In August, the F.D.A. announced the Lettuce Safety Initiative, meant to address E. coli outbreaks in the past decade that had been linked to fields in the Salinas Valley, about 100 miles south of San Francisco.

Still, Dr. Acheson said that Americans safely consumed hundreds of thousands of pounds of leafy greens every year and that the recent outbreak tied to spinach was an agricultural anomaly.

"Every now and again something goes wrong," he said, "and the spinach example was one of the worst. Are we ever going to reach a point where we can say there is zero risk associated with fresh leafy greens? Probably not."

But food safety experts said the lettuce recall only affirmed the need for more governmental oversight of the fresh produce industry, and for the type of inspections that governed meat and poultry.

"There's no federal agency that deals with this," said Marion Nestle, a professor of nutrition, public health and food safety at New York University. "This falls through the cracks, and that needs to be fixed."

That need is even more acute, Dr. Nestle said, because many vegetables are eaten raw. "You could cook spinach, but you don't ever cook lettuce," she said.

Dave Kranz, a spokesman for the California Farm Bureau Federation, said it was premature to estimate what kind of economic damage the lettuce recall might inflict on farmers already hit hard by the spinach scare. Although the government warning on that crop was lifted, Mr. Kranz said, many farmers are still on hold, "waiting to see how much demand there will be, and how soon."

While the Salinas Valley has been the focus of the recent E. Coli investigations, the growing season is poised to shift south, and there, farmers are anxious.

DOJ_NMG_0076758

"It's a huge worry," said Jack Vessey, a vegetable farmer in El Centro, about 500 miles south of Salinas. Mr. Vessey grows 20 winter crops at his 7,000-acre ranch and just seeded green leaf lettuce fields for the mid-November harvest. Now, however, he is having second thoughts.

"The consumer confidence has to come back," Mr. Vessey said. "I'm putting seed in the ground. But I'm pretty much gambling on what I plant now."

Renewable Energy Conference Will Revisit Bush's Energy Goals (KCS/AP)

By Cheryl Wittenauer, The Associated Press

The Kansas City Star, October 10, 2006

ST. LOUIS - A national renewable energy conference this week in St. Louis will revisit energy goals and strategies President Bush set out in his State of the Union address in January, when he proclaimed America "addicted to oil."

Bush is scheduled to address the conference, which starts Tuesday, just before the three-day conference at America's Center winds down Thursday.

"Advancing Renewable Energy: An American Rural Renaissance" is co-hosted by the U.S. departments of energy and agriculture.

The conference is billed as an opportunity to join the public and private sectors in accelerating the commercialization of renewable energy, while creating wealth opportunities for rural communities.

Bush's Advanced Energy Initiative, outlined in his State of the Union address, set a national goal of replacing 75 percent of U.S. oil imports from the Mideast by 2025.

He emphasized the need for more clean-energy research at the Energy Department to fast-track breakthroughs in how autos, homes and businesses are powered. The plan also called for additional funding to make "cellulosic ethanol" - a fuel made from agricultural waste products such as wood chips, stalks or weeds - cost-competitive by 2012.

Bush also called for investing more in zero-emission coal-fired plants, solar and wind technologies and clean, safe nuclear energy, and better batteries for hybrid and electric cars and hydrogen vehicles.

Speakers at the conference will include representatives of government - Department of Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns and Department of Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman; renewable energy sources such as corn, soybeans and wind; financial investment in renewable energy; and environmental concerns.

On the sidelines of the conference Tuesday, DaimlerChrysler and the National Biodiesel Board will discuss new programs to promote clean diesel vehicles and the benefits of renewable biodiesel fuel.

Suspicion Surrounds Retreat In Gas Prices, Poll Finds (WP)

By Steven Mufson

The Washington Post, October 10, 2006

Gasoline prices are down about 75 cents in two months, but whether motorists will see further declines at the pump depends in part on whether the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries can agree to cut production.

Members of the oil cartel have been negotiating to cut the group's output by 1 million barrels a day -- a move that could drive up oil prices and reverse the trend at the pumps. But most oil traders and experts doubt OPEC can achieve more than half the proposed reduction. A failure to cut output could keep supplies strong and oil and gas prices soft.

Pump prices -- now at a national average of $2.28 a gallon for regular unleaded -- already have fallen because of a slowdown in U.S. demand, a buildup in crude oil and gasoline inventories, the end of the summer driving season, a collapse in profit margins at oil refineries and a $17-a-barrel drop in crude oil prices since August.

"The supply was coming back, and I think consumers cut back on use," said Philip K. Verleger, an oil consultant. "The question is how far down it goes."

Though half a dozen countries have talked about production cuts, highly populated countries such as Iran, Nigeria and Venezuela are already producing well below capacity and their old quota levels, and face pressure to produce more because of heavy domestic-spending demands. Kuwait has not cut production since 1998. Saudi Arabia is reluctant to play the role of sole swing producer and has already trimmed output.

DOJ_NMG_0076759

"We do not expect any significant production cuts by OPEC at prices above $45 a barrel, the new target price," Fadel Gheit, oil analyst at Oppenheimer & Co., said in a report to investors. Oil markets seemed to agree. The price of crude oil on the New York Mercantile Exchange closed yesterday at $59.96, up 20 cents.

While motorists have welcomed the drop in gasoline prices, a Washington Post-ABC News poll released yesterday showed that many Americans remain suspicious about the reasons for the recent decline and skeptical about whether it will last.

Three out of 10 Americans think the recent fall in gasoline prices is a result of domestic political factors, including White House and Republican Party efforts to influence the November elections. That's nearly as many as the 35 percent who attribute the recent price decline to market forces or supply and demand, according to the poll of 1,204 adults conducted from Thursday to Sunday.

The survey also showed that suspicions about the steep drop in gasoline prices over the past two months aren't limited to the nation's liberal strongholds. Sixteen percent of people who identified themselves as conservative Republicans, 26 percent of white evangelical Protestants and 29 percent of Southern residents think the plunge in prices is linked to the coming election or other political reasons.

Those beliefs may be blunting the positive impact President Bush and the GOP hoped to get from falling fuel prices. "I think the president's party is lowering the gas prices until the people think the economy is settling down, and then they will raise the price again, blaming it on the Arabs for raising the price on barrels of oil," one respondent said.

"As you may know, gasoline prices have fallen recently in many parts of the country," the survey said before asking: "What do you think is the main reason gas prices have gone down?" The top four answers: increased supply, Bush/GOP efforts to affect the November election, the "upcoming election" and "market forces."

A large number of people interviewed pointed to the absence of disruptive hurricanes or simply "supply and demand," while one respondent said prices were falling "because the gasoline companies got what they wanted, the big bucks; and if they continue there will probably be an investigation."

Gasoline experts said there were some signs that prices were stabilizing. The pace of declines in the prices charged by wholesalers was slowing, and there were some tiny wholesale price increases late last week in the Gulf of Mexico region, said Trilby Lundberg, editor of the Lundberg Survey.

Lundberg warned that the sharp drop in prices could spur a resumption of increases in U.S. gasoline consumption. She also said that the closure of refineries for maintenance, not unusual at this time of year, could lead to a decline in inventories.

"Some analysts expect to see a fairly large amount of refinery maintenance this month, which could lead to product inventories being drawn down a little bit more than normal," said last week's report by the Energy Department's Energy Information Administration. "Large volumes of product inventories are one of the many reasons cited for declining prices in recent weeks, and should they begin to be drawn down significantly, this could stop prices from falling further."

But Verleger said he expected prices to remain weak through Thanksgiving or longer. He said that much of the increase in gasoline prices this year was the result of logistical problems oil companies encountered in adapting new government regulations. The companies have had to reduce sulfur content in diesel fuels and begin to mix gasoline with ethanol instead of methyl tertiary butyl ether, an additive that once made up about 3 percent of the content of gasoline.

Illegal Dumps Alter Western Landscapes (USAT)

By Benjamin Spillman, Usa Today

USA Today, October 9, 2006

States' costs mount as trash mounds grow

They rise from the Western landscape, but they're not purple mountains.

They're heaping mounds of car parts, furniture, appliances and household trash dumped illegally onto public land in deserts, mountain ranges and streambeds.

The Bureau of Land Management (BLM) reports they're especially piling up across the American West, where burgeoning cities from Palm Springs, Calif., to Boise are spilling into once pristine landscapes.

DOJ_NMG_0076760

“There is hardly a city in the West right now that isn't experiencing significant growth,” Felicia Probert, chief ranger of the BLM, said. “Typically, we haven't had the appropriation, the budget strength, to add rangers as these issues grow in the expanding West.”

Steve Kilpatrick, a BLM ranger in Las Vegas, one of the nation's fastest growing cities, said, “People are just going out to the desert and dumping stuff. I could take you in an area where there are boats, concrete … household trash.”

In the 2005-06 fiscal year, the cost of cleaning up illegal dumps in the Las Vegas area has added up to $2.8 million, the agency reports.

In April, BLM used front-end loaders, dump trucks and volunteers to haul tons of trash from public land in Payette, Jerome, Ada and Madison counties in Idaho.

Karl Gebhardt, BLM environmental engineer, said a single incident of potentially hazardous material, such as an unidentified drum of liquid, can cost up to $10,000.

Gebhardt said the BLM in Idaho relies heavily on the public to report illegal dumping.

“This is their land. And people are trashing it,” he said.

The agency has reported 6,482 illegal dumpsites since 2000, plus another 607 hazardous material cleanups. Most of those have been in the West.

Celia Boddington, spokeswoman for the agency, says it is difficult to come up with a comprehensive estimate of the cleanup cost because of differences in accounting procedures.

The agency figures don't include illegal dumping on private land, which also can cost taxpayers money.

In California alone, illegal dumping on private and public land costs at least $87 million annually, according to an ongoing survey of local governments. The estimate is based on the 61 of 415 city and county governments that have responded to the survey.

“People are really starting to realize what it means in California,” said Ken Stuart, who is conducting the survey for the California Integrated Waste Management Board.

In addition to the cleanup cost, there is the threat to public health.

Illegal dumps support rodents and can catch fire and spew toxic smoke.

“Catching people with illegal dumping is just as good as catching people with drugs because of the community impact,” said Sgt. George Lee of the Riverside County (Calif.) Sheriff's Department.

Cornering dumpers is difficult because dumping generally happens in remote areas, and proving guilt can require catching the culprit in the act.

In rural areas southeast of Palm Springs, two sheriff's deputies and a support staffer consider illegal dumping a big part of their beat.

On a recent day, the deputies pointed out illegal dumps that were among 20 the team had identified in a region known more for lush golf resorts than environmental hazards.

“There are obviously no residents, no reason to be back here,” said Deputy Sean Dusek, at one site where piles of furniture, car parts and yard waste lined both sides of a dirt road.

The deputies have experimented with hidden cameras, and they sift through trash piles for clues about the source.

They pick through household trash, construction debris, car batteries, appliances, furniture and landscaping waste for receipts, mail or anything else with a name.

If they identify a name, they find the person, sometimes write them a ticket and tell them to clean up the mess. A county ordinance also allows them to impound a suspect's car for 30 days.

In 2004, California passed a law that increased fines for commercial illegal dumping from $500 to a range between $1,000 and $3,000 for a first offense.

Dusek's partner, Deputy J.C. Garcia, looks at one of the dumpsites and suggests the punishment is justified.

“People come out here for the view. Then they have to look at this,” he said.

Land Use Tops State Ballot Issues (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price

The Washington Times, October 10, 2006

State ballot measures to limit use of eminent domain, to bar same-sex "marriage" and to decide the fate of legislation passed in South Dakota outlawing nearly all abortions will be among those facing voters on Election Day, Nov. 7.

"The biggest issue this year is definitely property rights and land use," and voters in at least 11 states will consider measures that would bar governments from taking private property for another private use, said Jennie Drage Bowser, a policy analyst for the National Conference of State Legislatures (NCSL), which tracks ballot questions across the country.

The 11 states where voters will decide on property-rights measures are Arizona, California, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Michigan, Nevada, New Hampshire, North Dakota, Oregon and South Carolina, said Larry Morandi, NCSL's group director for environment, energy and transportation.

In a primary election Sept. 30, voters in a 12th state, Louisiana, approved a change in the state constitution that prohibits government from expanding eminent-domain power for economic development.

Mr. Morandi said four other states are seeking to prevent governments from engaging in a practice known as "regulatory taking," which restricts a landowner's ability to develop his property. The measures would require compensation for the loss of property value caused by such restrictions.

Mr. Morandi said three states -- Arizona, California and Idaho -- are seeking to combine limitations on regulatory taking with those on eminent domain. A measure in Washington state seeks only to restrict use of regulatory taking of property. Mr. Morandi said such cases typically involve land that adjoins wetlands or other environmentally sensitive tracts, and governments have a history of not paying when they seek to prevent development of property.

These ballot measures are repercussions from the U.S. Supreme Court's June 2005 ruling that governments' taking of private property for private economic-development projects qualifies as a "public use" under the Constitution. That ruling also said that states could set their own restrictions on using the power of eminent domain, and many have followed suit.

In the 2004 general election, ballot measures were dominated by efforts to prohibit same-sex "marriage." Twenty states have approved constitutional amendments banning such "marriages," and voters in eight more states -- Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin -- will consider them on Nov. 7.

Colorado voters also will consider a rival ballot measure that would legalize "domestic partnerships" or civil unions between same-sex couples, even if the marriage amendment passes.

Amendment 44 on the Colorado ballot would legalize the possession and use of up to 1 ounce of marijuana by people 21 or older, as long as it does not occur in public. Question 7 on the Nevada ballot would allow people 21 or older to purchase, possess, use and transport up to 1 ounce of marijuana.

Among proposals to be considered on Election Day:

•A Colorado measure would set term limits for state Supreme Court justices and state appellate court judges.

•An initiative in Oregon would limit terms of state representatives to six years and of state senators to eight years and cut off legislative service after 14 years.

•Three states -- Maine, Nebraska and Oregon -- will have ballot measures that would cap how much revenue the state is allowed to keep. The Maine proposal, for instance, would limit growth in state spending to increases in population and inflation and would require that 80 percent of the excess paid to the General Fund and Highway Fund budgets go toward a tax-relief fund.

•A measure on the Florida ballot would require 60 percent voter support for passage of state constitutional amendments. Currently, amendments can pass with simple majorities, Ms. Bowser said.

At least 204 measures will be on the ballots of 39 states, Ms. Bowser said, making this a "gigantic" year in terms of ballot measures.

A Multipronged Tussle Over The Fate Of Herds Living In An Island Park (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

DOJ_NMG_0076762

The New York Times, October 9, 2006

SANTA ROSA ISLAND, Calif., Oct. 3 — There are hunters who dream about places like this.

The game — unusually large Kaibab deer, Roosevelt elk that lope like thoroughbreds along the wind-scoured ridgelines — are trophy quality. All it takes to bag one is a 30-mile trip across the Santa Barbara Channel, a rifle, good aim, a minimum fee of about $8,000 and the existing agreement by the National Park Service to close 45,000 acres of parkland to the public, August through December.

Close a public park to make way for a private hunt? That is not the Park Service's preference. When it acquired Santa Rosa Island at the time the Channel Islands National Park was formed in 1986, it accepted a 25-year transition period during which the hunting would continue. It wants the animals off the island. The 1,150 deer and elk, park officials say, compromise the native ecosystem — by munching on seedlings of the rare island oaks, for instance.

An advocacy group, the National Parks Conservation Association, is also arguing against continuing to open parkland to private pursuits. Its late 1990's lawsuit ensured that the herd's 100-year history on the island would end. Starting in 2008, the herd was to be whittled down, either shipped out or shot. By 2011, it would be gone.

That was the deal until Representative Duncan Hunter came along. A powerful Congressional committee chairman who seems named, if not born, for this dispute, Mr. Hunter, Republican of California, believes the island's hunt must go on. But the Interior Department is not in his purview. The Defense Department is.

First, Mr. Hunter, the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, suggested that military personnel and their guests should enjoy the hunt. Then he said it should continue for disabled veterans.

Neither of these proposals went over. But last week the huge military authorization bill emerged from a House-Senate conference committee with a vestige of the chairman's original proposal, as inscrutable as the Cheshire cat's smile. No disabled veterans were mentioned. Not even the word "hunt."

But by forbidding the park service to "exterminate or nearly exterminate" the animals, Mr. Hunter ensured that, unless someone shipped them out, the deer and elk would remain.

At whose expense? Presumably the Park Service's, since the families that sold the island ranch to the government will have no more presence here after the transition period ends in 2011.

For whose benefit? That remains unclear. Mr. Hunter's office is circulating an approving letter from a three-year-old Nebraska group called the Wounded Warriors Project. (A more established group, the Paralyzed Veterans of America, declined after their representative reported that the island's steep hills and angular drainages were not wheelchair accessible.)

What is clear is who is pleased with the turn of events: largely the descendants of the Vail family, who are heirs to the assets of the Vail & Vickers ranching company, which sold the land to the Park Service. Tim Vail, one of three cousins who played host to a gathering of California ranchers on the island last week, said, "We would not like to see the slaughter of those animals."

Asked to describe the difference between the Park Service's elimination of the herd and the private hunting, which benefits his family, Mr. Vail said: "Slaughter is removing all the animals. Hunting is maintaining their health as a herd."

It is also clear who is deeply disappointed: the Park Service, the conservation association and Representative Lois Capps, a Democrat who represents Santa Barbara and Channel Islands National Park. For them, preserving the park means restoring the landscape that existed before sheep, cattle, deer and elk were introduced.

"Now, nonnative species have priority over native species that are going to go extinct," said Russell Gallipeau, the park's superintendent.

Yvonne Menard, the park's chief of interpretation, argues that the park's mission is to restore the island's original landscape. Ms. Menard recounts with zest the news that, for the first time in decades, a bald eagle hatched on Santa Rosa. Moments later, she bends down sadly over a well-nibbled island oak shoot.

The bones of a pygmy mammoth and Arlington Man — at 13,000 years the oldest human skeleton found in North America — are part of the island's history. The ranching and hunting legacy of the past 170 years is also uniquely valuable, she said, but not as current practice.

DOJ_NMG_0076763

Under the new legislation, managing the deer and elk may well be part of the Park Service's job in five years. Practically, Mr. Gallipeau said, that means managing a hunt or paying the considerable costs of shipborne removal and taking on the burden of managing the skittish animals on the sometimes rough two-hour channel crossing.

The simplest management technique, shooting the animals en masse from helicopters, is forbidden by Mr. Hunter's legislation. The only simple alternative is some kind of traditional hunt — maybe something like the hunt now run by Vail & Vickers, although the Park Service has no budget for such activity.

Mr. Hunter said in an interview that, given that only 30,000 people a year visit any of the five islands in the park, accommodating some disabled veterans and their families a few weeks a year was not unreasonable. "We did this as a first step," he said.

Then, he said, he wants the Wounded Warriors group to put together a plan of use to suit their members. "You've got my commitment: I will never hunt there," Mr. Hunter said. "I only want disabled people who served their country in war. That won't ruin the day of these environmentalists whose freedom is guaranteed by their service."

The herds, he said, could be managed by the game management personnel at nearby mainland military bases.

Ms. Capps, who debated sharply with Mr. Hunter on the House floor the day the military authorization bill passed, said the chairman was showing "the arrogance of power" by including an amendment that could not be voted on in its own right.

"This is about what the park means to this country in terms of its values," she said, adding, "What if there were a hunting operation like this in Yosemite? The Grand Canyon?"

In the next Congress, Ms. Capps said, she plans to introduce legislation to undo Mr. Hunter's, assuming, as all parties do, that the Senate will follow the House and approve the military authorization bill when Congress reconvenes after the November election. Likewise, Mr. Hunter plans a follow-up to his bill.

The Vail descendants — the first cousins Tim Vail, Nita Vail and Will Woolley — say they believe that the Park Service goal of returning the island to its natural state is hopelessly utopian.

"They're trying to get it back to a period that never existed," Mr. Woolley said. Nita Vail added, "The reality is, any kind of ecosystem evolves."

October 8, 2006, 1:30 pm Go Ahead and Talk

Former Secretary of State James Baker nudges the Bush administration to talk directly with North Korea, joining a growing chorus calling for reopening diplomatic ties with Iran or engaging in high-level talks with Syria. "You don't give away anything, but, in my view, it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies," Mr. Baker said on ABC's "This Week" television show.

Scholars at the conservative Hoover Institution at Stanford University recently issued a detailed paper urging the administration to offer full diplomatic relations with Iran as part of a bid to get Tehran to give up parts of its nuclear program. The U.S. cut off diplomatic ties with Iran 26 years ago, while the Bush administration has refused to engage in bilateral talks with North Korea, saying that all negotiations should occur within the setting of the six-country talks, which also include Russia, China, Japan and South Korea.

North Korea has long held out for bilateral talks with Washington, portraying its pursuit of nuclear weapons as a means of defense against what it sees as U.S. threats.

"I don't think you restrict your conversations to your friends. At the same time, it's got to be hard-nosed. It's got to be determined," said Mr. Baker, who was former President George H. W. Bush's top diplomat in the early 1990s. – Neil King Jr.

October 7, 2006, 1:06 pm A Convoy in Indiana

In his fight to wrest a congressional seat from House Veterans Affairs Committee Chairman Stephen Buyer (R., Ind.), Democratic challenger David Sanders has found support from a small army of veterans. First, a number of local vets fell in behind him, and he won the backing of former Sen. Max Cleland, a Georgia Democrat and a disabled Vietnam vet, who recently joined Sanders on the campaign trail.

DOJ_NMG_0076764

Now, he has the support of a convoy. On Monday, Sanders is accompanying a day-long road trip around Indiana organized by No Vets Left Behind to protest cuts in veterans' benefits, from higher health-care copays to reduced eligibility to redefining post traumatic stress.

Still, the odds are long for the Purdue University scientist. Buyer, running for his eighth term, picked up 70% of the vote in 2004 – when he also faced Sanders. –Mary Lu Carnevale

Peggy Noonan writes in today's Journal: Thirty-two years into his career as a writer of books, Bob Woodward has won a reputation as slipshod ("Wired"), slippery ("All the President's Men," "The Final Days"), opportunistic ("Veil"; everything) and generally unaware of the implications even of those facts he's offered that have gone unchallenged. … Mr. Woodward has been that amazing thing, the boring fabulist.

The Bush White House has spent the past five years thinking they could manage him. Talk about a state of denial.

Now he has thwarted me. I bought "State of Denial" thinking I might have a merry time bashing it and a satisfying time defending the innocent injured.

But it is a good book. It may be a great one. It is serious, densely, even exhaustively, reported, and a real contribution to history in that it gives history what it most requires, first-person testimony. (It is well documented, with copious notes.) What is most striking is that Mr. Woodward seems to try very hard to be fair, not in a phony "Armitage, however, denies it" way, but in a way that — it will seem too much to say this — reminded me of Jean Renoir: "The real hell of life is that everyone has his reasons." F.B.I. Struggling To Reinvent Itself To Fight Terror (NYT)

By Scott Shane And Lowell Bergman

The New York Times, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 9 — Last February, top F.B.I. officers from across the nation gathered in a high-security auditorium for the latest plan to reinvent the crime-fighting agency to take on terrorism.

Philip Mudd, who had just joined the bureau from the rival Central Intelligence Agency, was pitching a program called Domain Management, designed to get agents to move beyond chasing criminal cases and start gathering intelligence.

Drawing on things like commercial marketing software and the National Security Agency's eavesdropping without warrants, the program is supposed to identify threats. Mr. Mudd displayed a map of the San Francisco area, pocked with data showing where Iranian immigrants were clustered — and where, he said, an F.B.I. squad was "hunting."

Some F.B.I. officials found Mr. Mudd's concept vague and the implied ethnic targeting troubling. How were they supposed to go "hunting" without colliding with the Constitution? Would the C.I.A. man, whom some mocked privately as Rasputin, take the bureau back to the domestic spying scandals of the 1960's? And why neglect promising cases to, in Mr. Mudd's words, "search for the unknown"?

The skepticism is just one sign of unfinished business at the bureau. Five years after the Sept. 11 attacks spurred a new mission, F.B.I. culture still respects door-kicking investigators more than deskbound analysts sifting through tidbits of data. The uneasy transition into a spy organization has prompted criticism from those who believe that the bureau cannot competently gather domestic intelligence, and others, including some insiders, who fear that it can.

Eight months after his talk, Mr. Mudd admits that some in the bureau do not accept his guiding premise: that arresting bad guys is sometimes less important than collecting intelligence to uncover the next terrorist plot.

"There's 31,000 employees in this organization and we're undergoing a sea-change," he said in an interview. "It's going to take a while for what is a high-end national security program to sink down to every officer."

The top counterterrorism job has turned over repeatedly — seven people in five years — filled mostly by veterans with little expertise on Islamist movements and terrorist networks. Many counterterrorism agents have minimal specialized training. A National Security Agency executive brought in to reshape the bureau's intelligence capabilities, Maureen Baginski, departed after clashing with F.B.I. old-timers. The intelligence units Ms. Baginski created in the 56 field offices lack clear instructions and some are "struggling," a recent Congressional study found.

And some bureau traditionalists believe that Mr. Mudd, too, will move on from his job as second in command of the bureau's new National Security Branch. "They'll just wait him out," a counterterrorism official said.

After interviewing more than 60 intelligence officials for a new book on counterterrorism, Amy Zegart, of the University of California, Los Angeles, reached a dismal verdict on the F.B.I.

"If you look at, for example, the four key ingredients for counterterrorism success — agents, analysts, managers and computers — the F.B.I. is struggling to get the basics right on all of them," Ms. Zegart said. "New agents still get more time for vacation than they do for counterterrorism training. Analysts are still treated as glorified secretaries."

In interviews by The New York Times and the Public Broadcasting System documentary series "Frontline," even critics acknowledged the sweeping structural changes at the bureau under Robert S. Mueller III, who took over as director a week before the Sept. 11 attacks.

The number of Joint Terrorism Task Forces, in which F.B.I. agents collaborate with state and local agencies, has ballooned to 101, from 35. The number of intelligence analysts has doubled to 2,161, and the number of linguists has doubled to 1,371. And the F.B.I. points out that there has been no new terrorist attack.

Mr. Mudd said agents were encouraged to postpone the arrest of a terrorism suspect until his ties to other operatives, financial supporters and foreign networks were fully understood.

"I don't want to take him down too quickly," he said. "I want to understand what we know and what we don't know. If we're focused solely on cases, I can't have confidence that we know what's going on."

But the drive to bring criminal charges often eclipses the intelligence imperative. In cases from Lodi, Calif., where a 23-year-old man was convicted this year of training in a terrorist camp in Pakistan, to Miami, where seven Haitian men are charged with waging war against the United States government, defendants who seemed nowhere near ready to mount an attack were arrested with a news media splash rather than quietly kept under surveillance.

Christopher D. Hamilton, who retired last year after 22 years at the F.B.I., half of it working on counterterrorism, said agents still believed that their careers would rise or fall on the cases they brought.

"Supervisors will say, 'Why don't you have any cases?' " said Mr. Hamilton, now at the Washington Institute for Near East Policy. "Cases are good for getting resources, good for publicity and good for morale."

Even a Los Angeles case that federal officials describe as the most operationally advanced of post-2001 plots uncovered in the United States appears to show a gap between public relations and reality.

In that case, three men are charged with committing robberies to raise money for jihadist attacks on synagogues and military recruiting stations, in what Director Mueller has described as a bid to create "Al Qaeda in California." Their actions are said to have been directed by Kevin James, who headed a Muslim group behind bars.

But agents checked on more than 100 prisoners with links to Mr. James and charged none. And though Mr. James has been portrayed as the mastermind, reporters for The New York Times and "Frontline" were repeatedly able to visit him in jail in Santa Ana, Calif. Such access is almost never granted to people accused of terrorism because the authorities fear that they could direct a plot from prison.

But if making arrests is no longer the top priority, many agents fear that an ill-defined quest for domestic intelligence is likely to lead to political trouble, as the hunt for Communists in the 1960's led to surveillance on the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and John Lennon. Michael Rolince, a veteran F.B.I. counterterrorism official who retired last year, said the attorney general's investigative guidelines, first imposed as a reform in 1976, "are absolutely necessary to keep F.B.I. agents out of trouble."

But the guidelines, largely classified, have been loosened repeatedly in the last 30 years, most recently in 2003 to permit "threat assessments" without evidence of a crime. Officials say uncertainty in field offices about how the rules apply today has slowed the move to intelligence. They plan to issue new instructions to top agents from each field office this month.

Mr. Mudd said he knew that concern about civil liberties was "in the DNA" at the F.B.I., and he recently read a biography of J. Edgar Hoover, whose long tenure as director was marred by abuses, to recall the dangers of uncontrolled domestic spying.

Still, he said, "I do bristle a bit at people saying, 'You want to just go back to the 60's and 70's.' "

DOJ_NMG_0076766

Intelligence on the terrorist threat involves not just spying, Mr. Mudd said, but also building a close relationship with leaders in Muslim communities.

To help agents and analysts distinguish genuine threats from routine Islamist rhetoric, the bureau has just doubled its basic training on counterterrorism to about 80 hours. Skeptics note, however, that more time is devoted to firearms training.

"The F.B.I. needs to follow the lead of the small group of agents who've made themselves experts," said Evan F. Kohlmann, a consultant to the bureau and Scotland Yard and author of a book and Web site devoted to Al Qaeda.

Mr. Kohlmann said the dozen agents who knew international terror networks best were rarely brought in on local cases.

Knowledgeable employees say Muslim agents number no more than a dozen of the bureau's 12,664 agents. (The bureau says it does not track employees by religion.) And an F.B.I. tradition that values leadership and personal connections more than specialized knowledge has resulted in counterterrorism bosses with minimal background.

"You need leadership. You don't need subject-matter expertise," said Gary M. Bald, whom Mr. Mueller named last year as the first head of the National Security Branch, admitting in a 2005 deposition that he knew little about Islam. Mr. Bald has since left for a security job with a cruise line.

The awkward tension between intelligence and prosecution was on vivid display in the Lodi case. The investigation began in late 2001 as an intelligence operation to size up two imams from Pakistan whom the authorities believed had ties to extremists.

After four years of surveillance, agents had found no evidence of terrorism-related crimes by the imams, who were deported to Pakistan. Instead, the government prosecuted Hamid Hayat, 23, who faces a maximum sentence of 39 years in prison for attending a terrorist training camp in Pakistan. His father, Umer Hayat, 48, is free after a mistrial and a guilty plea to making a false statement.

The Lodi case produced worldwide headlines about an "Al Qaeda cell" in California, and John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence, called it the prime example of a "homegrown jihadist cell" in Congressional testimony. But critics of the case, including several former agents, say it has serious and revealing shortcomings.

The informant in the case, a convenience store clerk who was paid more than $200,000 over four years in salary and expenses, could be heard on tape angrily ordering Hamid Hayat to seek terrorist training. His claim that he saw Ayman al-Zawahri, Al Qaeda's second in command, at the Lodi mosque in 1998 or 1999 was admitted by the government to be inaccurate.

The video of Hamid Hayat's confession showed agents prompting his answers and sometimes insisting on their own version. And his account of the camp bore no resemblance to that of his father, who said it was an underground facility where would-be terrorists dressed as "Ninja turtles" and practiced pole-vaulting.

The interrogation tapes so outraged James J. Wedick, who retired in 2004 after 35 years as an F.B.I. agent, that he worked for the defense without charge. "It's shameful, because I've never seen the department do this before," Mr. Wedick said.

The Hayats, he concluded, were saying whatever they thought the agents wanted to hear, and little effort was made to corroborate their confessions.

The case also raised questions about agents' familiarity with Islam, as some scholars say agents misinterpreted a scrap of paper with a Muslim prayer as a jihadist vow.

Finally, several other Pakistani Americans whom the Hayats said had visited terrorist camps have not been charged, suggesting that the F.B.I. does not believe at least some parts of the Hayats' confessions. The management of the case appears at odds with the new philosophy of following up all leads before any public charges are brought.

A lingering question in the Lodi case is the effect on Pakistanis in the area. Some mosque leaders who saw the Pakistani imams as militant interlopers are glad they are gone. But few believe that the Hayats ever posed a threat.

Taj Khan, a retired engineer and leader among the Pakistanis in Lodi, said the Hayats' experience had made residents more reluctant to cooperate with the F.B.I.

"Everybody's clear that as soon as they talk to the F.B.I.," Mr. Khan said, "they might be, you know, put in the slammer."

There is, he added, "not much trust at all."

DOJ_NMG_0076767

Drew S. Parenti, the special agent in charge of the Sacramento office of the F.B.I., defended the case, saying, "Everything we did in this case was lawful, ethical, proper, was reviewed by a judge and was determined by a jury of peers to be sufficient evidence to sustain conviction."

But Mr. Scott, the United States attorney, now says it was a mistake to label the case as a Qaeda plot.

"We probably, at the end of the day, should not have used that term," he said. "One of the biggest mistakes that we can make is to overhype these cases on the front end. And if it is a widely held perception out there that we did that in this case, then I regret that, because that was never our intent."

An Attorney's 23-Year Quest For An Ex-Beatle (LAW)

By Leigh Jones, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, October 10, 2006

Three years after John Lennon was assassinated, Morrison & Foerster partner Dan Marmalefsky launched a lawsuit against the Federal Bureau of Investigation to uncover the Nixon administration's plan to deport the famous Beatle.

Twenty-three years later, he's still digging.

A white-collar defense attorney in Los Angeles, Marmalefsky leads a team of three lawyers, pro bono, that represents a University of California, Irvine history professor, who, since 1983, has sought the release of FBI documents related to its surveillance of Lennon in the early 1970s.

What started out as a compelling freedom-of-information challenge for a young Yale Law School graduate more than two decades ago has become a career-spanning endeavor.

The case has outlived four presidential administrations, dozens of court appearances and, apparently, a film about the famous rock star, "The U.S. vs. John Lennon," in current release. His client, Jonathan Wiener, has chronicled the 23-year battle in the book "Gimme Some Truth: The John Lennon FBI Files," and was a consultant for the film, in which he appears.

A CAUTIONARY TALE

Marmalefsky, now 50, said that he and two other attorneys have spent thousands of hours on the ongoing case, which he asserts goes to the heart of governmental intrusion.

"It cautions us against the risk of allowing the government, without any checks and balances, to place ordinary people under surveillance," he said.

Much of Wiener v. FBI, No. CV-83-1720 (C.D. Calif.), settled in 1997 during the Clinton administration.

In 1991, the issue of whether the FBI had sufficiently detailed its reasons for nondisclosure went up to the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. In that decision, Wiener v. FBI, 943 F.2d 972 (1991), the appeals court reversed the lower court and determined that the FBI's degree of specificity was not adequate.

Today, the parties continue to spar over a handful of remaining documents that U.S. District Judge Robert Takasugi in 2004 said the FBI must release. Government attorneys argue that releasing them could jeopardize the national security of an unnamed foreign government. Lennon was a British citizen.

Although attorneys for the U.S. Department of Justice have filed a notice of an appeal to Takasugi's decision, it remains uncertain whether the U.S. Office of the Solicitor General, which must authorize the government's pursuit of an appeal, will do so.

A spokesman for the Office of Solicitor General said that, so far, no authorization had been granted. He declined to comment further.

A GRASSROOTS THREAT

Lennon drew the Nixon administration's scrutiny because of his protests over the Vietnam war. Lennon's ability to rally grassroots support for his views prompted FBI agents to document his whereabouts and monitor his appearances.

Lennon, 40, was assassinated in 1980 in New York by Mark David Chapman.

Other attorneys representing Wiener are Mark Rosenbaum and Peter Eliasberg, with the American Civil Liberties Union in Los Angeles.

Since the case originally was filed, Marmalefsky has married and has a grown son. When he brought the suit in 1983, he was an associate at Hufstedler Miller Carlson & Beardsley in Los Angeles. Most of its attorneys, including Marmalefsky, joined Morrison & Foerster in 1995.

American University Washington College of Law professor Robert Vaughn, whose scholarship focuses on freedom-of-information issues, said that freedom-of-information disputes that go to litigation usually drag on a year or two.

"Twenty-three years is a very long time," he said.

Big Drug Smuggling Ring Busted (NADH)

Netherlands Antilles Daily Herald, October 10, 2006

56 indicted, 28 arrested, two here

PHILIPSBURG--Twenty-eight persons, including a man from Holland and one from the Dominican Republic who resided here in St. Maarten, were arrested over the weekend in connection with a multimillion-dollar international drug-smuggling and money-laundering operation.

Prosecutor Johan de Vrieze said Sunday the drug-smuggling and money-laundering operation spanned seven countries, including St. Maarten, the United States and Puerto Rico.

De Vrieze also disclosed that detectives of the Kingdom Detective Cooperation Team RST had played a vital role in exposing the mastermind behind the operation, as a result of which some 56 indictments have been issued for persons involved, 28 of whom have already been arrested.

The Dutch national De G. was the first of the two persons arrested here. He was held Friday afternoon and the second suspect M.V. was held on Saturday as he was attempting to leave the island for Puerto Rico.

According to De Vrieze these two coordinated the transhipment of drugs through St. Maarten in collaboration with their Colombian counterparts who organised the delivery using six speedboats that have been confiscated.

Millions of dollars identified by the authorities as being laundered and drug money have also been confiscated from several US and offshore bank accounts.

In addition, the authorities have confiscated about 1,900 kilos of cocaine so far.

De Vrieze explained that RST detectives had stumbled on some information earlier this year that they had followed. The information led them to several groups that appeared at first to be independent operations, but which they later learnt were linked.

The authorities were also able to get detailed information through wire taps that allowed US Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) officers to infiltrate the organisation and identify key role-players, including one Lewis Penia Pereira who was also charged with kidnapping.

Pereira is believed to have orchestrated the kidnapping of a US citizen for whose release he demanded US $5 million in ransom. The victim managed to escape unharmed.

Giving additional details about the busted operation, De Vrieze explained that millions of dollars in drugs had been shipped from South America to Santo Domingo and then to the United States using St. Maarten as a transhipment island.

It seems that the cartel used a method called “the black market peso exchange” to “wash” their ill-gotten gains. They would exchange the money, or make investments with very little if any profit margins, as their prime concern was the return of funds through a legal channel.

The countries involved in the illegal operation were the USA, Puerto Rico, Colombia, St. Maarten, the United States Virgin Islands, the British Virgin Islands, and the Dominican Republic.

Arrests Made In Colombia Drug Case (AP)

By Lara Jakes Jordan, The Associated Press

AP, October 10, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Twenty-seven people were arrested Friday on drug smuggling and money laundering charges linked to a Colombian cocaine operation that kidnapped an undercover U.S. agent last year.

The arrests in New York, New Jersey, Puerto Rico, Colombia, St. Maarten and the Dominican Republic are among 56 indicted as part of international anti-drug investigations called "Operation Green Traketon" and "Operation Watusi."

DOJ_NMG_0076769

An undercover agent for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, whose identify has not been disclosed, was kidnapped and held for a half-day, at times with a gun stuck in his mouth, authorities said.

The drug ring's leaders initially demanded a $2 million ransom but then chose to release him after they realized he was a U.S. government agent.

The Dec. 14 kidnapping had not been previously disclosed. It was announced by the Justice Department on Friday.

"We will leave no stone unturned in hunting down those that kidnap and threaten undercover ICE agents," said Julie Myers, the assistant secretary at the Homeland Security Department. "In this case, our agent was fortunate to escape with his life," said Myers, who heads Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Twenty-nine suspects were still at large late Friday. Among them is Luis Alberto Pena-Pena, a leader of the drug operation who ordered the agent's kidnapping from his hotel in Medellin, Colombia.

The agent had infiltrated the drug ring, which was smuggling cocaine from Colombia through Caribbean islands and Puerto Rico to the United States. Authorities said he was kidnapped, handcuffed and threatened with murder the morning after a conversation with Pena-Pena.

Authorities said Pena-Pena blamed the agent for the loss of 200 kilograms of cocaine that law enforcement officers in Puerto Rico had seized in July 2005. Pena-Pena also berated the agent, who had been taken to a ranch in Medellin, over several money seizures in Puerto Rico, officials said.

Meanwhile, immigration agents in Puerto Rico learned their colleague had been kidnapped and that Pena-Pena's organization was demanding $2 million for his release. That touched off frantic plans to rescue the agent, involving the FBI, the DEA and the U.S. Embassy in Bogota.

Before a rescue could be attempted, one of Pena-Pena's lieutenants found the agent's U.S. law enforcement credentials and badge in his abandoned hotel room and alerted the drug ring leader, officials said.

The agent was released shortly afterward, presumably because Pena-Pena and his confederates believed "killing a U.S. federal agent would've brought more attention to them than they wanted," said Immigration and Customs Enforcement spokesman Dean Boyd.

The indictments announced Friday were part of an ongoing investigation of drug and money laundering trafficking between Colombia and the United States.

So far, the investigation has resulted in the seizure of numerous foreign and domestic bank accounts with values totaling $3.1 million and an estimated 1,900 kilograms of cocaine.

U.S. Indicts 56 On Drug, Laundering Charges (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 7, 2006

Federal authorities yesterday announced the indictment of 56 persons on drug-smuggling and money-laundering charges, 27 of whom were arrested for their purported links to international drug cartels.

The arrests were part of "Operation Watusi," coordinated by U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) and the Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA), along with the FBI's "Operation Green Traketon" -- operating under the Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force.

The investigations focused on drug cartels that operated in Puerto Rico, Colombia, St. Martin, Netherlands Antilles, the U.S. Virgin Islands, the British Virgin Islands and the Dominican Republic.

ICE spokesman Dean Boyd said simultaneous arrests took place in several countries. Numerous foreign and domestic bank accounts were seized, along with $3.1 million cash, about 4,000 pounds of cocaine and six boats.

DOJ_NMG_0076770

According to one of the indictments, a purported leader of one of the organizations, Luis Pena-Pena, coordinated the kidnapping of an undercover ICE agent in Medellin, Colombia, in December. The indictment also said a ransom of $2 million was requested for the release of the undercover agent.

The purported drug traffickers, who thought they were dealing with a drug smuggler, later discovered the kidnapped man was a U.S. drug agent and he was released.

"We will leave no stone unturned in hunting down those that kidnap and threaten undercover ICE agents. In this case, our agent was fortunate to escape with his life," said Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie B. Myers, who heads ICE.

Two of eight indictments in the probe said the cartel members and their co-conspirators coordinated the transportation of multimillion-dollar shipments of cocaine from South America to Puerto Rico via boat. Seven of the eight indictments accused cartel members of laundering the narcotics proceeds through various financial transactions.

Mr. Boyd said the cash was laundered through a complex money-laundering scheme known as the "Black Market Peso Exchange."

During the investigation, Mr. Boyd said federal agents were able to infiltrate money-laundering and drug-trafficking organizations, identifying the source of the drugs, the foreign and domestic drug transporters, a distributor and money launderers. As a result of the simultaneous arrests, he said, federal agents dismantled several drug-trafficking and money-laundering organizations.

Arrest 3 Dominicans In Breakup Of A Major Drug Ring (DOMT)

Dominican Today, October 10, 2006

SANTO DOMINGO. - The National Drugs Control Agency (DNCD) assisted by authorities in 6 countries captured three Dominicans implicated in a powerful international network that introduced large shipments of cocaine to the United States, and which used Puerto Rico as springboard for its operations.

The international operation leading to the arrests included the U.S., Colombia, Saint Martin and Dominican Republic, helped by the DEA, to end the illicit maneuvers capturing 33 of 56 narcotics traffickers, including the Dominican-born Ramirez Santana Leon, Toribio Jiménez and Woady Audry Lopez.
